Mr. DWORSHAK. I am certain that in his extensive travels the Senator endeavored to learn how efficient the operations of the U.S. Information Agency are. Can he tell us whether he thinks effective work is being done to create good will among the people of the Latin-American countries, so that they will have a more comprehensive, a more accurate, and even a more sympathetic understanding of the objectives of the United States?

Mr. ELLENDER. In my report I recommended that the press programs of the U.S. Information Service in Central and South America be terminated at once, as they are ineffective. I also pointed out in the report that if we were to restrict our efforts to a good exchange program and an expansion of the binational centers program, we would do a better job. The binational centers are created under the laws of the countries in which they operate. Local students pay a reasonable fee to learn English or some type of business course. We in turn help, in some countries, to pay some of the expenses of the centers. Because these binational centers are operated entirely by the people of the respective countries, I believe that much good is coming from them.

On the other hand, the U.S. Information Agency is looked upon more as a propaganda agency than anything else. That is why I say that its press programs should be terminated as soon as possible. I so state in my report.

Mr. DWORSHAK. I assume, then, that the Senator reached the same conclusion concerning USIA activities in Latin-American countries as he has reached concerning areas in Europe.

Mr. ELLENDER. I think some USIA activities have done more harm in countries to the south of us than they have done good in other countries across the sea. It may be that in some areas of the world the information program has done much good; for instance, the exchange program, the showing of moving pictures, and activities of that kind.

But, for instance, I found that in some cases the United States has spent millions of dollars to circulate pamphlets in countries where great numbers of the people are illiterate. The money spent for that activity has been wasted.

In addition, I am not in favor of the USIS program under which we pay for subscriptions to Time magazine, the New York Times, the New York Herald Tribune, and other periodicals, and present them to foreign leaders who are able to pay for them. This is money wasted, in my humble judgment. If the matter were left to me, I would dispense with the press service program entirely, because certainly our Embassies can supply the newspapers in all countries with any speeches made by the President, Mr. Dulles, or anybody else. That could easily be done.

It is also my judgment that USIS activity in the radio and television fields ought to be reevaluated. In countries where there are many receivers and good reception, the USIS participation should be continued. However, it is obvious to me that when there are limited television facilities in a country, then little emphasis should be put on television.

The situation in each country should be evaluated, and then a determination made as to what is the best method to interest the people of that country in our objectives.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. I should like to commend the senior Senator from Louisiana for the diligent and comprehensive report he regularly makes to the Senate concerning his travels abroad. As all of us know, he is one of the best traveled Members of this body; and in years past I have listened with fascination to his accounts of life inside the Soviet Union.

I think that, in sum, his reports to the Senate have been of immense value in assisting us to maintain perspective on conditions in the world at large, with particular reference to the workings of American foreign policy in its various aspects. The Senate owes the Senator from Louisiana a great debt of gratitude for his work and for the thorough way in which he apprises us of what he has learned in the course of his travels he has had an opportunity to make. I wish to join my colleagues in commending him.

Mr. ELLENDER. I thank the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. THURMOND. I wish to take this opportunity to extend my highest congratulations to the distinguished Senator from Louisiana upon the interesting and enlightening report he has brought to the Senate. Through his incisive mind and his profound ability, he has been able to bring to the Senate information which we have not been able to obtain in other ways.

I only wish our Government had at the head of some of its agencies—for instance, its intelligence and information agencies—men of the great common sense and great vision that are possessed by the able senior Senator from Louisiana. I believe that, as a result of his travels, he has brought to us information that is of great value. I hope all Senators will read his report and will take advantage of the information he has collected, which I believe will be of great value both to the Senate and to the entire Nation.

Mr. ELLENDER. I thank the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield briefly to me?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I, too, wish to commend the distinguished senior Senator from Louisana, not only for the report he has made today to the Senate, but also for the previous reports he has made to the Senate and for what he has disclosed to the Appropriations Committee. Both as a Senator and as an individual, I am particularly indebted to him for the presentations I have heard him make at the Appropriations Committee's meetings.

In addition, he was directly responsible for my decision to visit Russia itself last fall, a trip from which I believe I have greatly benefited in connection with the discharge of my responsibilities both as a member of the Appropriations Committee, and as a member of the Armed Services Committee.

I believe the importance of the Senator's work is growing with the years—not only as the result of what he does each year, but considerable fruit comes from his work of prior years, and that fruit grows in value and in influence, not only in the legislative branch of the Government, but also in the other branches. I, too, wish to congratulate him.

Mr. ELLENDER. I thank my friend.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, before the senior Senator from Louisiana leaves the floor, I wish to say that I was delighted to have an opportunity to hear his brilliant speech. I thought it was particularly unique, because he gave us a prudent, careful, thoughtful analysis of how our foreign-aid program works, with far more regard both to the taxpayers and to the taxpayers' money than often is the case in connection with other evaluations, and at the same time he was deeply concerned with how our foreign-aid program may be made more effective in a humanitarian sense.

At this time I should like to reread, because I believe they are extremely important, two paragraphs from the address he delivered, as follows:

> It is my firm belief that long-term loans for economic development should continue to be made, but they should be conditioned upon the proper assurances that the proceeds will be used to finance projects and facilities beneficial to all the people.

A little later he said:

> In my humble opinion, an enlightened local business community must be developed—a business community which understands that the payment of fair wages, the raising of living standards, the extension of mass medical and educational benefits to the poor are not only desirable from a humanitarian point of view, but vitally necessary if the pent-up demand for a better way of life is not to explode violently and destroy those who today feed and grow fat at the expense of the poor.

Those recommendations by the Senator from Louisiana are extremely important, because our foreign-aid program in Latin America should be humanitarian. At the same time, I believe it should be guided by enlightened self-interest. We should be deeply concerned with the various aspects of Communist infiltration and subversion in that area.

In my judgment, Mr. President, the senior Senator from Louisiana has hit the bull's-eye when he has pointed out how we can condition our aid to an understanding with the powerful business communities that they should put into effect the things he has advocated.

Mr. ELLENDER. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas subsequently said: Mr. President, I deeply regret I was detained from the Chamber today and did not hear in entirety the very fine report delivered by the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER]. For many years I have looked forward to hearing the Senator from Louisiana report on his studies of our mutual aid program and our relations with other nations, as he has observed them firsthand.

He is always comprehensive and constructive. He is always thorough and objective. I shall look forward with a great deal of pleasure to reading the report he has made to the Senate, and, through the Senate, to the country.

I believe no Member of this body gives more time and attention and devotes more of his talents and ability to this very important subject than does the senior Senator from Louisiana. I think his report will be widely read throughout the Nation, and throughout the other nations of the world. I think it is almost required reading for every Member of Congress.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

INFLATION AND ITS CAUSES

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, various congressional committees are now engaged in a very fruitful and urgently needed discussion of inflation and its causes.

One of the most provocative contributions to an understanding of inflation has come from an economist, Gardiner Means.

I ask unanimous consent that the statement made by Mr. Means before the Anti-Monopoly Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of this body be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY GARDINER C. MEANS, ECONOMIST

Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee, I am delighted to return to testify before you. In the last 2 years your committee has made great progress in the investigation of administered prices and their relation to inflation.

When you started these hearings it was the preponderant opinion that the inflation we were experiencing was the product of excess demand. This opinion was so strongly held that the Federal Reserve tightened its money policy in an effort to contract demand. Because this policy was built on a false analysis, it resulted in the depression, out of which we are climbing all too slowly.

Today, after experiencing inflation and depression at the same time, there are few who still think that this inflation has been the product of too much demand. Clearly, the inflation has not been of the old-fashioned, classical kind with all prices going up more or less together.

Also, it is now generally understood that the new type of inflation is associated with administered prices and wage rates. For bringing about this understanding, I believe your committee is in large measure responsible. Indeed, we are fortunate that your chairman and your committee had the imagination to see the relation between these two things and the courage to focus attention on them.

This new type of inflation is possible because of the area of discretion which is exercised both in the setting of prices and the setting of wage rates. It is because this type of inflation arises from the exercise of this administrative power over prices and wage rates that I have christened it an administrative inflation in contrast to the monetary inflation which comes from an excess of demand and in contrast to the reflation which accompanies the recovery from a serious depression.

Today I should like to present some new evidence showing the administrative character of this new inflation; then I will discuss the roles of labor and management in generating administrative inflation; and finally I want to explore the directions in which we might move toward preventing this type of inflation.

ADMINISTRATIVE INFLATION

I have here four charts which tell the story. The first chart shows how prices rise in a classical inflation in which all groups of prices move up more or less together. The chart covers the period from 1942 to 1953 and includes both the inflation following World War II and the Korean war inflation: By the height of the columns it shows the percentage rise of each of the major commodity groups in the Bureau of Labor Statistics wholesale price index. The width of each column represents the weight that each group receives in the wholesale index, i.e., its relative importance in our economy so far as wholesale commodities are concerned. The area of each column represents the contribution that each group made to the war inflations.

The first thing to notice in the chart is that all the commodity groups rose in price and by not too different amounts, except for the extremes of lumber at one end and rubber at the other. The rise of the total index in this period was 71 percent and for nearly three-fifths of the groups by weight the increase fell within a range of 62 to 77 percent. This price rise was thus fairly general.

The second thing to notice is the distribution of the black and gray columns. The black columns represent the commodity groups in which price administration plays a major role. For example, most of the products included in machinery and motive products have highly administered prices. Also in metals we have mostly steel and steel products whose prices are administered. But, of course, each group includes some market priced commodities such as steel scrap or the nonferrous metals like tin, copper, lead, and zinc whose prices are really made in world markets. In spite of the fact that each group is a mixture of some administered prices and some market prices, those represented in black—metals, machinery and motive products, tobacco, and nonmetallic minerals—are administration dominated. Similarly, the three dark gray collumns for fuel and power, for household durables and for chemicals are intermediate fixtures, while the light gray columns represent the highly competitive industries such as textiles; leather materials; lumber and wood products; and, of course, farm and food products. Now the thing to notice about this chart is the way in which the black and gray columns are scattered. There is no evidence that administered prices as such had a tendency to go up more or less than market prices.

Let us now turn to the second chart which shows the first part of the inflation arising from World War II. The chart covers the period from 1942 to 1947, but most of the rise was in the 2 years after the end of the war. Here we have a fairly general rise in prices but it is clearly led by prices in the highly competitive industries represented by the light gray columns. The price averages for the mixed and the administration dominated groups represented by the dark gray and the black columns rose very much less. Here we have the effect to be expected in a monetary inflation. The excess demand had its initial impact on flexible market prices, while administered prices clearly lagged behind. Only in the later stages of this monetary inflation did administered prices catch up with the general rise.

Now let us look at the inflation from 1953 to 1957, both years of moderately high economic activity. This is shown in chart III. Here clearly the price rise has come primarily in the groups dominated by administered prices. With one little exception, that of rubber, the five administration dominated groups, the black columns, rose most. The three mixed groups, the dark gray columns, come next, and rose to an intermediate degree and the classically competitive prices for food, leather, lumber, textiles and farm products as groups either went up little or actually declined. Even the exception, rubber, helps to prove the rule. The big increase in prices came in 1953 and 1954 and in some degree reflected the very low rise in rubber prices during the war inflations. The pattern as a whole is clearly that of an administrative inflation. These figures make the administrative character abundantly clear, even if we did not have the simultaneous inflation and depression to prove that the inflation was not the result of excess demand.

I have one more chart which brings this administrative inflation more nearly up to date. This chart IV carries the inflation from 1953 to October 1958. It differs from the earlier charts in one respect. In this chart I have divided metals and metal products into three categories—steel, steel products, and other metal products. Each of these is plotted separately and only the first two are given the black color to represent domination by administered prices. Other metal and metal products are given a dark gray to indicate a mixture of administered prices such as aluminum and nickel and such market prices as iron and steel scrap and those of tin and other metals whose prices are made in world markets. Looking at the chart, you can see the same general pattern exists as in the preceding chart except that the dominating role of steel prices in this administrative inflation is clear. Not only have steel prices risen most but the steel-using machinery and motive products and other steel products have risen more than any other groups. In fact, these steel and steel using groups account for two-thirds of the gross increase in prices shown in the chart, that is, two-thirds of the area above the base line. The administered price groups marked in black account for 85 percent of the gross increase in the wholesale price index. If these groups had not gone up in price, the wholesale price index would have risen less than 1 percent and, so far as the wholesale price index is concerned, there would have been no inflation. Anyone who thinks the recent inflation is not an administrative inflation had better study the record.

THE SOURCE OF ADMINISTRATIVE INFLATION

Once we accept the fact of administrative inflation, the next problem is to discover its source. Business management calls it wage inflation and blames the unions. Labor points to the pricing power of management and says this power has been abused. Can we get light on this question.

Here we are greatly indebted to your committee for the facts which were brought out in the hearings on steel and automobiles. I have been making an intensive study of the steel hearings record and will present some of my preliminary findings with respect to the source of the administrative rise in steel prices. To focus on steel prices seems appropriate not only because steel is a kingpin in the administrative inflation as we have just seen, but because steel is a kingpin in our whole economy with its price effects ramifying in all directions. What is the source of the increase in steel prices?

Before I try to answer this question I want to clear up one matter. The steel hearings were in considerable measure confused by the question of whether labor or management was responsible for the inflations which immediately followed World War II and the outbreak of the Korean war. At the previous hearings I suggested that neither was to blame; that these war inflations were monetary in character and grew out of an excess of demand; and that, if anything, administered prices and wage rates had lagged behind in the general price rise. We have just seen that this was so in chart II which showed much more of a rise from 1942 to 1947 in the most competitive industries and a much smaller rise in groups dominated by price administration.

The evidence presented in the steel hearings beautifully illustrates this point. Careful analysis of the data introduced by management shows that both the employment costs per ton in producing steel and the prices of steel lagged well behind the general price rise until the last stages of these war inflations. During most of this inflation period, wage rates went up less quickly than the increases in productivity and in cost of living would justify and by 1953 had hardly caught up with the general rise in the price level. Thus, as far as the monetary inflation resulting from the two wars is concerned, we can say that neither labor nor management was responsible. We can even say that the responsible behavior of each operated to slow up the inflation which arose from excess demand.

The administrative inflation since 1953 is quite a different matter. In my testimony before you a year and a half ago, I pointed out that in theory an administrative inflation could arise either from labor seeking to push up wage rates faster than productivity or from management seeking to increase profit margins too much, or from a combination of these two. Also, I said I did not know how much each possible source contributed, but I suggested that each probably contributed its share. But let us look at the record.

In the steel hearings, as you will recall, a great deal of attention was focused on the average $6 increase in the prices of finished steel which took place in July 1957. On this, Mr. Blough, chairman of the board, United States Steel Corp., testified as follows:

"In our most recent negotiations last year—after a 5-week strike—we signed a labor agreement. It was that labor agreement which foreordained our recent price increase.

"On July 1 of this year we faced what our recent total wage-cost history demonstrates was about 6½ percent increase in our total costs per man-hour; and to cover these costs in part, we raised our steel prices by an average of 4 percent."

There are three points to notice about this placing of the entire blame for these price increases on the labor contract.

First, the statement of costs is in terms of costs per man-hour, not in terms of cost per ton. At no point in the formal presentation by the company was the effect of the increase in output per man-hour considered or the net effect of the wage increase on cost per ton discussed. And, of course, it is costs per ton and not per hour which are important for pricing.

Second, Mr. Blough's 6½-percent increase due to the labor contract includes not only the increase in employment costs expected but also the expected increase in the cost of purchased materials and services per man-hour of employment. The company argued that, historically, when their employment cost per man-hour went up $1, their total costs—including both employment costs and cost for purchased raw materials, fuel, and services—went up more than $2.

This is more or less what one would expect in a monetary inflation when everything goes up more or less together. Whether it could be expected in an administrative inflation is something we need not discuss at this point. What is important is that the corporation reasoned that since employment costs per man-hour were going up nearly 6 percent, total costs divided by total man-hours could be expected to go up 6½ percent.

The third thing to notice is that there is no reference to the changes in steel prices since the previous adjustment of steel wages to productivity in the summer of 1956. Yet finished steel prices had been increased an average of $5 a ton during the winter of 1956–57, primarily through increasing steel extras. Also a 3-cent cost-of-living increase was required by the labor contract in the same period. Both of these increases need to be included if we are to appraise Mr. Blough's conclusion that the labor contract forced the $6 increase in steel prices in July 1957. We can restate the problem: Did the increased costs per ton of steel resulting from the labor contract, including both the cost-of-living increase in the winter and the July 1 increases justify an $11 increase in steel prices?

In the hearings, there was a great deal of confusion as to the increase in employment costs per hour due to the labor contract. Labor estimated 16.4 cents per hour. Management estimated 21 cents an hour. But when we get back of this confusion, there turns out to be a surprising degree of agreement between management and labor as to the increase in employment costs per hour. To make this clear we need to consider separately the increases due to the cost-of-living adjustment and the adjustment for productivity.

Let us take up first the productivity increases on July 1, leaving for a moment the two adjustments for the cost-of-living. Both management and labor submitted their estimates of the increase in employment costs per hour for workers covered by the union and taking account of all fringe benefits. Using the management figures, we get an estimate that the increase would amount to 15.2 cents an hour or an increase of 4.5 percent in employment cost per hour.[1] According to the labor estimate, the increase would amount to 13.4 cents per hour or an increase of 4.0 percent.[2] You can take your choice or split the difference to get 4¼ percent and not be far wrong on the productivity increase in employment cost per hour due directly to the labor contract.

The steel managment also submitted figures indicating 20.9 cents an hour as the increase in the employment cost of workers not covered by the contract, mostly salaried workers, salesmen, and officials, amounting to an increase of 4.5 percent, a figure which the union would undoubtedly want to shade a little.[3] Again we won't go far wrong if we use 4¼ percent.

But the 4¼ pecent in each case is the increase in employment cost per hour. How much did this really increase employment cost per ton of steel as compared with the preceding summer? Obviously, if productivity increased 4¼ percent, this July 1, 1957, increase in employment cost per hour of 4¼ percent would not involve any increase in employment costs per ton. How much should we allow for increased productivity? Management did not attempt to make an adjustment as Mr. Blough's figures indicate. But it did present figures showing a cumulative average increase of 2.8 percent a year from 1940 to 1956.[4] The union arrived at 3.0–3.1 for essentially the same period and also argued that the rate of increase in productivity had increased in more recent years. A Bureau of Labor Statistics study found a rate of increase in output per man-hour of 3.3 percent from 1947 to 1953, and from 1953 to 1955, both years of relatively high production, the Bureau of Labor Statistics study shows an average increase of 4.3 percent a year.[5] If the high rate of increase in output per man-hour of 4.3 percent a year at a sustained rate of production continued, and there is no reason to think it has not, then, apart from the cost-of-living adjustment, the employment cost per ton for production workers should not have changed at all for a given rate of operations. Also, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics study, the output per man-day of nonproduction workers—salaried personnel—increased between 1953 and 1955 by 4.6 percent a year.[6] If the employment cost per hour for this group only went up to 4¼ percent, then the employment cost per ton of steel at a standard rate of operations should have gone down. Altogether, I can find no evidence that the employment cost per ton was increased by the requirements of the labor contract apart from its cost-of-living provisions. Also, since the steel corporation finds the very high correlation between a rise in employment costs and total costs, the latter should not have gone up if there had been no cost-of-living increase.

This brings us to the 3-cent cost-of-living increase in the winter of 1956–57 and the 4-cent increase of the July 1, 1957. The steel corporation adds something to the 4 cents, an extra half cent, partly for the increase in fringe costs and partly for the greater cost of a proportional cost-of-living increase for nonproduction workers and officials whose average pay is higher. If this is justified, we have to add a comparable amount to the 3-cent increase. This gives us a 7.9-cent increase in employment cost per hour or an increase of 2.2 percent in employment cost per hour, which is not offset by an increase in productivity.[7] As far as I can see, this is the magnitude of the direct increase in costs per ton arising from the labor contract.

Should we also assume that other costs went up in somewhat the same proportion? This is what one could expect in a general inflation arising from excess demand. But there is no reason to expect such an increase in an administrative inflation and the evidence since shows other costs per ton going down from the summer of 1956 to June 1957. These reductions in other costs per ton could easily offset the increase in employment costs per ton due to the cost-of-living increase. Even if we assume other costs per ton constant, the 2.2 percent cost-of-living increase in employment costs per ton would entitle the steel company to a "cost-of-living increase in the price of steel of only 1.2 percent or $1.75 a ton, not the $6 increase which was to cover a part of the increase due to the labor contract nor the $11 increase which actually occurred in the labor contract year 1956–57.

Whether the rest of the price increase can be justified on other grounds, I cannot yet say. Management points to the effect of inflation or depreciation charges when accounting is based on historical cost. Also to measure the rate of profit on assets valued on a historical basis is to take no account of the actual inflation. At present I am studying this matter. However, it is difficult to believe that the difference between $1.75 and $11 can all be justified on that basis, particularly in the light of the large increases in price which have taken place since 1953 in a period in which there was not general inflation among wholesale prices and in the light of the fact that lays management the whole blame for the 1957 increase on the labor contract.

As far as I can see, we have here a clear case, not only of the existence of an important degree of pricing discretion, but the exercise of that power to increase prices significantly in excess of the increase justified by increased costs.

Also, since the steel industry, a leader in the administrative inflation, tried to place responsibility on labor where it clearly does not belong, I think your committee should take with a good many grains of salt, the industrywide contention that labor is to a major extent the source of this administrative inflation.

This poses for us a major problem, the pricing power of modern industry. Administrative inflation is only one aspect of this problem. The problem itself is much more basic. It goes to the very foundations of our free enterprise system which we all want to preserve.

THE BASIC PROBLEM

The real problem is that the modern corporation simply does not fit the postulates of traditional economic theory. It has frequently been pointed out that Adam Smith believed corporate enterprise could not be successful except under very special circumstances such as banks and canal companies. But that was a long time ago. Let us look at Alfred Marshall whose great work "The Principles of Economics" is still the bible for so many economic theorists. Marshall built his analysis around the conception of the representative firm. Now this firm was a relatively small affair with a life cycle very much like that of its owner. The owner starts the enterprise and drives to expand it, but then when his own vigor wanes the enterprise itself weakens and is likely to die, except as sometimes a son or relative picks it up and gives it a new life cycle of rise and fall. Marshall thought of each industry as having hundreds or even thousands of such one-man enterprises. In his famous analogy he likened an industry to a forest with individual trees, sprouting, growing, and finally declining. In his own words "as with the growth of trees, so it is with the growth of business." This is the concept which underlies Marshall's "Principles." True, in his sixth edition, 20 years after his principles were formulated, he changed the tree analogy to read "as with the growth of trees, so it was with the growth of businesses as a general rule before the recent development of vast joint-stock companies." [My emphasis.] But his "Principles" were not revised to take account of this momentous change. And today the great bulk of traditional economic thinking, and so many of our economic texts, are built on the conception of enterprises very much like Marshall's representative firm.

Actually, traditional theory has only three main lines of solution for dealing with the situation where enterprise has excessive power over pricing.

The first possible solution is to reestablish classical competition so that prices are truly determined by market forces and there is no significant degree of administrative discretion left in pricing. I believe we are so far from this condition now that I don't see how we can return to it without losing the very real values to our society that are contributed by big business. The degree of breakup in business that would be necessary to return conditions to those of classical competition seems to me just out of the question. This does not mean that I reject a vigorous antitrust policy that continues to maintain at least a number of competitors in each industry. But we have that now and it does not give us classical competition. Also I would not reject Mr. Romney's ingenious proposal that big business be encouraged to subdivide as a sign of success. But that would seem to me no solution to the basic problem. The amount of breakup that would be needed is simply of a different magnitude from anything that has been seriously discussed as Dr. Lewis has so clearly indicated. I believe that the breakup of big business as the chief line of solution would take us in the wrong direction.

[1] Hearings. Pp. 1027, 1028. Management estimate, 19.4 cents, less 4.2 cents cost-of-living adjustment. Labor's estimate 17.4 cents less 4 cents cost-of-living adjustment. The 4.5 cents an hour figure for the cost-of-living increase for all employees given by management has been apportioned between union and nonunion in proportion to their respective employment costs per hour, giving 4.15 cents per hour for union and 5.66 cents per hour for nonunion. The average employment cost per worker covered by the union was given by the USS as $3.36 for the second quarter of 1957.

[3] Hearings. Pp. 1027 and 1028. Increase equals 26.6 cents per hour less cost-of-living adjustment of 5.7 cents. See footnote 1, p. 11. The average employment cost per hour for nonunion employees was given by USS as $4.59 for the second quarter of 1957.

[4] Hearings. P. 1449. The figure actually given is 56.3 percent increase from 1940 to 1956. This is equivalent to 2.8 compounded annually for 16 years.

[5] Man-hours Per Unit of Output in the Basic Steel Industry, 1939–55, pp. 6 and 8. The actual figure given is a 3.2 percent a year decrease in man-hours per unit of output. The reciprocal of this gives 3.3 percent as the average anual increase in output per man-hour.

[7] The average employment cost per hour for all employees was given by U.S. Steel as $3.64 for the second quarter of 1957. Hearings. P. 1027.

The second traditional approach is price regulation of the public utility type. In the case of public utilities which are by the nature of the case, monopolies we have adopted regulation. Dr. Lewis has advocated this type of solution. If no better way can be found, that might be preferable to the extensive breakup of industry. But I shy away from such an approach partly because it would greatly reduce the flexibility of action on the part of enterprise and partly because it would lose the very real advantages of the kind of competition which we do have when there are half a dozen companies competing in an industry. True, this competition is not of the price-determining sort and the range of pricing discretion it leaves to business is capable of being abused, but I am certain that it has its value and should not be replaced.

The third traditional approach is that of Government operation. In England the government has been into and out of the steel industry and the enthusiasm for Government operation has waned considerably with the experience. I doubt very much if this would prove a satisfactory solution. In a special situation we might find effective the Government operation of a part of an industry as a yardstick, but again I doubt the general application of this approach. Traditional theory never really came to grips with the problems of economic adjustment in a society in which big business and administered prices play a dominant role. Traditional theory just hasn't got the kind of ammunition needed to deal with this problem. So I am going to start fresh.

My starting point will be what I think is a very significant and important statement made at the outset of your hearings by Senator DIRKSEN. With his permission, I am going to repeat it. He said:

"I believe in the main, while once upon a time it could be said that some of our managers had no adequate social conscience, I believe today that the corporate managers of the country are fully aware of, and I think they exercise, an abiding sense of social responsibility."

Now I very much agree with the Senator that corporate management is much more aware of its power and responsibility than it used to be. We have some very able and responsible men running many, if not most, of our big businesses today. But let us consider some of the implications of Senator DIRKSEN's statement. I want to ask three questions.

First, why should corporate management take on social responsibility? It was one of the great beauties of classical competition that no one had to exercise social responsibility. As long as each private enterpriser sought only his own interest, the unseen hand controlled matters so that, acting in his own interest, he served the public interest. Of course, he could exercise as much social responsibility as he chose in his personal relations, feeding the poor, voting at elections, and so on. But as a private enterpriser he could say "the public be damned" and who cared. Competition wouldn't allow him to charge too high a price and shoddy goods would only bring him a lower price, just as the Virginia farmer today gets docked for garlicky wheat. Surely something new has been added when we expect the business enterpriser to be socially responsible in running his enterprise.

Second, let me ask—without any invidious implication—just how does the corporate management know what is in social interest? Their job is to run a big business and run it well. Can we expect them also to take on the major job of figuring out what is in the social interest?

And my third question: Is it in the social interest that the big companies, with their areas of discretion in price administration, should price to make the maximum profit, and if not, can we expect the social conscience of corporate management to go all the way necessary to serve the social interest in this respect.

In asking these questions, I am not trying to minimize the importance and value of responsible corporate management. Rather, I would say that responsible corporate management was a major and valuable ingredient in our present situation, but that we are placing more of a burden on management than management can reasonably be expected to bear, especially as I think there are things that we could do about it. Here we have an essentially new problem to think through.

Toward solving this problem I see four steps we can take. The first step is to get rid of the idea that the big corporations are private enterprise. Just what is private about an enterprise that organizes a quarter of a million workers into a great productive unit using the capital of more than a quarter of a million stockholders and serving millions of ultimate customers? Is it any more private than, say, the government of New York State? We need a new name for this type of enterprise to give us a new focus in our thinking. For my own purposes, I think of these great producing organizations as collective enterprises because that is what they are, great collectives of productive activity. Just where one draws the line between private enterprise and collective enterprise can be worked out by experience. What is important now is that we should have a new focus for our analysis.

The second step we can take is to start setting up the standards by which we should judge the performance of our great collective enterprises. At the present time there are no real standards which indicate how corporate management should act in order to serve both the public interest and their own—for I hold it as self-evident that we cannot expect corporate management to act contrary to their own interest. I think of these standards as differing in important respects from those which we apply to a private enterprise and yet I believe there is much in traditional theory which will help us to set up such standards.

The third step, once we have the standards for collective enterprise sufficiently well formulated, is to work out methods for strengthening those self-interests of corporate management which also serve the public interest and weaken those which run counter to the public interest. This is a problem of incentives and the framework of laws, rules, customs, and opinion within which corporate management carries on its day-to-day activity.

In the book I am working on, I hope to spell out more clearly the things that make collective enterprise what it is, the standards which should be applied to it and the measures which could be taken to make the self-interest of corporate management and the social interest more nearly the same. For the present, all I can do is to indicate to you as I have what I believe to be the most promising lines for dealing with the problem raised by the pricing power of our great collective enterprises.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, Mr. Means carefully and persuasively developed the interesting contention that since 1953 we have been undergoing, not the classical, surplus-of-money inflation—that is, with too much money chasing too few goods—but a highly selective inflation featured by sharp price rises in industries in which a few huge corporations can virtually fix prices—and, of course, they always fix them in one way, namely, up—while prices were actually falling or increasing only moderately in other industries.

The Federal Reserve Board has taken a position in sharp disagreement with Mr. Means. Mr. Means has severely criticized the Board's monetary policies.

Recently, I asked the very able Director of the Division of Research and Statistics of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Ralph A. Young, to reply to the Means statement. Mr. Young did so in a thoughtful and detailed letter. Mr. Young's position is that the Means statement is a useful contribution; but he criticizes it for these reasons:

First. Mr. Means implies that administered prices are changed arbitrarily without regard to the strength of market conditions.

Of course, Mr. President, market conditions constitute a limitation on any monopolistic or oligopolistic group whose members attempt to work in concert to fix prices. Of course there is a limit to the prices they can charge—whether in the case of a railroad, which in the old days used to hike its prices so greatly, without regard to the welfare of the farmers, or whether in the case of the steel companies which push up their prices higher and higher.

It seems to me that Mr. Young's analysis, although thoughtful, and although he has made the best case he can, should concern itself with the fact that today the steel industry has a monopoly of peculiar power. It is indeed able to raise its prices, and to raise them so high that they affect the entire economy. For example, Mr. Means has pointed out—and I should be delighted to hear a refutation of this assertion—that between 1956 and 1957, for each $1.75 of wage increase, there was a price increase of $11. Such administered prices which are not justified on the basis of the wage increases require, it seems to me, some answers from those involved.

In the second place, the criticism by Mr. Young of Mr. Means' theory is that Mr. Means overlooks the consequences of earlier inflationary developments which may result in the delayed making of price and wage adjustments sometime after inflationary pressures elsewhere have subsided.

On the basis of any sort of analysis that I have been able to find of the price increases in the steel industry and in the automobile-manufacturing industry, I believe the evidence is very clear that after the inflationary forces in those areas subsided—and the same is true with respect to the oil industry and many of the other areas of administered prices—there was not a delayed inflationary impact sufficient to justify any substantial price increase, and certainly none of the kind that would justify the increase the economy suffered.

In the third place, Mr. Young writes that Mr. Means is correct when he argues that the 1955 to 1957 inflation was not a monetary inflation, because the policies of the Federal Reserve Board were such that the monetary influences were eliminated and the inflation was moderated and was held in check.

What Mr. Young has written is that the reason why we had relative price stability, despite some increases in prices during the period 1955–57, was that the Federal Reserve Board "hiked" interest rates and stemmed the push of inflation in the rest of the economy. Unfortunately, Mr. Young, while writing an excellent letter, did not have the time to go into a detailed analysis of this claim. After all, Mr. President, can there be any justice to the notion that high interest rates were what pushed down the farm commodity prices?

After all, the cost of food dropped in the period of 1955 to 1957, and the cost of food is a very fundamental part of the cost of living. I do not know anyone who would say high interest rates shoved down farm prices. At the same time, the textile industry was the other example during this period in which prices actually dropped. I do not know how anyone could contend there was a connection between pushing up interest rates and a drop in textile prices. Actually, I think a careful analysis of this hard money policy will show that housing starts dropped very decisively. They dropped because, of course, interest is a tremendously important factor in home construction—enormously important—particularly when we have the kind of frictions in the FHA and veterans' interest rates that we have. So the argument that the monetary policies of the Federal Reserve Board stemmed inflation simply is not supported by the facts.

In the fourth place, it is stated the industries experiencing the largest increases in prices during at least part of the period were operating at or close to capacity. That is true during part of this period. Nevertheless, during a very important part of this period they were operating well below capacity, but they did not drop their prices; they increased their prices. This is the terrible consequence of administered prices. This is the real weakness in our whole economy. This is the part of inflation that is so difficult to solve without some kind of initiative and Government action. The fact is that as demand drops, if and as the Federal Reserve Board and the fiscal policy of the Government succeed in stemming demand, it still does not bring prices down in a very important part of our economy.

The fifth and final criticism by Mr. Young is that the prime explanation for price rises in late 1957 and early 1958 was not administered prices, but the legacy of an earlier period of excessive demand and the result of unfavorable weather on food supply.

That is a true statement. There is no question that rising food prices were important considerations in the rising cost of living. This should have been rather compensated by a drop in the price of steel and other prices where the law of supply and demand should operate, if we had the kind of free economy that is talked about.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter of Mr. Young together with three Federal Reserve Board bulletins be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter and bulletins were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM,
Washington, D.C., February 5, 1959.

The Honorable WILLIAM PROXMIRE,
U.S. Senate, Washington 25, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR PROXMIRE: In response to your question at our chart presentation to the Banking and Currency Committee last week, we have examined Mr. Means' statement and, although unable to appraise fully the points he raises, we should like to comment briefly on some of them.

Mr. Means has been interested for years in this matter of administered prices and through his efforts needed attention has been given to the institutional aspects of the pricing process. It is an important and now widely accepted fact that in major sectors of the economy there is a discretionary area for conscious decision in setting prices and wages. This area differs greatly from time to time depending on various cyclical and other market influences. It also varies among industries, products, and labor markets because of the degree of concentration, types of organization, degree of public regulation, and other factors.

The particular classification of industries and commodities adopted by Mr. Means may not be the most fruitful one for price analysis, however, especially if it is unaccompanied by analysis of other forces operating in the economy and in particular markets. For example, the commodities included in the competitive price group are mainly farm products and products manufactured from them while those in the administered price group are largely industrial. Farm products and industrial commodities are subject to different demand and supply influences. Moreover, within the industrial commodity group—or largely price administered group—price increases in the 1955–57 expansion period were greatest for metals and products and it was for these products that demands also were strongest and pressure on productive capacity heaviest. Wages as well as prices advanced rapidly in the metals group.

While evidence supports Mr. Means' position regarding the varying sensitivity of prices in responding to market developments, his view that price advances reflected mainly administrative decisions leaves the forces shaping those decisions unaccounted for. Implicit in his presentation is the idea that administered prices and wages are changed arbitrarily without regard to the strength of current or prospective market conditions. Also, it overlooks the consequences of earlier inflationary developments which may result in delayed price and wage adjustments being made sometime after inflationary pressures elsewhere have subsided.

To some extent, of course, it is possible for prices and wages to be raised without close reference to market influences but there are real limits as to how far this process can go or how long it can last before competition from other products or alternative sources of satisfaction become effective, unless underlying economic conditions are inflationary. These limits are conditioned by market forces which in turn are influenced by fiscal and monetary conditions and policies.

Mr. Means is clearly in error in saying that the Federal Reserve analyzed the problem incorrectly and that the application of monetary policy caused the 1957 downturn. The downturn rather developed out of an earlier situation during which the interaction of demand-pull, cost-push, and administered price and wage decisions accentuated a cyclical upswing. In that phase inflationary factors and expectations permitted or fostered excessive accumulation of business inventories, overbuying of business plant and equipment, and overextended financial commitments. Monetary and credit policy operated to restrain the growth of these excesses but was unable to prevent them altogether and cyclical recession resulted. Surely, however, if monetary policy had been one of maintaining easy credit by freely providing additions to the money supply the exuberant psychology and other excesses would have carried further and led sooner or later to a more severe contraction and more unemployment. The question of what would have happened if demand had not been restrained by monetary policy is not asked by Mr. Means but is one that needs to be answered before it is concluded that monetary instruments should not be used to moderate inflationary trends.

With reference to this point, Mr. Means states that price developments during the period were not influenced by "too much demand" because "clearly, the inflation has not been of the old fashioned, classical kind with all prices going up more or less together." This quotation merely states the fact that the rise in prices from late 1955 through 1957 was not on the order of that associated with the two recent wars. That it was not a more serious inflation, fed by expansion in money and credit, reflected in part the operation of the credit restraints which were applied during the period.

Mr. Means appropriately stresses the strategic importance of steel price increases in the general price situation in recent years. But inflationary tendencies were not so limited to steel and steel products in the 1953–57 period as he suggests. During that period, based on annual averages, the total wholesale price index rose 7 percent, the consumer price index rose 5 percent, and prices paid by farmers rose about 15 percent while prices received by farmers declined 6 percent. The general construction cost index increased 12 percent, and costs of machinery and equipment rose 21 percent. Common stock prices rose about 80 percent and average hourly earnings of factory workers advanced 17 percent.

Also, Mr. Means' selection of the 1953 to 1957 time period is open to some question since it averages together a period of cyclical recession beginning in mid-1953 and continuing through most of 1954, which was not a period of credit restraint, with a period of rapid recovery and expansion to new high levels in 1955 to 1957. It is also a period which averages together a period of marked decline and advance in prices of farm and food products.

To understand the price and other economic developments from the end of the 1953–54 recession to the beginning of the 1957–58 recession, the period should be subdivided, relating output and supply, demand, credit, and price developments one to another in each subperiod. The three attached articles on price developments, which appeared in the Federal Reserve Bulletins for January 1956, November 1956, and April 1958, contribute toward this end. The first two of those articles describe the important, indeed the dominant, influence of expanding demands in 1955 and 1956 and the widespread nature of advances in prices among industrial commodities. What is particularly significant is that the industries which experienced the largest increases in prices were those operating at record levels, with output at or close to the limits of capacity.

In 1955 and 1956, while personal incomes and corporate profits were at very advanced levels, demands for credit were very large, to finance the higher level of business activity as well as to finance consumer short-term credit, mortgages, business capital outlays, and public projects of State and local governments.

The further rise in average levels of prices during the recession in late 1957 and early 1958 was in part a legacy of the earlier period of excessive demands and in part a result of unfavorable weather which reduced supplies of fresh foods. Prices of industrial materials declined in this period. While the declines were selective rather than general, the period can hardly be characterized as one of simultaneous inflation and depression.

In summary, our view is that Mr. Means has called attention to one important aspect of a very serious problem but his contention that administration is an adequate explanation for postwar or post-Korean events is unacceptable, as is his view that monetary policy is an inappropriate tool for dealing with the recent period. Monetary policy cannot deal with all of the problems associated with price pressures, but surely price and wage increases in both the administered as well as competitive area would have been much greater if monetary restraint had not been applied.

We trust this reply throws some light on your question. If we can be of further help please let us know.

Sincerely yours,

RALPH A. YOUNG,
Director, Division of Research and Statistics.

[From the Federal Reserve Bulletin, April 1958]

RECENT PRICE TRENDS

Recession in economic activity beginning, beginning last autumn, has been accompanied by little change in prices of most industrial commodities from the advanced levels reached last summer. Prices of farm products and foods have risen sharply, however, reflecting reduced supplies of meats and some other fresh foods. Prices of consumer services have extended their postwar rise and, together with higher prices of fresh foods, have resulted in further advances in the combined index of consumer prices.

Average wholesale prices of industrial commodities have been stable since last summer, after rising 9 percent from the early 1955 level. Since late summer prices of basic industrial materials have declined. Prices of business equipment rose further during the autumn, but have since leveled off. Reported or list prices for most manufactured materials and consumer products have changed little, but concessions from list prices have become more prevalent.

Declines in business and consumer demands since summer have been largest for durable goods. Orders for business equipment have fallen, following the investment boom, and consumer buying of autos has declined sharply. Output of steel and various other materials has declined more sharply than consumption, and total business inventories have fallen very rapidly in recent months.

Industrial building activity has also declined, but further increases in public construction have about offset this reduction. Defense orders recently have expanded considerably following curtailment in both orders and outlays last summer.

Total exports of U.S. products have dropped sharply from the advanced levels reached last spring. Industrial activity has declined in Canada and some other countries abroad. In Western Europe activity has continued at advanced levels, but buying of materials has declined.

Decreases in activity in the United States have been reflected in a decline of 4 percent in nonagricultural employment from its peak last August, an appreciable reduction in average hours of work in manufacturing and a rise of about 2 million in the number of persons unemployed. The impact on incomes of reduced employment has been moderated by unemployment compensation payments, and personal income has declined 2 percent from its high.

Price changes during this recession have differed from those in the first 7 months of the 1948–49 and 1953–54 recessions as summarized in the table on the next page. The marked rise in prices of livestock and meats in recent months, owing to contraction in supplies, is in contrast with the small changes in 1953–54 and the sharp declines in 1948–49. There has been little change in average prices of industrial commodities in the recent period, as in 1953–54, but in 1948–49 there were declines averaging about 4 percent in both wholesale and retail markets.

The 1948 reversal immediately followed 2 years of rapid price advance beginning with termination of wartime price controls.

NOTE.—Changes are shown from the average level of the 2 months preceding the declines in industrial production, that is, July–August 1957 through March 1958, June–July 1953 through February 1954, and September–October 1948 through May 1949. Based on Bureau of Labor Statistics data, with March 1958 estimated.

In contrast, the 1953–54 recession did not begin until prices of many commodities had already declined considerably from the high levels reached in 1951, after the outbreak of war in Korea. Price advances in the 1955–57 period, while large, developed more gradually and uniformly than they did during the buying waves in the earlier postwar periods of price rise.

CONSUMER PRICES

Consumer prices for goods and services were influenced by the expansion in demands and activity in 1954–55 only after a considerable lag. The average of all items in the consumer price index changed little in that period, but the inflationary pressures then building up were reflected in a rising index beginning in the spring of 1956, as the chart shows. Subsequently, increases in retail prices were widespread, and by the autumn of 1957 the total consumer index was 6 percent higher than in early 1956.

Since autumn, the consumer price index has risen about 1 percent further. As in the past, prices of many consumer services have continued to advance after aggregate demands and activity began to recede. Prices of some fresh foods have increased sharply owing to reductions in supplies partly attributable to adverse winter weather. Retail prices of most other goods have been stable or have declined.

Services

The consumer price index differs from most other price indexes in that it includes many services as well as commodities. During the past 10 years, prices of services have risen much more than retail prices of commodities, reversing the pattern of World War II and the immediate postwar years. Since 1939, services have risen about 90 percent, or roughly the same amount as nonfood commodities. Foods are up 150 percent from the 1939 level and rent has risen 60 percent.

Roughly 50 of the 300 items priced for the index are classified as services, and they represent about 30 percent of the total index. Most of them relate to housing and household operation (home purchase, mortgage interest, and insurance and taxes, as well as gas, electricity, telephone, laundry, and dry cleaning), to medical care (professional fees and hospitalization), and to transportation (railroad and transit fares and auto repairs and insurance).

Since World War II, average prices of services have advanced continuously, even when manpower and material resources were not being used intensively. Nevertheless, the rate of advance has responded, usually with some lag, to changes in the economic situation and trends in commodity markets.

In the early postwar years, the annual rate of increase in service prices was nearly 6 percent. During the 1949 recession it slackened to 2.5 percent, but then accelerated again to around 6 percent following the outbreak of the Korean war in mid-1950, when commodity prices rose sharply for a time. The rate slackened in late 1952, and fell to about 2 percent in the 1954 recession.

In the most recent period of economic expansion, the rise in services accelerated beginning in the spring of 1956. In 1957 it was 4.5 percent, and this rate continued through the first quarter of this year.

Broad categories of consumer services show some diversity in postwar patterns of cyclical price behavior. Rates of increase in prices of laundry, dry cleaning, home repairs, hair cuts, and beauty shop services declined more or less promptly in the earlier postwar recessions. Available information suggests that the advance in prices for most of these has slackened since last summer.

For many other services, cyclical behavior is modified by special circumstances. Thus increases in railroad and local transit fares and utility rates for gas, electricity, and telephones must be authorized by regulatory agencies. Rate advances usually lag changes in costs and may continue after expansion in demands and increases in commodity prices have ceased.

National average rates for utilities have increased more rapidly since mid-1957 than during the previous year. Railroad passenger fares, which advanced in the first quarter of this year. Medical fees, hospitalization insurance, and theater admissions have also continued to increase in recent months.

Foods

Retail prices of foods, which have about the same importance in the total consumer index as prices of services, have increased since autumn. The advance has been concentrated in fresh foods—a group that includes meats, eggs, milk, and fresh fruits and vegetables.

Severe winter weather in parts of the country reduced supplies of fresh vegetables and some fruits. From December to March, their prices at retail rose about 15 percent to very high levels even for that time of year. When supplies improve later this year, prices may be expected to decline.

Supplies of meats also have declined in recent months and prices have increased sharply. Marketings of meat animals over any period reflect mainly decisions of producers made in the past. Supplies are also influenced by farmers' plans for future production through the withholding or marketing of breeding stock. These decisions are based primarily on price expectations and feeding costs.

Largely in response to high prices in 1953, hog raising operations were stepped up in the spring of 1954, and pork production expanded steadily through 1955. Cattle raising had increased earlier, in response to high prices in 1950–51, and in 1954 marketings were already at advanced levels and prices were down from earlier highs. Cattle marketings expanded further during 1955 as farmers retained fewer animals to enlarge herds.

Per capita meat supplies increased about one-eighth from the spring of 1954 to early 1956. With supplies increasing, prices of livestock declined sharply, as the chart shows, despite growth in consumer incomes and demands over that period. Owing to these large price decreases, average levels of commodity prices changed little in 1955 even though prices of industrial commodities were rising.

As a result of declining prices for livestock, production tapered off after early 1956. Demands subsequently expanded further, however, and prices had recovered substantially by last summer. Since then, seasonally adjusted livestock marketings have dropped considerably further, owing partly to large feed supplies and the withholding of animals to feed to heavier weights. With demands relatively well maintained, livestock, and meat prices have risen sharply.

In March retail prices of meats were 15 percent above a year earlier and nearly 30 percent above 2 years earlier. The higher level of prices, along with the abundance of feeds, has been stimulating expansion in livestock production. Marketings are expected to increase beginning later this year.

Retail prices of prepared foods have changed little in recent months. As a group, these prices turned upward in the spring of 1956 and rose 4 percent before leveling off a year ago. Since then, prices of cereal and bakery products have continued to increase but much less rapidly than earlier.

Prices of restaurant meals have increased little since last summer, after having advanced more rapidly in early 1957 than in 1956. Prices of processed fruits and vegetables declined last year, but they have turned upward recently as a result of the sharply higher prices of fresh supplies. Coffee prices have dropped since 1956.

Other consumer goods

Retail prices of goods other than foods have declined slightly from the peak reached last November. New autos, fuels, and apparel have pronounced seasonal price variations, with rises in the autumn and declines at other times of the year. For example, discounts from list prices for new autos increase as the model year progresses. Discounts usually are not granted on new models at the time of their introduction in the autumn, and effective prices to consumers advance whether or not list prices are raised.

In addition to the elimination of discounts when new auto models were introduced last autumn, list prices were raised about 3 percent. Subsequently, reduced consumer demand for new cars and large dealer stocks resulted in large discounts from list prices, and in February and March prices to consumers were close to year earlier levels.

Retail prices of appliances on the average have continued to change little since autumn. In recent years, gains in efficiency of production and distribution have apparently been reflected in lower prices to consumers as well as in improvements in the products. Manufacturers' prices of appliances have declined moderately, and distributors' margins have fallen. This year the importance of retail price maintenance practices has been further reduced.

Prices of household goods such as furniture and textile products have changed little since autumn, and prices of apparel and fuels have declined somewhat, after mainly seasonal advances during the autumn. Meanwhile, prices of drugs, toiletries, and some other consumer products have advanced slightly further.

WHOLESALE PRICES

The total wholesale commodity price index, as well as the consumer index, has increased in recent months, reflecting the reduced market supplies and higher prices for fresh foods. Average prices of industrial commodities have been stable since last summer, as the chart on the next page shows.

Prices of machinery and other producers' equipment leveled off in late autumn, following a rise of nearly one-fifth since mid-1955. The rise in equipment prices along with reduced business liquidity, after a period of sustained expansion in capacity and modernization, contributed to a weakening of business incentives to make additional outlays. Business equipment is usually sold on the basis of negotiated prices. Competition for the reduced volume of orders available in recent months has undoubtedly been reflected in some declines in prices.

Prices of scrap metals, rubber, raw wool, and some other crude materials have declined in recent months. Several fabricated materials, such as textile mill products, refined nonferrous metals, lumber, and plumbing equipment, have also decreased. Fuel oil prices have continued to decline from the advanced levels reached a year ago as a result of the Suez crisis. Fuel oils are represented in the consumer goods index shown in the accompanying chart, as well as in the index for fabricated materials.

For most highly fabricated industrial materials, such as steel and building materials, the list prices reported for index number calculation have not changed. When demands fall, however, price decreases often take such forms as discounts from lists, freight absorption, and improved service and delivery terms. There has been some price cutting of this kind in recent months.

Price changes for materials over the past year have reflected developments abroad as well as in the United States. By the beginning of 1957, world capacity for the production of some major materials had been greatly enlarged and supplies were increasing. The leveling off last spring of industrial activity abroad—following several years of marked expansion—was accompanied by diminution of inventory demands.

United States exports of steel, fuels, and other products to industrial countries fell sharply from the spring through the remainder of 1957, and prices of some internationally traded commodities weakened. Lead, zinc, tin, sugar, and wool turned down, and the decline in copper continued. Decreased demand for industrial products is to be expected from countries whose earnings from the export of raw materials and foodstuffs have fallen. Through January, however, U.S. exports to nonindustrial countries were well maintained.

World prices of materials generally continued to fall through February 1958, and prices for primary aluminum were reduced at the end of March. In March, however, world prices of some materials appeared to have leveled out. Among the factors tending to check declines were maintenance of overall economic activity in Western Europe at advanced levels and curtailments in output of some materials.

[From the Federal Reserve Bulletin, November 1956]

THE RISE IN PRICES

Renewed advances in industrial output and prices in recent months have accompanied continued strength in demands. Industrial production has reached a new high this autumn, slightly above the advanced level extending from September 1955 through this spring. Increased supplies of some basic materials have permitted further gains in output of producer equipment. Following a reduction in the spring because of curtailments in auto assemblies, production of consumer goods has expanded to new high levels.

Prices of industrial materials and finished goods have been rising since mid-1955 except for an interruption this spring, and wage rates and transportation costs have advanced. In October wholesale prices of industrial commodities averaged 7 percent higher than in mid-1955 and 20 percent higher than before the Korean outbreak in mid-1950. Prices of farm products have strengthened this year, following a steady, substantial decline from the record high of early 1951. In October they were somewhat above a year earlier, but 25 percent below the 1951 peak and 6 percent below mid-1950.

Consumer prices have advanced 2 percent in 1956 and are at a new high. Higher retail prices for foods were responsible for most of the increase during the spring. Rental rates and service costs also have advanced and, with wholesale prices rising again since midyear, prices of various other consumer products have increased.

The current advance in industrial commodity prices is the third sustained rise since World War II. From 1945 to late 1948, prices rose 45 percent. After a small decrease during the 1949 recession, they rose 15 percent from mid-1950 to early 1951. The subsequent decline, confined mainly to materials, was small. After the rise of this autumn, industrial commodities averaged 5 percent above the 1951 peak and 17 percent above the 1948 peak.

The first two postwar advances in prices occurred mainly because of the effects of war. In the first period, Federal price controls were removed and prices responded to the accumulated demands and liquidity of the immediate postwar years. In 1950, hostilities in Korea created fears of renewed shortages and inflation, and both consumers and businesses added to their stocks of goods. At the same time, there was a sharp expansion in orders and outlays for national security programs.

The rise in prices since mid-1955, in contrast, has resulted mainly from influences other than war. While national security expenditures have been large, they have changed little since late 1954 at a level much below the peak of the Korean conflict. Also, business inventory accumulation has been smaller in relation to the size of the economy than in the earlier periods of price advance.

A significant feature of the recent expansion has been the confident attitude of business, labor, and consumers toward longer run economic prospects. This attitude has been reflected in a greater willingness to make commitments for capital expenditures and wage increases for a considerable period ahead.

Workers in steel and other basic industries have received wage advances this year, and pay increases have been widespread in nonindustrial lines of activity. Average rates of pay in nonagricultural lines of activity, exclusive of fringe benefits, were about 7 percent higher in October than in mid-1955, according to a national index. Total employment has expanded further since mid-1955, and total personal income is up 8 percent. Some recently negotiated labor contracts in major industries provide for future as well as current increases in wage rates; they also extend the coverage of automatic wage adjustments based on changes in the Bureau of Labor Statistics Consumer Price Index.

In late October when hostilities broke out in the Middle East, prices of a number of world-traded commodities—such as rubber, tin, and copper—advanced somewhat. The rise in prices was not extended in the days following the immediate reaction. Traffic through the Suez Canal has been interrupted, increasing the time and cost of delivery for some commodities. At the same time, the flow of oil from the Middle East has been affected, and domestic prices for some fuel oils have advanced.

INDUSTRIAL COMMODITIES

The rise of 7 percent in average wholesale prices of industrial commodities since mid-1955 reflects a broad advance. During the economic recovery from mid-1954 to mid-1955, price increases had been selective, affecting mainly some basic materials. After mid-1955, increases extended to steel products, building materials, fuels, paper, and various finished products. During the second quarter of 1956, the general average leveled off and a few materials declined, but subsequently prices of industrial commodities advanced further.

By mid-October 1956, before recently announced advances had been fully reflected in the indexes, prices for about one-third of the leading subgroups of industrial commodities shown in the chart were up 10 percent or more from mid-1955. Prices of iron and steel as a group, including scrap, increased 18 percent, and coal, various building materials, and most types of finished machinery and automotive products were also up 10 percent or more. Heating equipment, petroleum products, paperboard and paper products, and rubber products were up 5 to 10 percent.

Prices of crude rubber, lumber, plywood, and wastepaper, which rose substantially during the 1954–55 recovery and advanced further to early 1956, have since declined to about the mid-1955 level. Other subgroups of commodities that in October were at or below their mid-1955 levels include household appliances, synthetic textiles, crude drugs, and plastic materials.

Capacity and output

The strength of demands has been reflected in capacity operations in many basic manufacturing lines since late 1955, exerting upward pressures on prices and reinforcing claims for higher rates of pay. Gains in output per man-hour accompanied expansion in manufacturing output from mid-1954 to early 1955. Subsequently, however, the rise in productivity leveled off as output approached capacity in many lines, and increases in wage rates tended to be reflected to a greater extent in rising costs.

Since mid-1956 wage rates have been advancing, but output per man-hour apparently has been rising again. As new and improved productive facilities are brought into operation as a result of the large volume of plant and equipment expenditures, further gains in productivity may operate to limit upward pressures on prices.

Pig iron and steel production has been at capacity since late 1955, except for strike interruptions, and steel scrap prices have risen further, to a level three-fourths above mid-1955. Stocks of steel were accumulated early this year, but inventories declined during the strike in July, when steel output dropped to 15 percent of capacity. The rate of capacity utilization in some other basic industries, such as aluminum, cement, and paper, has also been very high.

Capacity and output in these and a few other lines of activity are summarized in the accompanying chart. With the major exception of synthetic fibers, output of the materials included has been near capacity levels in the postwar years, except during the recessions of 1949 and 1954.

Capacity to produce the older types of synthetic fibers overreached requirements by 1953. Before as well as since 1953, cotton supplies have been large. Reflecting ample supplies of fibers and yarns and only moderate growth in demands, upward price pressures have not developed in the important textile-apparel areas.

Wage rates have advanced in textile as well as other industries this year, partly because of the March 1 increase in minimum rates under the Fair Labor Standards Act. When buying of textiles expanded this autumn, prices rose moderately.

Metals and products

Steel prices rose 6 percent in the summer of 1955; further adjustments during the winter lifted prices 9 percent above the mid-1955 level. After settlement of the work stoppage this past summer, wages and other benefits to workers in the steel industry were increased, and prices were raised 6 percent. Contract terms provide for additional increases in wage rates in mid-1957 and mid-1958.

Prices of nonferrous metals, already considerably above their 1954 lows, rose one-fifth further from mid-1955 to the spring of this year. Copper and products, which accounted for most of the increase, have declined sharply since April. Supplies improved this year as capacity expanded and work stoppages reduced output less than in other recent years. Aluminum prices were raised again this summer to a level 17 percent above mid-1955.

The higher prices of metals shown in the chart, together with increases in prices of other materials and fuels and in wage rates, have exerted upward pressures on prices of finished metal products. With demand strong for most types of machinery and equipment, price increases have been general. Moreover, advances in prices of structural steel and other heavy building materials, together with higher wage rates in construction, have increased the cost of improving and expanding industrial facilities. Also, financing costs for plant and equipment have risen.

Competitive pressures have been greater in markets for consumer metal goods than for business equipment, and price changes have been more diverse. In late 1955 factory list prices for newly introduced 1956 model autos were about 5 percent higher than prices for the previous model. With demands for new cars not so strong this spring and summer as a year earlier, prices to consumers apparently were up somewhat less than list prices. Factory prices for the new models being introduced this autumn are about 7 percent higher than a year earlier, and early response to the more extensively redesigned autos is reported strong.

Wholesale prices of household appliances, and also of television and radios, changed relatively little from mid-1955 to this autumn, following earlier declines. Very high levels of output and sales under strongly competitive conditions were accompanied by some reductions in manufacturers' margins. This autumn, however, wholesale prices of a variety of appliances and of television have been raised from 2 to 10 percent.

Wholesale prices of a number of other consumer metal products began to rise in mid-1955, as shown in the chart on the preceding page, and average 5 percent higher by October 1956. Furnaces, hardware, and auto batteries were up 10 percent, and various other products were up from 2 to 10 percent.

FARM PRODUCTS AND FOODS

Farm prices have strengthened this year, following a steady, substantial decline from the peak of early 1951 through 1955. The strengthening has reflected expanding consumer demands for food products, Federal Government programs to stimulate exports, and, to some extent, the soil bank program. Price support levels are higher for some commodities this year, and lower for others.

The influence of further expansion in consumer incomes and demands has been most prominent in livestock markets. Prices rose sharply from the seasonal low of late 1955. In early November 1956 they averaged about 10 percent above a year earlier. Livestock slaughter, which rose 10 percent during 1955, has leveled off. Indications for this winter are that hog marketings will be smaller than a year ago, and that cattle marketings will be about the same.

Output of poultry and eggs has increased further this year, and in October prices were 15 percent lower than a year earlier. Milk production also has increased but, with further growth in population and incomes and with higher Federal support levels, prices of dairy products in October were up 3 percent from a year earlier.

Prices of most crops in October were moderately above those of last season. Feed grains averaged 7 percent higher. Production of feed grains is close to that of a year ago and total supplies, including carryover stocks, are in record volume. However, Federal price support levels are higher.

Prices of fruits and vegetables, including potatoes, averaged about 10 percent higher in October than a year earlier. Nevertheless, they were well below the exceptional peaks reached at midyear when market supplies were limited by earlier unfavorable weather.

Cotton prices in October were 3 percent below a year earlier, largely because Federal support levels are 5 percent lower this season. Stocks of cotton continue very large.

Exports of agricultural commodities have increased this year, due partly to expansion in Government export programs. In the first half of 1956, such programs financed about two-fifths of agricultural exports. Also, Government export prices for cotton were reduced.

Farm land values were at a new high at midyear, 3 percent above a year earlier. The rise reflected stronger prices of farm products as well as the continuing influence of demands for enlarging existing holdings, for investment purposes, and for nonagricultural uses.

CONSUMER GOODS AND SERVICES

Consumer prices have advanced 2 percent since early this year, following more than 2 years of little change in the overall average. Service costs have risen further, and retail prices of foods and various other commodities have advanced.

In 1955 the continuing postwar advance in service costs accelerated. Average prices of nonfood commodities, which had been declining, turned upward after the rise in wholesale prices of industrial commodities began. But food prices declined, as the chart shows.

Retail prices of foods have advanced 4 percent since early this year and are slightly higher than in mid-1955. The greater than seasonal increase in the spring reflected larger consumer demands, higher farm prices, and increased costs of processing and distribution.

Average prices of all items other than foods have advanced 2 percent this year and are 3 percent higher than in mid-1955. For a variety of personal services, and also for rents, rising wage rates have been an important factor in the continuing postwar rise. Increases in productivity tend to be smaller in this area than in the commodity-producing sectors of the economy.

Retail prices of apparel, textile housefurnishings, floor coverings, and new autos rose 2 to 5 percent from mid-1955 to mid-1956. Prices of most household appliances declined substantially, however, as the practice of selling these items below manufacturers' list prices became widespread. Since mid-1956, with manufacturers' prices increased and distributors' margins reduced from those of a year or two ago, retail prices of some appliances have advanced, and prices of apparel, textile housefurnishings, and various other products have increased further.

PRICES DURING THE ECONOMIC EXPANSION

Further expansion in business and consumer demand in the latter part of 1955 was accompanied by increases in industrial output and prices, to new record levels. Industrial production in December, at 144 percent of the 1947–49 average, was 11 percent above a year earlier and 5 percent above the previous high of mid-1953, when defense output was substantially greater.

Average prices of industrial materials advanced 4 percent in the second half of 1955. Prices of finished industrial products also rose, as shown in the chart. Widespread advances among industrial commodities—which together account for about four-fifths of the value of all commodities in the wholesale price index—occur only in response to strong and pervasive pressure of demands. Meanwhile, with marketings of meat animals sharply expanded and with Federal support levels for some important crops reduced, wholesale prices of farm and food products on the average declined 7 percent further in the second half of the year. The combined index of wholesale commodity prices in December was 1 percent above midyear.

While production increased to record highs in the latter part of 1955, the volume of business inventory accumulation was relatively small. Output of a number of industrial materials reached capacity levels and order backlogs accumulated. Increases in the value of inventories have reflected in part the higher level of prices.

High level production with accompanying pressures on prices of basic materials and wage rates has also characterized recent economic activity in Europe. Expansion in outlays, especially for construction, business equipment, and consumer durable goods, has exerted upward pressure on such world commodities as copper and rubber, and has been reflected in sharp increases in the volume of U.S. exports of coal, steel scrap, and steel mill products.

Expansion in consumer buying in the United States has been supported by rising incomes and more active use of credit. Consumer incomes after taxes, which had been maintained during the 1953–54 decline in business activity, began to increase in the autumn of 1954. Since then, fuller utilization of the labor force—in terms of longer hours and increased employment—and higher rates of pay have been reflected in a rise of 10 percent in disposable personal income. Retail sales, which had declined moderately after mid-1953, have expanded about 15 percent from the reduced early 1954 level. The rise in sales has involved a substantial growth in consumer installment credit. At the same time, long-term debt to finance home buying has increased at an unprecedented rate.

With economic activity rising to new record levels, business profits after taxes increased considerably last year, providing both greater incentive and larger means to program substantial increases in investment expenditures. While corporate dividend payments expanded, retained earnings—along with other internal sources of funds—also increased. Common stock prices rose further by about two-fifths in the 12 months ending in late September; after a short but sharp decline, prices recovered by early November and then showed little change to mid-January.

Demands for credit to finance the higher level of business activity as well as to finance consumer short-term credit, mortgages, business capital outlays, and public works projects of State and local governments have been large. The bulk of the credit has been supplied directly or indirectly by nonbank lenders. Business loans of all commercial banks increased by about $5.5 billion during 1955, and total bank loans by about twice that amount. Bank loan expansion, however, was accompanied by substantial sales of U.S. Government securities to nonbank investors. Additional reserves needed by banks were obtained largely through an increase in member-bank borrowings at the Federal Reserve banks.

Pressure of total demands for funds against the available supply of savings and of bank credit was reflected in a substantial rise in short-term interest rates and some increase in long-term rates. In order to exert restraint on member bank borrowing, the Reserve banks raised their discount rates four times during the year, from 1.5 percent to 2.5 percent.

PRICE RISE BROADENS FOR MATERIALS

Economic recovery from mid-1954 to mid-1955 was accompanied by price advances for such basic industrial materials as nonferrous metals, steel scrap, and rubber. Work stoppages at copper mines and increased Federal stockpiling of lead and zinc were factors in the advances, as were rising demands in Europe. Meanwhile, prices of agricultural commodities were being reduced by increased supplies.

After mid-1955 agricultural prices declined considerably further, while the advance in prices of industrial materials accelerated. The rise extended to steel mill products and other manufactured durable materials, and also to fuels, leather, and paper. By early 1956 prices of most nonfood materials were higher than a year earlier, with a number of commodities up 20 percent or more and many others up from 5 to 10 percent. For all industrial materials as a group, the rise over the year was 5 percent.

The broadening of the price rise after mid-1955 was associated with capacity operations in a number of lines of manufacturing activity and further expansion in buying by consumers and businesses. Advances in rates of pay in Government and in such basic industries as autos and steel, and also in transportation and the service industries, were reflected both in rising incomes and in upward pressures on costs. From early 1954 to early 1955, rapid expansion in output per man-hour had accompanied recovery in industrial output. Subsequently, the rise in output per man-hour apparently slackened somewhat.

Prices of sensitive industrial materials eased in late September, but in early November the advance was resumed. Other materials such as cotton goods, industrial alcohol, plywood, and newsprint also advanced at the year-end, and additional general advances in prices of steel products were being discussed in trade circles.

Metals

With output in the consumer durable, business equipment, and construction industries all at advanced levels in 1955, steel production reached capacity levels. Output of other primary metals also was at peak rates. Nevertheless, metals have been in short supply and their price rises have been the largest among industrial commodities. Similarly, increases in wage rates in the metal products industries have exceeded increases in most other sectors. The products of the metal industries account for about one-third of the total value of all commodities at wholesale. Average prices of all primary and scrap metals in mid-December were 15 percent above a year earlier and, as the chart shows, about the same amount above the previous record high in 1953.

Nonferrous metal prices generally showed greater rises than iron and steel and as a group increased 20 percent during the year. Copper was raised four times by major U.S. producers, for a total advance of 40 percent; secondary copper—refined from scrap—rose even more sharply. Prices abroad have been above domestic quotations for the primary metal since the autumn of 1954, and U.S. imports through most of the period have been smaller than in most other postwar periods.

To some extent aluminum has been substituted for copper. This has added to an already heavy demand for aluminum, prices of which were raised 10 percent during 1955. Postponement of deliveries to the Federal strategic stockpile contributed somewhat to a larger market supply of both copper and aluminum during 1955.

Steel output rose one-third from 1954 to 1955. Output in the earlier year had been curtailed as inventories were being liquidated. Steel shipments to the automobile industry rose sharply during the model changeover period in late 1954 and shipments to appliance manufacturers also increased. Demands of other users expanded later, in the spring of 1955, and overall supplies have been tight since then.

Following wage rate increases in mid-1955, steel mill list prices were raised 7 percent. Toward the yearend some additional increases were made in base quotations and a number of upward adjustments were made in charges for extras. During this period purchases of some steel at premium prices by the automobile and some other industries were reported. Capacity steel output and the advanced level of steel scrap exports maintained scrap prices near record levels during the autumn. Prices rose about one-fifth in December and early January as trade reports indicated prospects of continuance of capacity operations in the months ahead.

After mid-December auto assemblies were reduced, mainly by curtailing overtime operations. In November and early December new model car assemblies had been at peak rates, and dealers' stocks were built up rapidly. Since the curtailment, auto producers reportedly have confined their purchases of steel to regular mill channels, discontinuing their premium price purchases. Meanwhile, there has been an accumulation of unsatisfied demands from other metal fabricating industries, particularly those producing machinery and railroad equipment as well as most branches of the heavy construction industry.

Building material prices began to rise in mid-1954, when an extended work stoppage in the northwest lumber industry curtailed output. In the spring and summer of 1955, the rise extended to most other building items, and in mid-December average prices of building materials were 8 percent above the level prevailing from 1951 to mid-1954.

In addition to marked increases in prices of metal materials and products used in construction, lumber and brick prices rose about 10 percent, and cement and glass 6 percent. Wage rates in the building trades advanced 3 percent during 1955 to a level at the year-end 5 percent above mid-1954. In late autumn, prices of lumber declined in some markets. The easing in demands was partly seasonal, however, and toward the year-end prices about recovered.

Total construction activity in the latter part of 1955 was down from the record spring and summer levels but was above any other period. Residential building activity at the year-end was moderately below, while business construction was somewhat above, the spring rates.

Other industrial materials

For most materials other than metals and building items, demands have not expanded so sharply, and supplies—especially those of agricultural origin—have been larger in relation to demands. A major exception is natural rubber.

U.S. rubber consumption in 1955, influenced by the expanded rate of auto output, was one-fourth larger than in 1954, and crude rubber prices rose about two-fifths further during the year. Output of synthetic rubber reached capacity levels last year and synthetic accounted for three-fifths of domestic consumption as compared with about one-half in the preceding year; its price was not increased and at the year-end was about half that of crude rubber.

Growth in demands for paper products and for chemical and petroleum products has been heightened by expanding business activity, and production has increased considerably. Woodpulp prices were raised about 5 percent in early 1955 and demands and prices for wastepaper material rose sharply during the year.

Since mid-1955 prices of packaging materials, fine papers, and newsprint have been increased by amounts ranging up to 10 percent. Prices of chemicals on the average have shown relatively little change, while petroleum and coal products and bituminous coal prices have generally risen since mid-1955.

Prices of hides and skins have advanced from the sharply reduced level prevailing a year ago, despite a further substantial expansion in livestock slaughter. Prices of these raw materials and of leather continue well below the high levels prevailing earlier in the postwar period.

Growth in consumer purchases of textile products in recent years has been much less than that for durable goods and housing. Moreover, inventory demands for textiles during the past year appear to have been smaller than in most other periods of expanding industrial activity. The limited inventory demands may have resulted in part from uncertainty about future levels of Federal price supports for cotton. Actual and potential increases in textile imports also were a restraining influence on inventory demands and prices, especially for cotton goods. Textile output generally remained well below capacity levels. With demands not so strong as in most other manufacturing industries, increases in wage rates were below the average.

Prices of cotton yarns and industrial fabrics increased somewhat in late 1954 and early 1955, while raw wool and yarns declined. Synthetic fabrics declined in the spring, and prices of some of the newer fibers were reduced substantially. During the summer and early autumn foreign raw wool prices dropped and, with direct Federal supports removed, domestic wool prices also declined.

Toward the yearend apparel and carpet wool prices strengthened, prices of cotton yarns increased further, and print cloths and other cotton apparel fabrics advanced. Acetate yarns were raised to 2 to 5 percent, while prices of synthetic fabrics changed little. Increased business demands for textile materials reflected mainly an expansion in consumer purchases of clothing during the autumn months. By the yearend, activity in the apparel, textile, and leather products industries had increased further to relatively high levels.

FARM PRICES DECLINE FURTHER

Despite expansion in industrial activity and in incomes generally, prices of farm commodities declined further after last spring and at the yearend were 7 percent below a year earlier. Supplies of these commodities—including carryovers—increased, and Federal price support levels for wheat, oil seeds, and feed grains other than corn were significantly reduced.

Earlier in the postwar period, prices of farm products had been unusually high in relation to the level of industrial commodity prices. Continued decline from the advanced level of 1951 has resulted in a relationship between farm and industrial price averages more like that in the 1920's and the late 1930's.

The crop harvest, despite more drastic Federal acreage restrictions for several major crops, was 4 percent larger in 1955 than in 1954. Higher yields per acre in some cases more than offset the effects of reduction in acreages, and land diverted from wheat and cotton was devoted largely to the production of feeds. With feed supplies larger and prices lower, output and marketings of livestock expanded considerably, providing a meat supply in the second half of 1955 about one-tenth larger than a year earlier. Average farm prices of meat animals declined about one-fourth. For hogs, the decline in prices was considerably greater than for other meat animals.

Farm prices for wheat, feed grains other than corn, and oilseeds declined during the summer and early autumn to levels about in line with the lower Federal supports. Corn prices fell considerably below supports, which were changed little. Some recovery for corn and other grains toward the yearend was mainly seasonal in nature. Support levels for cotton and tobacco were unchanged last season, and average prices for these and other farm products—milk, eggs, poultry, and fresh fruits and vegetables—have continued relatively stable.

Reductions in Federal support levels for some crops are in prospect for this year, and large carryovers of cotton and grains indicate continued ample supplies. At the end of 1955, however, the pressure of increasing marketings of meat animals was abating seasonally and, with consumer incomes continuing to rise, prices of meats and some other foods were strengthening. While marketings will rise seasonally again in the spring, the large year-to-year increases of 1953 and 1955 are unlikely.

PRICES OF FINISHED PRODUCTS RISE

With the marked increase in steel prices in mid-1955, the broadening of the price advance to other materials, and increases in business costs, further expansion in demands in the second half of 1955 was accompanied by a rise of 3 percent in average wholesale prices of finished industrial products. The most general advances were in prices of business equipment.

When steel prices were raised 3 percent in mid-1954, machinery prices were generally unchanged, but small price advances occurred later in the year as demands increased. Early in 1955 uncertainty over the extent of increases in demands for electrical equipment resulted in reports of marked price concessions. Since then, however, an advance of about 5 percent in list prices has been general for machinery, including agricultural equipment which had been stable since early 1951.

Changes in wholesale prices of consumer products have been more diverse, partly because of the importance of such nondurable goods as clothing, textile housefurnishings, and chemical products. Prices of tires and other rubber products rose early in 1955 as rubber prices increased. During the spring furniture and carpets were advanced, while refrigerators, stoves, and washing machines declined somewhat.

In recent months, price increases have predominated. While there have been additional decreases in factory list prices for appliances, prices of tires, furniture, and carpets have been increased again. Other consumer durables, including autos, auto repair parts, television sets, and silverware have been raised by varying amounts. Prices of shoes, fuel oil, paints, and some other nondurable goods have also been increased. With productive capacity relatively ample, competitive influences have remained strong in markets for finished consumer goods. This has tended to moderate, but not prevent, increases in wholesale prices.

CONSUMER PRICES TEND HIGHER

Rising wholesale prices and increases in business costs since mid-1955 have exerted upward pressure on retail prices of nonfood commodities and on consumer services. Through the first half of the year, when average wholesale list prices of nonfood commodities were stable, retail prices declined. These declines at retail reflected mainly the spreading of discount selling of appliances, television, and some other goods.

Retail prices tended higher after midyear, when wholesale prices of a variety of consumer products were raised. At the same time, competitive pressures remained strong and prices of refrigerators and some other appliances declined further. During the summer, retail prices of autos, both new and used, declined seasonally as introduction of 1956 models approached. With introduction of the higher priced new models in the autumn, retail list prices for new autos were raised about 5 percent. Discounts and other concessions in auto markets have been larger, however, than at this time a year ago.

Demands for foods have grown over the past year, although apparently less in relation to increases in incomes than in other periods. Retail meat prices declined sharply further in the autumn, but the decrease was considerably smaller than that for farm prices of meat animals. Marketing costs, which account for a considerable part of the price of meat to consumers, have increased. Retail prices of other foods on the average have changed little since last spring.

Prices of consumer services rose further in 1955. Such important services as medical care, laundry, and dry cleaning increased at an accelerated rate and in December averaged about 3 percent above a year earlier, as compared with an increase of 1 percent in 1954. Home and auto repairs also rose. The postwar advance in rents continued at the slackened rate of 1954. At the yearend, the average level of all consumer prices was slightly above both mid-1955 and December 1954.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, an interesting and extremely informative analysis of this whole controversy was carried in the Washington Post this morning in an article by Bernard Nossiter. Mr. Nossiter clarifies and sharpens the controversy. He also raises the question of whether this kind of inflation may be a necessary price for adequate incentive and the growth of our capital industries.

I ask unanimous consent that his article be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INFLATION BESETTING US IS OF A NEW BREED

(By Bernard D. Nossiter)

A pioneering approach to the peculiar price inflation that marked our recent past is embodied in the strange-looking charts.

(Charts are omitted in the RECORD.)

They were put together by Gardiner C. Means, of Vienna, Va., a distinguished but lonely economist. He held a slew of Government posts in New Deal days and was recently an adviser to a relatively sophisticated business group, the Committee for Economic Development. Twenty-seven years ago Means rocked economic thinking when he and Adolf A. Berle wrote "The Modern Corporation and Private Property."

What the Means charts show is that contemporary inflation is a very different animal from the classical demand inflation. The chief difference lies in whether big price increases come in competitive or concentrated industries.

In other words, what Means has done is violate a sacred taboo of economic thinking. He has actually gone and looked at where the price increases are taking place and asked whether the differences over separate periods of time aren't meaningful.

To compound his sins, he has married economic theory to economic fact. And as everybody in the business knows, the gulf between the "institutionalists" (fact men) and theoreticians is as wide as the breach between Montagues and Capulets.

Classical inflation is pictured in the top chart, covering the war and immediate postwar years. This was a money phenomenon, an increase in money demand which was not offset by an equivalent increase in goods—what Federal Reserve Board Chairman William McChesney Martin likes to call "too much money chasing too few goods."

In drastically oversimplified form, this is what happened:

The staggering war expenses were paid by the Government through borrowing (deficit financing). To the extent that the Government borrowed (sold bonds) to commercial banks, the Government was simply printing money. The goods this money bought were shot off, exploded, dropped on cities or left to rot in military warehouses. So, when controls came off, the extra money in the hands of people and businesses bid up prices much more than it induced increased production. Even with the best will in the world, increased production could not come about quickly enough because resources of men and materials were almost fully employed—too much money was chasing too few goods.

According to Means' charts, the biggest price increases came in the highly competitive industries—lumber, farm products, processed foods, textiles. In these, producers can't control their prices which are set by those impersonal market forces so dear to Adam Smith.

But the concentrated industries with few producers—steel, autos, aluminum, electrical machinery—held back. They do have considerable discretion over price and didn't take full advantage of the big increase in money demand.

Now, the new inflation presents a different picture. All the price push comes from the concentrated industries. The competitive industries in several cases cut prices—textiles, farm products, miscellaneous. And there is a logic in this. The period under study, 1953 to October 1958 (the last month for which Means got data), was a time of much less than full employment. The period spans two recessions (1953–54 and 1957–58). The money supply did not zoom upward.

So, only industries who need not rely on impersonal market forces but have considerable control over their prices could make increases stick. And the charts show that they did.

Many economists will quarrel with Means' interpretation of his charts. They will contend that the ability to administer prices has nothing to do with whether an industry is competitive or concentrated. They will argue that all Means is showing in his new inflation chart is what you would expect in a period of investment boom—and the Nation certainly was enjoying one from 1955 through 1957—steeply rising prices in steel and other producer goods industries as the result of extra demand for producer goods.

This debate can't be settled in this space or anywhere else now because relatively little is still known about administered prices, or for that matter, concentration.

Let's take a closer look at the charts. The solid black bars are industries or industry groups which are highly concentrated—a handful of producers account for most of their production. The cross-hatched bars are mixed concentrated and competitive—chemicals, furniture, and the like. The light gray bars are the competitive industries with thousands of producers, no one of them big enough to affect prevailing prices or production.

The bars are two dimensional, but that's not as scary as it sounds. The height of each bar measures the percentage of price increase or decrease at wholesale in each industry. For example, in the bottom chart, steel prices went up 36 percent between 1953 and October 1958; farm products prices went down 5 percent.

The width of each bar measures the industry's weight in the wholesale price index—that is, the amount of sales of that industry in relation to the amount of sales of the other industries. If steel sales during 1953–October 1958 were $8 billion and farm products sales were $24 billion, then the farm products bar would be three times wider than the steel bar.

The height of any bar times its width is its area. In these charts, the height (price increase) times width (economic weight) gives a graphic picture of the economic impact of each industry on the price level. In other words, the area of each bar shows how much force each industry or industry group had on the price level.

We can see very quickly that the competitive industries accounted for almost all the pull in the war period. There is much more light gray than black in this picture.

But in the recent period, the push comes from the concentrated industries. Means figures that they account for 85 percent of the gross increase in the wholesale index. If they had not gone up in price, the wholesale index would have risen less than 1 percent instead of 8 percent. And this is what you would expect during a period when total output of goods is increasing little and so is the money supply.

There is one other point to note. In the bottom chart, Means has broken out steel and fabricated steel from the broad category of metal and metal products. He did this to demonstrate the overwhelming force of the steel and steel-using industries (machinery and motive) in pushing up recent prices.

While Means appears to have demonstrated that the new inflation stems from the concentrated industries, he still has not answered the question agitating political debate: Is it the unions or is it the corporations?

Is it Roger Blough's United States Steel, Frederick Donner's General Motors, Ralph Cordiner's General Electric? Or is it David McDonald's United Steelworkers, Walter Reuther's United Auto Workers, James Carey's International Union of Electrical Workers? Or, have both sides embarked on an unspoken wage-price or price-wage collaboration?

The charts are of no help here. But Means, who prepared his material for the Senate Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittees, went back into the committee's steel hearings for some arithmetic. After lengthy calculations, based on a series of arguable assumptions, he concluded that labor costs per ton went up $1.75 during 1956–57; prices went up $11 a ton.

This would appear to make United States Steel, the industry's price leader, the chief culprit. However, it must be repeated that Means' computation is derived from assumptions which can be debated. At best, his conclusion is suggestive.

Who are these concentrated steel and steel-using industries? They can be reduced to 10 corporations. In terms of ingot capacity, steel is United States Steel, 29 percent; Bethlehem, 16 percent; and Republic, 9 percent.

The motive end of the machinery and motive category is: General Motors, 51 percent of 1958 auto production; Ford, 29 percent; and Chrysler, 14 percent.

The machinery end is tremendously complicated by definitions. But electrical machinery is General Electric (owned 16 percent of the industry's assets in 1947, the last data year); Westinghouse, 13 percent; Western Electric Co., an American Telephone & Telegraph subsidiary, 13 percent; and Radio Corp. of America, 6 percent.

Some policy implications flowing from Means' analysis were spelled out by Chairman ESTES KEFAUVER, Democrat, of Tennessee, of the Senate subcommittee. If Means is right, then:

A tight-money policy won't hold down prices without bringing on a recession because corporate giants are the least affected by a shortage of lendable funds. They raise their expansion money largely from profits, not borrowing.

A balanced Federal Budget is irrelevant because this is not a money, but an "administered price" inflation.

To be sure, easy money and unbalanced budgets would, according to anybody's analysis, worsen the situation by piling a money inflation on top of an "administered price" inflation.

(However, a minority group of economists headed by Leon Keyserling paradoxically argues that easy money and budget deficits will stimulate an offsetting amount of extra production when, as now, men and resources are not fully employed.)

But what Means is really saying is that some new institutional devices must be invented to control concentrated industries and/or their unions if price stability is to be achieved.

What form the new devices should take might well be on the agenda of Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON'S new Cabinet committee on inflation and the massive congressional study Majority Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON, Democrat, of Texas, once proposed for the Joint Economic Committee.

NOW THE CHALLENGE OF AN ECONOMIC SPUTNIK

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the lead article in yesterday's New York Times magazine was a masterpiece of economic analysis of the big problem: How can this great free country of ours meet the onrushing challenge of the Soviet Union's soaring economic power?

Barbara Ward writes a wise, balanced, and inspiring answer. She recognizes, for instance, the problem of inflation, as well as the military and educational challenge.

She makes specific suggestions for legislation that should have the attention of every Member of this body. For this reason, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the body of the RECORD, as follows:

NOW THE CHALLENGE OF AN ECONOMIC SPUTNIK

(By Barbara Ward)

It is as well to be quite clear about the new challenge thrown down to the Western Powers by Mr. Khrushchev in his address to the recent Soviet Communist Party Congress. The West will have to live with it day in, day out for the next decade and it will be rubbed home with every possible insistence of propaganda. Mr. Khrushchev claims that the U.S.S.R.'s national income can be made to increase each year by more than 6 percent—not only in the early stages of industrialization but as a permanent feature of the Soviet economy. The normal

Western pace, over most of a century of industrialization, has never gone much beyond 3 percent, and for long periods (as was the case with France between the wars) some Western countries have stopped growing altogether.

This, then, is a first challenge—the claim that the Soviets can maintain double or more the Western pace of growth. When all allowances are made for the obstacles before them—a labor force depleted by the low wartime birth rate, the tremendous capital needed, the Soviet people's preference for spending, not saving, after 40 years of perpetual crisis—there seems no doubt, on past performance, that something very close to Mr. Khrushchev's rate will be achieved.

And how will it be achieved? This brings us to a second challenge—the Soviet contention that when government is the chief planner, designer and controller of an economy, the economy becomes, inevitably and inexorably, not only more powerful than a free economy but more expansive and more productive as well. To all nations facing the problems of early industrialization, the Communists say: "Use our model. You will get there more quickly." To the advanced nations, they say: "We shall surpass you within a decade because our method works better than yours on the long haul as well."

The first question the Western nations have to answer is whether in fact a higher rate of economic growth is really necessary. There is, after all, no self-evident virtue about a 6 percent as opposed to a 3 percent rate of growth. If a family has an income of $20,000 a year it should in all sanity be content with a smaller increase than a family with only $2,000. There is the story of the old lady who sought a divorce after 46 years of marriage and who, when the judge asked her whether after so long a union she could not last out to the golden wedding, replied sharply, "Judge, enough is enough."

So it is with the paraphernalia of a high material standard of living. A nation as wealthy, say, as America, does not necessarily need to increase its wealth as sharply as the still poverty-stricken U.S.S.R. In fact, there are times when Soviet propagandists appear to fall into the crassest attitudes of Western advertising men and to suggest that the good life is merely a multiplication of material possessions. Some of the Western nations are at least within sight of enough prosperity to enable them to see through that fallacy. Mr. Khrushchev should not be allowed for 1 hour to get away with the idea that two cars in every garage, achieved by ferocious work, dragooning and state direction, compensate in any way for the loss of political liberty, free thought and personal self-determination.

Equally, however, Western economies cannot make a fetish out of a 3 percent rate of growth, if real, demonstrable human needs call for a higher rate; and there seems little doubt that such needs exist. There is not much use in proclaiming the superiority of the Western way of life if its essential foundation—national security—is in danger.

For the last 8 years the Western Powers have been devoting what they could afford to their defenses and giving real priority to other things—to a balanced budget or popular consumption or domestic investment. Their inferiority in overall armament is a fact and their reliance—for such budgetary considerations as "more bangs for a buck"—on atomic weapons threatens to leave them unequipped to deal with small wars or local violence. There is no secret about all this. The richest nations in the world cannot "afford" to pull level with a still relatively underdeveloped Communist bloc. Here, clearly, is the first argument for larger resources.

Virtually all Western nations devote less of their national incomes to education than does Russia—the United States perhaps half as much. None apparently foresaw in time the postwar explosion of population. The needs of schools have come before Congress again and again in recent years. The outcome—mainly student loans—is a step forward but leaves unsolved such urgent needs as more schoolrooms and higher salaries for teachers.

In Russia the priority given to education has enabled the country not only to leap forward from illiteracy in 40 years but to produce in absolute terms more scientists, engineers and technicians than the West. Once more, then, the need for the West to aim at a larger national income—in this case to cover increased educational costs—is a matter of simple demonstration.

The Russians devote proportionately more of their resources to research and the results have circled and soared above a surprised globe for more than a year. When Sir John Cockcroft, one of the leaders of atomic research in Britain—a country hitherto preeminent in basic research—returned recently from Russia, he warned his country that the Soviets were ahead in all fields of research and were advancing on a much broader scientific front. Thus, more resources for basic research, more emphasis upon fundamental work, are necessary in the West and create one more unsatisfied claim on national income.

It is also highly likely that in the next decade the Russians will pull ahead of the West in the giving of foreign aid. They entered the field in 1955, and, aside from their Chinese program, have contributed about $2 billion in the last few years. This is still not more than a quarter of Western economic (as opposed to military) aid over the same period. But the offers are growing and neither budgetary nor popular impediments will prevent their growing further. The Western Powers will thus meet enhanced economic competition and must face again the question whether to expand their own programs and resources or lose by default.

All these matters—arms, aid, education, research—turn directly upon the fundamental issue of national security. To allow the Communists to pull ahead in all these fields could mean that one day the Western Powers will awake to a world in which they no longer have the political elbow room, the military striking power, or the scientific know-how to contain the Soviet threat. This outcome is, of course, only a possibility but it is a possibility writ large in any continued neglect of basic national security. At no time in history have nations been granted the privilege of defending themselves both successfully and also at a level they think they can afford. There is no reason to suppose that history has obligingly reversed itself for the benefit of the West.

Nor are the needs of security the only argument for a higher rate of expansion. In some Western countries—the United States, notably, and also in European nations such as France and the Netherlands—the rising birth rate demands a proportionate acceleration of production. While the American national income has stagnated for nearly 2 years, some 6 million more Americans have appeared to share it.

And the rising birth rate underlines another problem. The basic capital equipment of an aging or static population—in terms of schools, cities, hospitals, water supplies and so forth—can perhaps remain aging or static without too much loss of amenity. But the United States is adding the equivalent of a city about the size of Philadelphia to its population every year and the capital equipment needed for this bounding growth is simply not being provided.

According to recent estimates, American spending on basic social needs—schools, urban development, water—falls short each year by some $9 billion. The figure tends to rise each year as more schools, houses and hospitals fall into obsolescence and urban blight spreads to more city districts. All over America, water, a fundamental of existence, becomes more of a problem as water levels fall and wells dry up. Bright new cars in sordid streets, ranch-type or split-level homes beside garbage-filled gutters, the family picnic basket in chromium beside the polluted stream—these are symbols of a national pattern of expenditure in desperate need of redress.

But how can it be achieved save with a higher rate of national growth? People will not sacrifice the new car or the picnic basket. There can be little question, considering the national temper, of higher direct taxation to insure a bigger transfer from private to public needs. Larger resources are the only real alternative.

However, in America the most urgent need for greater resources—the grinding fact of extreme poverty—has been largely overcome. There are pockets of poverty, the more challenging because of the surrounding prosperity. But there is not the pitifully low general standard of all southeastern Europe, for instance. Nor is there the almost universal destitution of Asia and tribal Africa. In the underdeveloped lands, the growth of resources is a simple condition of survival and any system that offers a shortcut has the chief key to political effectiveness in those areas. Throughout most of the world, in short, the battle lines for the minds of men lie through national income figures and the statistics of production.

If all these demonstrable needs are put together—for greater security, for more research, for higher spending in the public sector, for rising standards of living, and for more income to meet rising population all around the world—there can be no doubt at all that the Western rate of normal growth of 3 percent to 4 percent a year is too low and that the first decision of domestic policy in the Atlantic world should be to increase the rate to, say, a steady 5 percent.

It is at this point that the West confronts the second element in the Soviet challenge. No one questions the fact that the maintenance of a higher rate of growth involves some increase in government activity. Only government has sufficient breadth of oversight to draw up the broad production targets needed to speed up growth. And once accelerated growth has begun, it is with government that the chief instruments lie for checking strong inflationary pressures generated by the increased use of all resources—manpower, capital, raw materials.

Yet in the United States, the central citadel of the Western World, there is a dedicated, influential, and vocal school of thought that believes any extension of government activity to be the equivalent of socialism; there is also enough widespread distrust of state action to make this school of thought widely listened to and respected. At times, one is almost reminded of the argument which raged in Europe at the time of Hitler's mounting threat. Then there were serious and responsible leaders who argued that the armament needed to counter Hitlerism would entail government intervention; government intervention entailed dictatorship; it was therefore useless to fight dictatorship by adopting its methods. The argument prevailed long enough to put the whole world in jeopardy before Hitler's rising power.

Similarly today, in the face of all the evidence of rising Soviet strength, the argument is to be heard in America: Government activity to increase our growth equals socialism; socialism equals communism; so how can we counter communism by methods that make Communists of us, too? We cannot defend the free way of life by means that destroy freedom.

Is the West, then, impaled on an inescapable dilemma: Either to lose to the Communists by falling behind in the economic race, or to lose by adopting their measures?

Happily, the outlook is not so dire. Indeed, only in America is there quite so ideological a terror of Government activity or of Government ability to help shape the broad pattern of economic development in a community. It is hard to argue that Britain is less essentially free than America; yet a Conservative Government there cheerfully discusses the scale of public and private investment that is needed to double the standard of living in a generation.

The architects of Europe's Common Market are probably the foremost exponents of really free (as opposed to tariff-protected) enterprise in the world today. Yet a European Development Fund and careful forecasts of Europe's capital needs have been an essential part of their preparations. France's Monnet plan for accelerated public investment gave French private industry its first real boost in more than 20 years. And so the examples multiply.

But perhaps the decisive argument is that in postwar Europe, where every government has in some measure planned and guided the pattern of investment (quite apart from basing all recovery on that most successful of all plans, the Marshall plan), doctrinaire socialism has quietly deceased. "Public ownership of the means of production"—the one plank socialism once had in common with communism—has been explicitly or tacitly abandoned; and one reason for this is the success with which governments have used their powers to maintain investment, avoid recessions and keep their economies buoyant.

There is no reason in actual fact to suppose that, if they added to their responsibilities the task of increasing the rate of growth, socialism would result. On the contrary, a more rapid rise in resources would wipe out those corners of disgruntled poverty where communism can still breed.

But, the critics argue, the issue is not simply that of fixing higher targets of production. What of their repercussions throughout the economy in terms of the new inflation? If government intervenes to check it, its control will spread, octopuslike, throughout private business and there we shall all be back on the high road to socialism.

One thing, however, is certain. More thinking has to be done in the free economies about the issue of inflation. The postwar idea that reliance can be put on monetary controls alone needs modification. In the last 2 years, the American economy—and the British, too, for that matter—has endured both heavy increases in the cost of credit (the basic monetary control) and a complete stop to upward expansion. The only trouble is that price inflation has gone steadily on in America and continues to hover over the British experiment. In other words, the technique of checking production in order to stop inflation—the most drastic and dangerous cure conceivable in the face of Russia's rising production—does not cure at all. Inflation goes on. New thinking is thus in order.

Nor will control lead to anything remotely resembling socialism. The challenge is to keep some check on the claims made on the economy while more capital is being used for expansion—for arms, research, education, higher investment, and public needs—and not for immediate consumption. The checks can be achieved by more taxation to restrain personal consumption (by far the largest sector of the economy) and by postponing increases in personal consumption through some restraint on the growth of wages and profits.

In countries such as America and Britain, the income tax has probably reached its limits, but in both countries wealth is sufficiently widespread for there to be no great injustice in considering an increase in indirect taxation. In spite of its people's present poverty, the Soviet Union paradoxically relies overwhelmingly on a turnover or indirect tax for its capital accumulation.

Some restraint on profits and wages does not necessarily involve drastic State intervention, provided the awareness and responsibility of management and labor are seriously engaged. Wage restraint was achieved voluntarily in Germany, for instance, after 1948. It is surely not inconceivable that, in the light of the Soviet challenge, industry itself should come up with some suggestions of its own on methods of expanding to meet the challenge and of holding inflation in check meanwhile.

But it is not impossible for governments to use fiscal encouragements to the same end—for example, by taxing more heavily any higher rate of distributed profit, giving tax relief to firms which use rising profits to reduce prices, and by offering tax inducements to trade unionists who agree to long-term—say, 5-year—wage agreements, with a heavy emphasis on deferred benefits which maintain standards in sickness and old age. Nor are punitive measures impossible—fines, for instance, imposed on any firm which increases its prices within 9 months of granting a wage increase.

What is surely inconceivable is that patriotic managers and labor leaders, faced with the national necessity of a higher growth rate in the economy, should not use their intelligence, their leadership and their responsibility to devise ways and means of cooperating in an effort which not only involves the security of the whole Nation but which must, sooner rather than later, involve higher standards of wealth for them as well.

One hears much talk of business leadership. The Russian challenge is offered in what ought to be that leadership's chosen field—the field of increased production. If the only response is a dismal cry that socialism is the danger, then doubtless the Soviets will win the race—with far more incalculable consequences for the free economy than any timely efforts now to put it in a posture of greater growth.

If, on the other hand, by effective measures adopted in time, the free economies of the West keep their economic lead, strengthen their defenses, pull the underdeveloped lands forward in the wake of their own expansion and all the while preserve the institutions and the spirit of freedom, one can predict with some certainty that they will in their turn present a challenge to Russia which the Soviet system will be totally unable to resist.

Already the great country is astir with query and curiosity and with a deep desire to know more about the West. But these burgeoning questions are checked by triumphant comparisons between Soviet growth and Western stagnation. Suppose it were not so. Suppose, decade after decade, the West continued to grow under the institutions of freedom. Russia's last argument that tyranny and abundance must go together would be struck away. And with that argument could vanish the greatest obstacle to the spread of Western institutions back into Russia itself. These are the stakes. Can anyone doubt they are worth a supreme effort in the West?

THIRTY-EIGHTH ANNIVERSARY OF REBELLION OF ARMENIAN PEOPLE AGAINST COMMUNIST RUSSIAN TYRANNY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, February 18 marks the 38th anniversary of the gallant and temporarily successful rebellion of the Armenian people against Communist Russian tyranny. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article I have prepared on this subject for the Hairenik Weekly Journal.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Wednesday, February 18, marks the 38th anniversary of the first and one of the most epochal struggles against tyranny that the world has ever seen. It is, at once, an inspiration to the spirit and a sad memory gnawing at the conscience of free peoples everywhere.

The year was 1921. The shadow of international communism had begun to fall across the face of two continents. Some nations were already in the grip of Red terror and suppression. Freedom was racking up an unbroken string of losses on the scoreboard of the world.

Then, on February 18, in the city of Erivan in the nation of Armenia, freedom struck its first blow at Red might. City dwellers and peasants had become outraged at Communist excesses across their land and the wholesale slaughter of political prisoners. Arming themselves as best they could, they rose up and broke the back of Red control, driving Soviet military forces from their country.

The independent Republic of Armenia was established and Prime Minister Simon Vratzian appealed to the free world for help in preserving the integrity of his country.

But, unfortunately, as in the case of Hungary's valiant freedom fighters nearly 36 years later, the free world hesitated until the time for action had passed. After six hard-won months of freedom, the single beacon in the spreading darkness was snuffed out by overwhelming Soviet forces.

The blood men spill in the cause of liberty is never wasted—never shed in vain. Armenia's fight for freedom takes its proper place with the very bravest and noblest struggles of recorded history, including our own revolution, and stands as a symbol of the sacrifice we and all free peoples must stand ready to make to preserve our heritage.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT TO 10:30 A.M., THURSDAY

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if no other Senators wish to address the Senate, I move that the Senate stand in adjournment, under the order previously entered, until 10:30 o'clock a.m. on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 31 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, under the order previously entered, until Thursday, February 12, 1959, at 10:30 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Denson N. Franklin, pastor, First Methodist Church, Gadsden, Ala., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, the father of men everywhere—glory, honor, dominion, and power be unto Thee forever and ever.

We come confessing our weaknesses and failures. As a wise teacher has said—"We have learned to fly through the air like birds and to swim under the sea like fish—but we haven't learned to walk the earth like men." Teach us to walk like men—sons and daughters of a Divine God—in dedication, faith, and service.

Bless this great Nation which Thou hast fashioned on these shores of freedom. As Thou didst lead the children of Israel with a "pillar of fire by night and a cloud of smoke by day"—lead us. Be Thou a "lamp unto our feet and a light unto our path."

Bless this great legislative body with wisdom and courage. As America faces increasing responsibility in world leadership, may the decisions of these Thy servants be according to thy will.

In the name of our Lord we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, February 5, 1959, was read and approved.

NATIONAL DEBT REDUCTION

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a concurrent resolution expressing the sense of Congress that a systematic plan of national debt reduction be entered into, and I am including in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some very revealing figures in this connection.

These figures established that it is cheaper to pay the debt than to owe it. They show how embarking upon such a course and retiring the national debt in 100 years with payments on the principal of $2.8 billion annually will actually save future taxpayers a sum in excess of $485 billion. In other words, it is more than $485 billion cheaper to pay off the debt in 100 years than simply to continue paying interest alone on the present debt for that period of time.

Mr. Speaker, I request the serious consideration of the Members of the House in connection with these figures which will appear in today's RECORD and their support for this resolution.

IN THE SPIRIT OF LINCOLN

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, it is most appropriate that the inauguration of Romulo Betancourt as President of Venezuela falls so near the 150th anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln. Lincoln is loved and honored in Latin America as in the United States for his humanity and his democracy.

Our policies toward Latin America are improving. They have to improve. A learned United Press International specialist in Latin American affairs returned last week from 7 weeks in that area. "Anti-Americanism has never been so strong," he told me.

Dr. Milton Eisenhower's report, approved enthusiastically by his brother, the President, needs implementation without delay. I doubt that we can wait until 1960. Our neighbors to the south need to understand our sympathy for them in their struggle for freedom and a higher standard of living for their peoples.

These countries need loans and technical assistance. They need respect and friendship. They need to understand that democracy does not come easily or automatically with the overthrow of a dictator. Many of our neighbors in Latin America need to be awakened to the menace of communism as another form of the dictatorships they despise, a form which could not be so easily overthrown because of the help Soviet Russia would give, just as is done in Hungary and other so-called satellite nations.

Our reliance is in the love of liberty which God has planted in our bosoms.

Said Lincoln 101 years ago—

Our defense is in the preservation of the spirit which prizes liberty as the heritage of all men, in all lands, everywhere.

On Friday of this week in Venezuela liberty in Venezuela strides ahead when her duly elected democratic President, Romula Betancourt, is inaugurated in Caracas. In the spirit of Lincoln, we rejoice with Venezuela.

GRANITE CITY, ILL., AN ALL-AMERICAN COMMUNITY

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, Granite City, one of the cities in the district I have the honor to represent, the 24th District of Illinois, recently was chosen by Look as one of that magazine's "All-American" communities.

With the permission of the House, I should like to insert an editorial from the Collinsville (Ill.) Herald as typical of many comments that have been published in newspapers of the State. I should like also to say something about the importance of the recognition that has come to the citizens of Granite City.

Many Members of the House may not be familiar, at first hand, with the problems and opportunities that today confront a community like Granite City.

Along the eastern side of the Mississippi River, we are an industrial people. There are refineries, steel mills, mines, railroad yards in which the citizens of the 24th District labor and earn their living. We have agricultural areas also, and the needs of the farmers in southern Illinois are very much the same as those of farmers elsewhere. We have businessmen who manage large corporations and branches of corporations. We have labor unions. We have the pressing problems that are familiar in nearly all cities—air pollution, crowded central streets, urban decay.

Mr. Speaker, if I may make the point, the 24th District of Illinois seems to me to represent very accurately the face of the Nation. There is a group of citizens, concentrated in a relatively small space, well aware of what their problems are, and deeply committed to doing something about the problems.

We have, within the limits that have been allowed by a chopped-down Federal budget, many projects for urban redevelopment. We have traffic-improvement programs, schools where we are seeking to pay our teachers something close to a living salary. We are seeking to eradicate our slums, to build better cities.

One of the contributions of Granite City that led to its being named an all-American city was its record in peaceful industrial relations.

There have been conflicts in the past. But neither the businessmen nor the working people in unions found much happiness in controversy and turmoil. It was decided that ways and means would be sought to make conflicts less likely. The search has been successful.

We are looking forward. We are working together toward desirable objectives. I bespeak for all our hundreds of thousands of citizens the recognition of this House and of the Congress of the United States.

We need certain aids and assistance that only the Congress can provide, but we are abundantly willing and able to carry our share of the load and to initiate the local projects that show good faith.

I congratulate the people of Granite City, the businessmen and the civic leaders and the working people and their leaders on the recognition they have gained. Under unanimous consent I insert the editorial from the Collinsville (Ill.) Herald to which I previously referred:

CONGRATULATIONS, GRANITE CITY

The Collinsville Herald is happy to extend congratulations from the entire city of Collinsville to our good neighbor, Granite City.

We had the story of Granite City's selection as 1 of the 11 all-American cities in our office last Wednesday morning, but respected the release date on the story provided by the Granite City Press Record. Since the Press-Record's contributions to Granite City's achievement were substantial, this was only right, even if it were not a newspaper courtesy which all papers are supposed to follow.

There may be some who will wonder why anyone should make a to-do over such a selection. A cynic might say "So what?"

Such selections nationwide undoubtedly have precious little part in creating the incidents and movements which bring about the award. For instance, nobody involved in the labor-peace agreement which was part of the record on which Granite City based its claim, entered into that agreement with a notion of getting an award for Granite City. As a matter of fact, although it looms large in Granite City because Granite City is a labor town, it spreads over other cities in the area.

But pinning the label on Granite City may have a very real and desirable effect for the future.

When some big task is proposed, some mighty project is called for, some job is proposed which will strain the good people of Granite City to the utmost, they will be more inclined to say "we can," rather than "it's too big for us." When some unworthy compromise of principle and justice seems the easiest way out, Granite City people will now be more inclined to say "No, sir. An all-American city can't let itself down."

So Granite City may become a better city because it is recognized as a good city.

Our so-what cynic may still be inclined to say "So what?" Perhaps he is the kind who can see nothing good without a price tag on it. All right, this award is certainly one which stands to pay off handsomely in dollars and cents.

The publicity was worth thousands, in fact it is the kind of publicity you couldn't buy by spending thousands. When a Granite City committee talks to a manufacturer from now on, he won't say "Where is Granite City and what kind of place is it?" He will say, "Oh, yes, that was one of those all-American cities, the kind of place we want to locate."

Finally, every Granite City citizen can hold his head higher, face the world a little more firmly and proudly. That's worth something.

We respectfully tip our hat to Granite City, all-American.

VETERANS' HOUSING BILL

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, on February 4, the House passed H.R. 2256, the veterans' housing bill.

Unfortunately, prior to Wednesday, February 4, I returned to my district to survey the great damage caused by the recent floods there. Following this survey, and while preparing to return to Washington to vote on H.R. 2256, a death in the family occurred which made it impossible for me to return to the Capitol in time to vote on the veterans' housing bill.

As a veteran of World War II, and a strong supporter of veterans' legislation, I have long regretted that more adequate financing was not available to the veteran to aid him in securing a home for himself. It had been my sincere hope that such funds would become available without the necessity of increasing the interest rate on these loans. But, apparently, it is impossible for the veterans to secure financial assistance unless the offer is made more attractive. Since this appears to have been the only way to aid the veterans in securing adequate financial assistance for housing, if I had been present on February 4, I would have voted against the motion to recommit H.R. 2256 and for the bill's final passage.

NEW LEGISLATION TO SAVE ALASKA SALMON RESOURCES FROM DESTRUCTION

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced a new bill to deal with high seas conservation of salmon spawned in American streams of the North Pacific coast.

Last year the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee favorably reported a somewhat similar bill of mine to protect our salmon from indiscriminate and uncontrolled net fishing in the North Pacific but at my request it was not called up for House consideration.

I hoped that during the following summer or fall, based on latest research, the Japanese would voluntarily agree to restrict their fishing operations as they are morally bound to do under the International Convention for the High Seas Fisheries of the North Pacific Ocean. I thought legislation might not be necessary.

Now, however, I have a better bill which not only in its drafting is technically improved but also includes a new provision to make the law inoperative if the fishing activities of foreign nationals are deemed not to be adversely affecting conservation of our runs of salmon.

On previous occasions I have pointed out—but for the information of new House Members I reiterate—the States of Washington, Oregon, and California, by legislative enactment, have prohibited the use of nets in fishing for salmon in international waters of the North Pacific Ocean in order to preserve salmon of American origin from destruction. Canada, likewise, prohibits her fishermen from using nets in the interest of conservation.

Our American fishermen by regulation have suffered severe restrictions in the interest of preserving our fishery resources.

My bill seeks to discourage nationals of other countries from using fishing means, methods, and practices denied to our own citizens. It provides that after September 1, 1959, it shall be unlawful to import for sale within the United States salmon of any country which permits taking such fish by nets in the North Pacific at times and places where occur large quantities of immature salmon of North American origin or intermingled North American salmon runs.

The bill is designed to disallow sale in our American market of the products of nations which disregard and obstruct conservation and control of these fishery resources.

The Japanese started a high-seas fishery for salmon in the North Pacific in 1952. This first year's fishing took only 2 million fish, but the fishery has grown rapidly until 64 million salmon were taken in 1955 and the catch has fluctuated between this figure and about 40 million since then. The fishery has operated in an area from very close to the Kamchatka Peninsula in the west, eastward to 175° west longitude. Further eastward expansion of the high-seas fishery by the Japanese has been prevented by the Provisional Abstention Line provided for in the North Pacific Fishery Convention. This convention provides for the abstention by the Japanese from fishing stocks of salmon of North American origin. The provisional line at 175° west longitude was thought at the time to best separate the stocks from Asia and those from North America. Research up to the present time indicates that this was a good guess and most of the stocks of salmon of North American origin are protected by this provisional line. On the other hand, research by U.S. scientists also has shown that substantial proportions of red salmon from the Bristol Bay area of Alaska migrate west of this provisional abstention line and intermingle with salmon of Asian origin. These salmon from American rivers migrate as far west as 170° east longtitude, which is 10° west of the international date line at the 180th meridian. Evidence is available which indicates that salmon of North American origin migrate even farther to the west.

Under the terms of the North Pacific Convention, scientific research by Canada, Japan, and the United States is being carried out to ascertain whether or not there are other lines, or another line, which would more equitably separate fish of North American and Asian origin than the present provisional line. This research is producing a tremendous amount of information about the ocean migrations of salmon, and the American section of the Commission feels that there is adequate information now upon which to base justification for a change in the line, moving it farther to the west. The Japanese do not agree, and they believe that they are fulfilling their obligations at the present time under the treaty. Thus, at the moment there appears to be this basic difference between the United States and the Japanese sections of the Commission. This means that for the time being the abstention line remains where it is, with the Japanese fishing as much as they like west of 175° west longitude. In doing so, they have taken in the past, and will continue to take, substantial quantities of red salmon from Bristol Bay.

The present critical problem originates because of the anticipated low cycle return into Bristol Bay during 1959. The 1958 red salmon run numbered approximately 8 million fish. The Fish and Wildlife Service estimates that the Japanese fleets caught about 2.3 million of these fish on the high seas before they began their migration to Bristol Bay—1 million during the 1957 season when they were immatures, and 1.3 million as matures in 1958 when the Japanese fishing industry at the last moment agreed to reduce the fishing effort in those areas of known concentration of red salmon of American origin. The run which entered Bristol Bay in 1958 numbered only 5.7 million. An already reduced U.S. fishery in Bristol Bay in 1958 was severely restricted in order to insure, so far as possible, an adequate escapement for the perpetuation of the run. American fishermen were permitted, on the average, to fish no more than 2 days a week. In some districts they were permitted to fish no more than 1½ days per week, and in others no more than 1 day. Under these stringent regulations, the U.S. catch was about 3 million—the lowest in recent history. The escapement was below the necessary minimum in four of the five important spawning rivers of Bristol Bay.

The 3 million catch by American fishermen was critically low. The industry lost a great deal of money, and the fishermen and local population suffered severe hardships. Furthermore, in spite of the severe restriction on fishing, the spawning escapements was far below that needed to insure perpetuation of the run. Had there been no catch on the high seas by the Japanese fleets, the United States could have secured a spawning escapement of about 4 million—about the minimum needed—and an additional million fish could have been taken by U.S. fishermen, the difference between economic failure and perhaps a small profit by the industry.

The 1959 run is estimated to be about the same size as the 1958 run. The Bureau of Commercial Fisheries scientists recommend a minimum spawning escapement of 4 million fish. It is the opinion of the Bureau's biologists, based upon accumulated scientific evidence, that an escapement of less than 4 million salmon will bring about a further decline in the Bristol Bay salmon runs. On the other hand, the smallest catch which industry can take and still not lose heavily is about 2 million fish. This will be possible only by drastic reduction of effort in Bristol Bay to three canneries, as contrasted to the seven which operated in 1958, and corresponding reductions in the number of fishermen. If the United States is to achieve these minimum goals of escapement and cath, no less than 6 million reds must enter Bristol Bay in 1959. The Fish and Wildlife Service estimates that the Japanese have taken 350,000 reds of the 1959 run already as immatures in 1958. If the Japanese fish in 1959 as they fished in 1958, they will in all probability take another 1.3 million of this run. In these circumstances, assuming that the run does number 8 million, slightly more than 6 million fish will enter Bristol Bay in 1959 and the United States will achieve its minimum goals, modest as they are. If, on the other hand, the Japanese take substantially more than they took in 1958, the United States will be placed in an impossible situation.

The United States has sought to correct this situation through the International North Pacific Fisheries Commission. At the recent meeting of the Commission in Tokyo, the United States proposed a westward movement of the provisional line to 170° east longitude. This proposal was based upon the conclusion of the Commission's research committee to the effect that the red salmon of Bristol Bay origin predominate in the area of the Japanese high seas fishery as far west as 175° east longitude and are found in substantial number at least as far west as 170° east longitude. This proposal was not accepted by the Commission. Thus, the United States must adopt regulations with respect to the 1959 Bristol Bay fishing season without any knowledge of Japanese high seas conservation efforts beyond those provided by the North Pacific Convention. This means that the Japanese high seas fishing fleets can fish Bristol Bay red salmon 7 days a week with several hundred catcher boats and can further deplete the Bristol Bay runs of salmon, since these runs migrate west of the provisional abstention line into the area where the Japanese normally take several million red salmon. It is estimated that the Japanese will harvest about 4 million Bristol Bay red salmon if their fishery operates as anticipated without additional conservation measures applied beyond those provided for in the North Pacific convention. If they fish more intensively than normally in the area of heavy intermingling of Asian and North American salmon, the Bristol Bay runs can be more heavily depleted; but, even with the normally expected fishery, only a minimum number of salmon will survive to enter Bristol Bay and perpetuate the runs. There will be no surplus for American fishermen. The Government has two alternatives: It can, 1, ignore the offshore harvest and allow further depletion of these important runs of salmon; or, 2, it can eliminate the American fishery entirely and allow the number that escape the high seas fishery and enter Bristol Bay to proceed on upstream to spawn without any harvest by American fishermen.

A decision must be made within the next few weeks. Without some recognition by the Japanese of her additional responsibility to conserve Bristol Bay runs of salmon, either this cycle of salmon will undergo further serious depletion or the American fishery in Bristol Bay must be sacrificed with all of the attendant hardships to the indigenous people in the area as well as to the salmon industry.

Mr. Speaker, speedy action is necessary on salmon conservation legislation. The welfare and historic livelihood of our fishermen is at stake, as also is the economy of the new State of Alaska which has a wide interest in the passage of my bill.

I have been assured of early committee consideration. So when, as I hope will be soon, legislation is reported to the floor, I trust it will have the full support of all Members.

AMENDING THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to remove the 4-year limitation on deduction of exploration expenditures.

The present law permits the deduction of expenditures made in the exploration for ores or minerals, only to the extent of a maximum of $100,000 in any year and for not more than 4 years per taxpayer. This bill would retain the limitation of $100,000 per year on the deduction of exploration expenditures, but would remove the limitation which now restricts such deductions to 4 years per taxpayer.

The mineral resources of our Nation have made possible the high standard of living which prevails today. Discovery of new reserves is literally the lifeblood of the mining industry. Encouragement and stimulation of exploration for new mineral deposits are essential to both economic progress and national security. If we are to maintain a dynamic economy, we must make it attractive for taxpayers to invest their funds in the search for additional minerals.

Under the present law a taxpayer who deducts any amount, no matter how small, uses one of his 4 years for the deduction of these expenditures. Thus, a taxpayer deducting $1,000 a year for exploration expenditures would be limited to a total deduction of $4,000 for expenditures of this type. This limitation is a serious impediment to mining development, and could result in sudden shortages of such minerals as coal and zinc in critical periods.

In 1952 the President's Minerals Policy Commission states as follows:

> The Commission believes strongly that exploration and development costs for minerals should be fully expensible for tax purposes because of the direct incentive this arrangement gives for capital to take risks in highly uncertain fields.
> The Commission therefore recommends:
> "That the present limitation applicable to minerals other than oil and gas on the amount of permitted expensing of exploration costs be removed."

The present law also places a maximum deductibility of $100,000 on exploration costs for any one year. While this provision constitutes a roadblock in the exploration activities of some companies, I refrain from recommending that it be removed at this time when revenue requirements are of such vital importance to the Federal Treasury. Leaving the $100,000 limitation in the law will minimize revenue losses and at the same time will aid the hard-pressed small-business taxpayer.

EXPLOITS OF FIDEL CASTRO

Mr. REECE of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. REECE of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I find that the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] and I are in substantial agreement on a topic of current and vital interest to the United States. We share a sense of personal revulsion at the recent exploits of Fidel Castro.

This campus radical turned revolutionary is flouting justice before the eyes of the world with the same sophomoric and arrogant nonchalance with which he affects a whiskered face. Execution alone does not satiate this bearded Nero. Like his ancient counterpart he parades his brand of justice before jeering crowds in a circus of death.

What is more astonishing than the occurrence of such brutality in the 20th century Americas, is the fact that Castro has been apologized for on this very floor. Castro himself is not penitent. He hurls challenges at his U.S. critics and grandly informs the world that execution will continue to be the order of the day.

One of the principal apologists for Castro is our irrepressible colleague from Oregon [Mr. PORTER] His fellow Oregonian, Senator MORSE, seems slightly amazed that Mr. PORTER should deny that summary execution of 200 Cubans constitutes a "blood bath."

My concern over events in Cuba is twofold. First, I fear that the precedent of the Cuban executions may retard the development of democratic ideals and due process of law in this hemisphere Secondly, I am wary that the volatile state of affairs in Cuba may afford a golden opportunity for reestablishment of Communist power in that country—a country which is vital to the security of the Caribbean and the Southern United States. Neither Castro nor the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PORTER] can defend the blood bath by charging that while the justice is primitive, the victims were guilty. Speaking of the necessary and irreducible requirements of due process, our Supreme Court recently stated in the Chessman case that due process of law "must be respected, no matter how heinous the crime in question and no matter how guilty an accused may ultimately be found to be after guilt has been established."

The lack of faith with justice is perhaps indicative of the immaturity of the revolutionaries, but it also may be indicative of the political philosophy of the revolution. We cannot overlook Castro's past exploits on behalf of Red-tinged elements in the Bogotá riots of 1948, nor the fact that his successor and brother, Raul Castro, was Moscow trained and oriented. I would second Senator MORSE's suggestion that both the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PORTER] and the Castro regime read and adhere to the basic guarantees of fair procedure contained in the Geneva Convention. Furthermore, I would urge the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PORTER] and many of his likeminded colleagues to avoid letting the prestige of their office dignify Castro's executions. If any outsiders are to aid in restoring justice and stability to Cuba it should be accomplished through the United Nations. It seems that the gentleman from Oregon will never come to an honest appreciation of the real worth of the official American policy of nonintervention. His persistent efforts to attack or praise Latin American leaders on the basis of his personal attitude can only result in creating conflicts between these countries, distrust in the United States and benefit only the Communists.

Officially, United States should watch with great care the formation and execution of policies by the Castro government. Whatever assistance this country can render in restoring democracy and stability to Cuba will serve us a hundredfold in the defense of the Caribbean and our own country. As in the past, we should continue a policy of encouraging and persuading our neighbors to the universally aspired system of democracy but refrain both in word and action from any policy which can be interpreted in Latin America as a condemnation of governments with whom we are in free alliance. Of course, where there is an obvious and proven disregard of the basic elements of justice and fair play, such as is clearly demonstrated by the action of the Castro regime, we cannot still our voices, but owe it to mankind to raise them in justifiable protest.

I trust that the wild enthusiasm of the Cuban revolutionaries will be harnessed toward the reconstruction of the economy of Cuba and the general well-being of its citizens. Castro has set in motion some violent forces, including a resurgent Communist movement, which if not controlled could spread beyond Cuba's borders and threaten the internal stability of other countries in the Caribbean, if not the security of the entire area. I have consistently warned that the United States must avoid the support of any movement which would endanger our delicately contrived mutual security system on the important southeastern flank of the United States.

DOMESTIC SPENDING

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, this morning's editions of the Washington Post quote the distinguished majority leader of this body as saying it would be "an act of leadership" for the President to call for higher taxes and that the majority would "not necessarily" increase domestic spending programs in such a way as to unbalance the budget.

Although I should like to believe the gentleman could provide such leadership for his own party, which clearly has the voting power to accomplish these ends, I cannot help but recall Democrat failures to solve problems of taxation and spending last year.

The gentleman may recall that at that time the Democrat advisory council advocated a slash of $8 billion to $10 billion in taxes and increased spending by Government. Not only was this statement by the council in absolute contradiction to what the gentleman suggested yesterday, but majority Members of this body introduced a wide variety of bills calling for expenditures which would have nearly quadrupled our budget. One measure, alone, called for the spending of approximately $110 billion—nearly half again as much as it costs to operate our entire Government for a year—on a crackpot aid-to-education measure.

I may add that the majority in the 86th Congress has displayed no tendency to spare the gentleman the shock he says he will experience should this body increase domestic spending.

As for the need of increased taxes, I remind the gentleman of four statements made by President Eisenhower in his state of the Union message before a joint session of Congress January 9, 1959:

These were:

1. Today, that (1958) recession is fading into history, and this without gigantic, hastily improvised public works projects or untimely tax reductions.

2. We do not forget, of course, that our Nation's progress and fiscal integrity are interdependent and inseparable. We can afford everything we clearly need, but we cannot afford one cent of waste. We must examine every item of governmental expense critically. To do otherwise would be to betray our Nation's future. Thrift is one of the characteristics that have made this Nation great; why should we ignore it now?

3. I shall submit a balanced budget for the next year, expected to be the most prosperous in our history. It is a realistic budget with wholly attainable objectives. If we cannot live within our means during such a time of rising prosperity, the hope for fiscal integrity will fade; and if we persist in living beyond our means, we make it difficult for every family in our land to balance its own household budget.

4. By working together, the Congress and the Executive can keep a balance between income and outgo. If this is done there is real hope that we can look forward to a time in the foreseeable future when needed tax reforms can be accomplished.

I call particular attention to that last statement, Mr. Speaker. The President said on January 9 that tax reform could be attained only through the cooperation of the Congress—which this year most certainly means the Democrats in this body.

Less than a month later, however, it became obvious that Members of the majority were determined to continue the policies of profligate spending that cut the value of the dollar in half during their last two administrations and pushed our public debt to the highest peak in history.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the President offered a solution. I pass it on today to the distinguished majority leader, for I know, that in the list of his statements as quoted in today's Washington Post, he should welcome it.

At a press conference February 4—less than a week ago—President Eisenhower was confronted with the question of Democrat successes this year at raising the cost of just about every measure which comes before them.

The President replied:

Why doesn't each one of these bills include a measure for increasing taxes? That would be the straightforward, honest way to see whether the United States really wants this kind of thing.

I am certain that the gentleman from Massachusetts, so long respected for his fairness, honesty, and great legislative ability, will find much comfort in such a suggestion. Certainly it will afford him the means of bringing about improvements he asked for yesterday.

COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced a bill to make permanent the Commission on Civil Rights and to extend its authority to investigate any denial of a citizen to a right or privilege protected by the laws and/or Constitution of the United States.

The Commission will continue to be composed of the same number of Commissioners appointed by the President and shall continue to be bipartisan in nature and in practice.

It is my hope and expectation that it shall continue to be composed of members from the various parts of the country and reflecting different points of view so that there may be no doubt as to the fairness and impartiality of its activity.

The Commission shall not commence action on any allegation until it has been made in writing and on oath or affirmation.

The last duty to be imposed upon the Commission will be that it shall submit a report annually to the President and to the Congress on its activities and findings for the year immediately preceding the date of each report and to include therein such recommendations as it may deem necessary and appropriate.

The Commission, of course, shall have ample authority to submit such interim reports as may appear necessary in its discretion.

The Civil Rights Commission has done tremendous work in an impartial and fair way to make us aware of the fact that citizens are in reality being denied the right to vote in various parts of this country because of race or color or national origin.

Moreover, the Commission has constantly been hindered and impeded by a series of delaying tactics on the part of those who were being examined. Records and evidence have been denied it and it appears that many not belonging to the Commission have sought in every way possible to restrict and retard and to literally run the clock on the Commission.

Certainly, if the Commission has authority to act indefinitely we will find that delaying tactics will be much less valuable, especially since the Commission at present by law ceases to exist on November 9, 1959, and has but little remaining time to act.

It is clear that the Commission needs authority to investigate other denials of civil rights of citizens in the United States and that its work in fields of other privileges and rights protected by the law and/or Constitution of the United States will be at least as helpful as has its preliminary exploration in the field of voting rights only.

Mr. Speaker, it is certainly my hope that this will become law at the earliest possible date and that it will be a firm and vigorous step forward in our search for means to live with one another in our country as equals, citizens, and free men.

TREATMENT WORKS FOR PREVENTION OF AIR AND WATER POLLUTION

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill to encourage the prevention of air and water pollution by allowing the cost of treatment works to be amortized over a period of 60 months.

Much has been said in recent months about the danger of overcentralization with respect to the financial responsibility for air and water pollution control, but there is no danger, to my mind, Mr. Speaker, to equal the very grave menace that is posed to our Nation and to our people's health by the ever increasing pollution of the atmosphere and our water supply.

Under the Water Pollution Control Act, our present program of federally aided stream pollution abatement falls far short of meeting our national need. When we consider the fact that municipalities have been matching Federal funds at the rate of $5 for every Federal dollar, it is plain that the major responsibility in this area is still borne by the local governments. It is all the more shocking then to learn that the administration has proposed that the water pollution control program be liquidated in an effort to reverse the dangerous trend toward centralization.

Under the Air Pollution and Technical Assistance Act of 1955 Congress made a belated but commendable start in the fight against air pollution—an equally dangerous and growing threat to the health of our people living in industrial areas. I submit that it would be unthinkable to allow either of these programs to lapse when the growth of our cities and our defense-related industries impose an ever-increasing waste load upon our air and water supplies.

Private industry and municipalities are spending large sums to combat pollution but their efforts to this end require an additional incentive. Accordingly, I have introduced a bill which will encourage businesses and industrial plants to invest in the construction of facilities to check, divert, or treat pollution at its source.

Since air and water pollution are problems which defy company, community, county, and State boundaries, the responsibility of the Federal Government is unmistakably clear. It is foolhardy to turn our backs on this very real menace to our Nation's health and I earnestly hope that the 86th Congress will underwrite the very limited, and now threatened, efforts of the Federal Government by enacting this very worthwhile incentive to private industry by permitting the accelerated tax amortization of their cost of air and water pollution treatment facilities.

The consequent benefits both to the public health and to the economic and social welfare of our country commend this legislation to our prompt and favorable consideration.

USE OF GREAT LAKES VESSELS ON THE OCEAN

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with my distinguished colleague, Representative BLATNIK, of Minnesota, in introducing a bill to authorize the use of Great Lakes vessels on the oceans.

Under the Merchant Ship Sales Act of 1946, as amended, vessels purchased from the United States were restricted in their operation and use exclusively to the Great Lakes, St. Lawrence River, and gulf. Heretofore, this restriction was pointless for all practical purposes since these vessels had no access means to the high seas, but with the impending opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway, these vessels will now have easy access to the Atlantic.

I am reliably informed that as a practical matter there is only one ship to which this measure would apply, the Aquarama, a short-run passenger and automobile carrier whose operations are currently limited to 84 days of the year during the summer months, running between Cleveland and Detroit. Because of the short navigational season on the Great Lakes, the Aquarama has been operating at an annual loss of $4,500,000 with off-season layoffs of 250 operating personnel.

I would like at this time to commend to the favorable attention of my colleagues this measure which would entail no expense to the Federal Government but would enable the Aquarama to achieve full year-round utilization of its facilities and personnel by removing the present restriction of its operation to the Great Lakes only.

"DIXIE," UNCLE DAN EMMETT, AND MOUNT VERNON, OHIO

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LEVERING] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, in making a speech today about Daniel Decatur Emmett, the composer of the noted song, "Dixie," I should like to emphasize at the outset to my colleagues across the aisle that I am in no wise trying to steal any glory from the celebration of the Lincoln Sesquicentennial ceremonies we shall observe here on Thursday, February 12.

There is, I believe, no man in the country who holds the memory of Abraham Lincoln in greater respect and admiration than I do. As Robert G. Ingersoll once said of Lincoln, his life was like a rainbow, spanning in brilliant colors the horizons of the whole earth.

Today, I want to pay tribute to a man, and to a song written by that man. The man was Daniel Decatur Emmett—known as "Uncle Dan Emmett" to those of us who live in and around his birthplace and his burial place in Mount Vernon, Ohio. The song was "Dixie," which has had a terrific impact upon the people of this country.

Mount Vernon is proud of "Uncle Dan" Emmett, and his memory. The Kiwanis Club there, in which I fondly claim membership is planning an appropriate observance this year of the 100th anniversary of "Dixie," I believe. H. Ogden Wintermute, proprietor of the Dixie Antique Shop in Mount Vernon, is the author of "Daniel Decatur Emmett," a book about the life of the famous composer. It was published in 1955, and I wish to acknowledge the aid that book gave me in preparing this speech. I also would like to point out that Charles Burleigh Galbreath also wrote a book about "Uncle Dan" Emmett in 1904, and I am indebted to that volume, too, for some of the research embodied in my talk today. It is, I think, a great tribute to our people in my district that, while "Uncle Dan" no longer is with us, we still revere his memory and there are individuals such as Mr. Wintermute who work to keep this memory warm and vivid in the minds of oncoming generations. This is a great public service.

In 1703, Andrew Fletcher, of Saltoun, in a conversation with a friend, said: "Give me the making of the songs of a Nation, and I care not who makes its laws." Percy Bysshe Shelley, one of the greatest poets of world history, declared in 1821 that "poets are the unacknowledged legislators of the world."

It is possible that in the long future Daniel Decatur Emmett will become one of those honored few who make the most lasting indentation on the world, through "Dixie" and his other poetic music.

Although virtually every adult in the country knows "Dixie," relatively few, I daresay, are familiar with the fact that this song is 100 years old this spring, and of the impact it has had on our Nation's life.

"Dixie" was the great rallying cry of the Confederates in their ill-fated attempt to rebel against the Union. When Pickett's men charged at Gettysburg, they were singing "Dixie" to the accompaniment of the inspired drummer boys of the Southland. Yet, "Dixie" was used as a peace offering by the Great Emancipator, Abraham Lincoln, at the dawn of Nation's reunion. "Dixie" was the air to which the boys in blue kept step as they stormed San Jacinto Hill and as they liberated Cuba from the hands of Spanish tyranny. It has become one of the most beloved songs ever to be written in the United States of America.

Many of our country's patriotic songs, including "America," "Yankee Doodle," "The Red, White, and Blue," and "The Star-Spangled Banner," are sung to foreign tunes, but "Dixie" is an American composition entirely.

I am happy that Daniel Decatur Emmett, its composer, was born and reared in the town of Mount Vernon, Ohio, the principal city of Knox County, where my people have been living for generations and from which I came to this Congress. Uncle Dan Emmett made a great indentation on the people of his day, and, as fate has decided, he has made a great indentation on the people who came after him. Yet, this was a man of meager formal education, who joined a wagon circus as a drummer when he was a mere boy and at 14 composed "Old Dan Tucker," one of his greatest songs. He was an Irishman, and as an old minstrelist he carried always in his pocket a little volume of his songs, which he labeled, "The Patriotic Songs of America." Among them was "Dixie," of course.

Uncle Dan Emmett was, for some years, a contemporary of Abraham Lincoln, and was known to Lincoln, if not actually known by the Great Emancipator. In the sunset of life, Uncle Dan built a small cottage in Mount Vernon and lived many happy and contented years. He was buried next to his first wife, Catherine Rives Emmett, whom he married in New York in 1853 and who died in Chicago, Ill., on May 31, 1865, in the family lot in Mound View Cemetery in Mount Vernon.

The fact that he wrote "Dixie"—he called it "I Wish I Was in Dixie's Land" originally—on a cold, wet weekend in New York City in the early spring of 1859 is not the only reason I pay this tribute today.

After the Confederate forces had surrendered at Appomattox Courthouse, President Abraham Lincoln, who was in Richmond at the time, returned immediately to Washington. There was a great celebration at the White House that evening, at which several members of the Cabinet appeared. The U.S. Military Band marched to the White House lawn to help celebrate the victory. Lincoln was called to the balcony to greet the crowd. Through the cheers, the leader of the band asked the President for his favorite selection.

Lincoln promptly called back: "Play 'Dixie.' We have captured the Confederacy, and now 'Dixie' belongs to the Union."

Another version of the same incident is that in Mr. Lincoln's response to a public serenade in front of the White House on the evening of April 10, 1864—the day after Lee's surrender—in which, promising more extended remarks the next evening—which proved to be his last public utterance—he dismissed the crowd with these words:

I propose closing up this interview by the band performing a particular tune which I will name. Before this is done, however, I wish to mention one or two little circumstances connected with it. I have always thought "Dixie" one of the best tunes I have ever heard. Our adversaries over the way attempted to appropriate it, but I insisted yesterday that we had fairly captured it. I presented the question to the Attorney General, and he gave it as his opinion that it is our lawful prize. I now ask the band to give us a good turn upon it.

It is said that Abraham Lincoln remarked often that "The Blue Tail Fly"—another of Uncle Dan Emmett's famous songs—was his alltime favorite song.

After his childhood in Mount Vernon, and his various trips to see parts of the world on the wagon circus, Uncle Dan Emmett went to New York to work. Here, he was one of the several men who founded the first minstrel show ever to perform in the world, and the troupe of which he was then a part won much fame for this form of entertainment. However, a tour of Great Britain did not pay off, and Uncle Dan was stranded in England for a while. Incidentally, in Dublin, Ireland, Emmett witnessed the liberation of Daniel O'Connell, the famous Irish patriot.

Upon his return, he joined Bryant's minstrels in New York, and it was while with this company that he composed his most famous piece of music—"Dixie."

Daniel Decatur Emmett himself described to a New York (N.Y.) News correspondent in 1900 just how he came to write the song "Dixie":

In the spring of 1859, I found myself in New York City engaged with Bryant's minstrels as a performer in the minstrel line—

He asserted.

My particular engagement was to compose comic and Negro songs of the plantation character, write walkarounds, and act as a musician when the occasion required. One Saturday evening after the performance, Mr. Jerry Bryant overtook me on my way home.

Sez he: "Our numbers are getting stale. Can't you compose a new walkaround for us, something in the git-up and git style, something that will take with the boys, that they can catch quickly and whistle on the streets? Bring in something new that we can rehearse Monday morning." Sez I: "Mr. Bryant, this is very short notice, but I'll endeavor to please you."

The next day, Sunday, was a very rainy day. I was in a gloomy mood. My wife saw that I was worried. Sez she: "I'd help you if I could, but since I can't, I'll leave you alone for a spell." After she left, I threw myself across the bed. All I could think of was the good old circus days in the South. Finally I said right out loud, "I wish I was in Dixie." It was a phrase I had caught from the Negroes and it stuck in my mind. Suddenly, I jumped up, took my tin whistle, and sat down to the table to write. In less than an hour, I had the first verse and chorus. After that, it was easy. When my wife returned, I sang it for her. "How do you like it?" sez I. "I like it first rate," sez she, "and if the Bryants don't like it, they wouldn't like anything."

"It is all finished now except the name," sez I. "What shall I call it?"

Sez she: "Call it, 'I Wish I Was in Dixie's Land'." I agreed, and we gave it that name.

I took it to rehearsal on Monday morning and sang it for the Bryants. They liked it fine, but Mrs. Bryant objected to the first verse. Sez she: "Some people will object to comparing Dixie to Paradise. Just start with the second verse and it will be fine."

So this, Mr. Speaker, is how the first verse of the famous song, "Dixie," was discarded. My colleagues from the South, who may not know about that deleted first verse, may want to hear it, and here it is, as Uncle Dan Emmett himself repeated it in later years:

Dis worl' was made in jiss 6 days,
An' finished up in various ways:
Look away! Look away! Look away! Dixie land!
Dey den made Dixie trim an' nice,
But Adam call'd it "Paradise,"
Look away! Look away! Look away! Dixie land!

The song, as we all know, was an immediate success. It was played in the North and South, until the Civil War began. Then, as Uncle Dan later pointed out, he was the only man north of the Mason-Dixon line allowed to sing this song all during the Civil War in any theater, concert hall, or place of amusement. But of course, it was the great national song of the forces of the rebellion in the Southern States, and it is said that the men under Pickett, in the famous and futile charge at Gettysburg, were singing "Dixie" to the beat of the drums when they marched into the hail of withering fire that turned them back and sounded the death knell of the Confederacy. Lincoln and Lee and Grant and all our honored dead knew, that day at Gettysburg, that the South had put forth its finest effort and that it was simply not enough to win the war. Gettysburg was the beginning of the end.

But we are all proud today that it was not the end of "Dixie," the song or the section it personifies. As noted, Abraham Lincoln himself, once the cruel war was over, wanted "Dixie" to be sung throughout the country in order to help bind up the Nation's wounds and to make all Americans, North and South, realize that we are one Union, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

It is of interest, I believe, Mr. Speaker, to point out that the origin of the term "Dixie"—as used in relation to the area we know as the Southland—is rather obscure. However, there are several theories that have been advanced about it and perhaps my colleagues would be interested in hearing them.

"In Dixie Land" was a phrase common among show people of the pre-Civil War period. As each winter approached, and they wanted to get to the balmier climate of the South, they would say to each other: "I wish I was in Dixie." Many show people have written that this grew out of the fact that a man named Dixie had owned a great plantation on Manhattan Island and had been compelled to abandon slavery. He sold out and moved to Maryland, and this happened to more than one plantation owner who was proslavery during those pre-Civil War days. Gradually, the expression grew up that when one of these was moving, he was going to "Dixie," or, in other words, he was following "Dixie" into the Southland. It was said that some of the slaves freed in New York and elsewhere, and having been treated well by their former masters, would encounter economic difficulties, and they would remark: "I wish I wuz still with Dixie." Gradually, the word "Dixie" became synonymous in the public mind with the South.

There is another theory. Some scholars maintain that French bank notes issued in New Orleans bore the French word for 10—dix—and were called "dixies." It was thought that gradually, because of these banknotes, the word "Dixie" was applied to the section—the South—in which people might get these "dixies."

Actually, of course, it is possible that both of these natural developments contributed to the growth of the use of the word "Dixie" to denote the South. There is no question that, by the time of the Civil War, the people of the South considered that they were living in "Dixieland," and that they were happy to hear, use, repeat, and dance to the spirited song, "I Wish I Was In Dixie's Land."

Uncle Dan Emmett, as I have noted, wrote his song in the spring of 1859, well before the Civil War began. It was copyrighted in the U.S. Library of Congress in 1860, and, of course, as he pointed out himself, it was written for no other purpose than to furnish to his employer at the time a spirited comic walkaround that would "pack 'em in" and make the customers feel that they had received their money's worth.

The other songs of Uncle Dan Emmett are as well known to many millions of Americans as his song "Dixie" has become. "The Blue Tail Fly," which is now popular among little children who play records in their homes, was written by Daniel Decatur Emmett in 1844. Perhaps the second most popular ditty of the composer is "Old Dan Tucker," which he wrote when he was only 14 years old and living in Mount Vernon, Ohio. The title came by using his own first name and the name of his dog, known as "Tucker." Other famous songs he wrote include "Turkey in the Straw," "Old Zip Coon," and "Jordan Am a Hard Road to Trabel." Besides songs, he composed prayers and other works of literature.

It is interesting to note, Mr. Speaker, that Uncle Dan made $300 off of "Dixie," when it was originally published. This was the sum paid to him by Firth Pond, the music publishers. However, of course, indirectly he made much money from it later, by selling autographed copies of the sheet music and through going on tours with a minstrel company in which, without doubt, he was the greatest star of that period.

In traveling through the South, on a tour that began at Newark, Ohio, on August 22, 1895, the Al G. Field's Minstrel, presenting Uncle Dan Emmett in person, made one of the more remarkable records ever chalked up by a minstrel company. The theaters were packed wherever they appeared. When the company reached Richmond, Va., there was a rousing reception for Daniel Decatur Emmett. The Daughters of the Confederacy showered him with flowers; the Governor and representatives of the old Virginia families called upon him in delegations, and the theater was packed night after night.

Mr. Field later described the tour in these words:

> Uncle Dan was not in the best voice after he had marked his four score years, but every time he appeared before the footlights to sing "Dixie," the audience went wild. It seemed as though they would actually raise the roof. Every man, woman and child would rise in a body and simply overwhelm Uncle Dan with applause. It was great. It brought back memories of the grizzled men who bore arms for the Southland, the desolate camps, the fields of defeat, the enthusing recollections of victory. The Confederate soldiers had sung "Dixie" on the march and in their camps. The widows, wives, and daughters recalled the occasions on which the song had been sung while the men were valorously fighting for the cause that was so dear to all of them.

Wherever the troupe appeared—in Charlottesville, Va., in Atlanta, Ga., in Wilmington, Del., in Nashville, Tenn., record-breaking crowds turned out and Uncle Dan, a modest man, was feted by the great families of that area and era. Through it all, he remained as humble and as gentle and as fine and kind as he always had been among his neighbors back home in Mount Vernon. For this was one of the greatest attributes of this truly great man, Mr. Speaker. In spite of his genius for playing on the heartstrings of the people, he remained as comfortable as an old pair of shoes, among people of all kinds, and he was so unaffected in his actions that many individuals actually called him queer because he lived and acted in the simple, modest ways he wanted to live and act. I am constrained to recall, Mr. Speaker, that this simplicity, this gentleness, this lack of affectation, always has been and likely always will be the mark of true greatness. Jesus of Nazareth walked among the people as one of them. He loved the people and He lived plainly. The same was true of Saint Francis of Assissi. It was true of Socrates and Plato and Aristotle, and, as I have noted, of the greatest of our mighty dead. The great men of the world, Mr. Speaker, in my observation, have deigned the trappings of power and the pomp of ceremony. They have realized that their gifts are God's gifts, and that their role is not to try to appear great by lording it over their fellow men, but to be great by doing the things God has made it possible for them to do.

The last performance of the season of the Al G. Field minstrel company was at Ironton, Ohio, on April 11, 1896, and Uncle Dan, in his customary speech following his song, said:

> This is my farewell trip and my last appearance. This is my goodby to the public.

The audience cheered him so much that night, it was recorded, that it seemed as if the performers could never go on with the show. The troupe disbanded in Columbus 2 days later. Dan Emmett remained there 1 day to make a few purchases and then came home directly to his little cabin, as happy as a king returning to his kingdom. He told his neighbors:

> I'm back just in time to put in a mighty nice garden.

To the reporters who called on him, he made this statement:

> I am not insensible to the uniform kindness and marked attention that has been mine on this trip, but such a lot of the same lavishness became too monotonous, and home and quiet looks good to me.

Daniel Decatur Emmett came onto the stage of life on October 29, 1815, in a little cottage in Mount Vernon, Ohio. He stepped off the stage of life, in peace and quiet, when the final curtain was lowered on June 28, 1904, having lived 89 years. His request was that he be buried in the gray suit which Al G. Field had given him. Then, after appropriate ceremonies, he was buried next to the wife he had loved as a young man, in the family burial plot.

Mr. Speaker, as a final historic note, you may be interested to know that the Mount Vernon Sons of Veterans Fife and Drum Corps, the only patriotic aggregation of its kind in the United States that specializes in Revolutionary and Civil War music, participated in the burial rites of Albert Wolfson, the last Union Civil War veteran, and played "Dixie" at the request of the Wolfson family.

FEDERAL CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION A FRAUD—PROTECT OTHER CIVIL RIGHTS

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, sponsored by sincere, patriotic individuals and organizations, as well as by politicians seeking votes, the so-called Federal Civil Rights Act of 1957 is deceptive and a fraud, because it protects only the right to vote only where that right is denied because of race, creed, color or national origin.

Moreover, the right to vote is protected by a Federal statute—Revised Statutes, section 2004—adopted on May 31, 1870, and never repealed.

Other natural and constitutional rights, denied because of any other reason or excuse, are not protected.

In an attempt to minimize and, if possible, end, the oppression of employees by employers, the Wagner Act was passed in 1935.

That act was heavily weighted in favor of employees and labor unions. It gave both benefits not enjoyed by others.

It imposed penalties upon employers.

Among other things, it provided that employees should have a right to join a union, participate in union activities and to bargain collectively with the employer.

The act did not protect the right of an employee not to join a labor organization.

More than 17 years ago, a four-word amendment to the Wagner Act was offered by me, which, if adopted, would have given an employee the right—a natural and constitutional right—not to join, as well as to join, a labor union.

That amendment was again offered in December of 1945 by an amendment to section 7 which then read, in part:

Employees shall have the right of self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations—

So that it would read:

Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or not to join, a labor organization—

The Taft-Hartley Act, unfairly labeled by certain union officials as a slave labor act, though not perfect, was more equitable legislation in that it was an effort to protect not only the rights of employees, but certain rights of employers and of the public, but it expressly conferred the right—sections 7 and 8(A)(3)—of unions and employers, through agreement, to require, as a condition of continued employment, membership in a union.

That provision has enabled unions to force from employees financial contributions to political parties—to date, almost exclusively to the Democratic Party, which labor dictators will soon take over nationally as they have in some States, of which Michigan is an example.

THE DENIAL OF MANY NATURAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

Testimony before the McClellan committee, as well as similar testimony given before House investigating committees years ago, has demonstrated that the right to organize, the right to strike, and the right to picket have been used to deny many civil rights of others.

UNDER LABOR LEGISLATION

Unions and some union officials, exercising the special privileges given under the Taft-Hartley Act, other Federal legislation enabling the use of monopolistic power, have flagrantly denied to individuals the right to be secure in their ownership of property, in one's person, the right to conduct a business, the right to free speech, to a free press, to travel freely, the right to purchase food, clothing, light and power, the right—when ill—to service in a hospital, and the right to read the news of the day.

The above and other rights have for many, many years been denied citizens and whole communities.

It is equally true that the right of a community to light, to water, to food, to transportation, have each and all flagrantly been denied because unions and some union officials have arbitrarily exercised the right to organize, the right to strike and the right to picket.

PROPOSED LABOR LEGISLATION

Proposed labor legislation, if adopted and enforced, would aid in curing but one of the important denials of civil rights—that is, the right to be free from extortion and racketeering as practiced by gangsters and racketeers now unlawfully using union organizations. But it will not end the power to destroy a business—the levying of tribute for political purposes—for the exercise of the right to work.

If Congress lacks the inclination or the courage—whichever it may be—to protect the civil rights of communities, perhaps public sentiment—though I doubt it—will force it to do so.

Going that far, but no further, a bill has been introduced by me to amend section 187 of title 29 of the Code by making it unlawful for any individual employed by a public utility affecting commerce whose rates are fixed by a governmental agency to participate in a strike.

The sole purpose of this amendment is to protect the public, whose rights are superior to the right of any individual to participate in an activity which endangers the welfare or the security of the public.

THE PROPOSAL IS VALID

There need be no argument as to the validity of such a provision, for it was taken from Act No. 170 of the Public Acts of Michigan, 1947, introduced by Senator Hutchinson, of the eighth senatorial district of Michigan, upheld by the State supreme court and by the United States Supreme Court.

That proposed amendment reads:

A bill to amend title 29 of the United States Code by the addition of a new section following section 187 [1]

(1) It shall be unlawful for any individual employed in any public utility affecting commerce whose rates are fixed by some governmental agency to participate in any strike.

(2) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any individual employed in any such public utility who violates the provisions of this act shall thereby abandon and terminate his appointment or employment and shall no longer hold such position, or be entitled to any of the rights or emoluments thereof including pension or retirement rights or benefits.[2]

Day after day, from the well of the House, we hear much about a free people, a free world—but here in the United States of America, supposedly the citadel of freedom, the individual is not free to conduct his own lawful business, to keep the community free from "tieups" which adversely affect the health and welfare of the people.

An unbiased evaluation of what happens to a State and its people when Walter Reuther—UAW-CIO boss, takes over, and a Democratic Governor becomes his stooge, is in part, found in U.S. News & World Report of February 13, which reads as follows:

A WELFARE STATE RUNS INTO TROUBLE—MICHIGAN GOVERNMENT OUT OF MONEY, LIVING ON THE CUFF

DETROIT.—G. Mennen Williams, now in his 11th year as Governor of the great industrial State of Michigan, saw his State come to the end of its financial road last week. The Governor was forced to appeal to the corporations that he has often fought for money with which to meet the State payroll.

Governor Williams frequently is spoken of as one of the hopefuls for the 1960 Democratic presidential nomination. People of Michigan six times have voted him their chief executive. The Governor is famed as a liberal. His administration is closely alined with Walter Reuther, politically powerful head of the United Auto Workers.

When the money ran out, however, it was the corporations which came to the aid of the State with advance payment of taxes. The Governor appealed to 23 of the State's largest employers to pay taxes early and help ease the financial plight. Most agreed to do so.

OVERDUE OBLIGATIONS

The State's finances had reached the point of crisis. The University of Michigan and Michigan State University received their last payments from the State last November. Both were living on money borrowed from banks against student fees. The banks were unwilling to lend more.

The State fell 3 months behind in payments into its teachers' retirement fund. Bills due contractors in some instances went unpaid. There was a question where money could be found to meet State payrolls. Interest payments of $15 million are due on the State debt March 15, with no clear indication of where the money will come from. A payment of $34.5 million is due on a school fund in May.

Through it all, checks went regularly to those on relief—and welfare rolls continued to swell as unemployment spread through Detroit and many other industrial areas of the State. More than 11 percent of the State's labor force was jobless in January, according to estimates by the Michigan Bureau of Employment Security.

Michigan, in other words, suddenly found that, while it was continuing to spend freely, it had run out of money to meet its bills. Spending from the State's general fund ran ahead of income by $21 million in the fiscal year ended last June 30. A deficit of $89 million is estimated for the current fiscal year.

A JUGGLING ACT

As the State's financial crisis deepened in recent months, Michigan officials searched for new ways to raise additional cash.

Last year, for example, the State government liquidated one of its assets by transferring $19 million, representing liquor inventories held by State-owned liquor stores, to the credit of its general fund. The State also drew down $10 million from a special fund for soldiers' bonuses and from other funds set aside for the redemption of bonds.

This fiscal juggling brought in an extra $29 million of nonrecurring income, but that was still not enough to meet demands for cash. Money went out faster than it came in.

PLEA FOR TAX BOOSTS

As one way out of the financial crisis, Governor Williams last week asked the legislature to boost taxes by 18 percent over what was collected in 1958. He called for enactment of the State's first income tax, and for increases in other taxes that would bring in, all told, an additional $140 million a year.

[1] Sec. 188 which forbade striking by Government employees was repealed August 9, 1955, and is now covered by secs. 118p–188r of title 5.

[2] An adaptation of a portion of the Hutchinson Act of Michigan—PA 1947—No. 336 (CL 1948, secs. 423.201–423.207 [Stat. Ann. 1950, Rev. secs. 17.455(1)–17.455(7)]

Included in the Williams tax proposals are some that are certain to run into heavy opposition among Michigan taxpayers and businessmen: a graduated tax on personal incomes, a flat 5 percent tax on corporation incomes, and a 7 percent tax on the income of banks and other financial institutions.

Meanwhile, as a stopgap measure, the Governor has asked the legislature to mortgage the veterans' trust fund, which now contains securities valued at around $38 million. If the legislators approve, these securities could be used as collateral to secure loans.

SPENDING AS USUAL

In the face of the present cash crisis, the Governor's budget for the fiscal year to start next July 1 calls for still higher spending, over and above that for the present year. He has asked additional outlays centering chiefly on educational and mental-health programs, and a pay boost for State employees. These would increase the State's general-fund expenditures from a current annual rate of $380 million to a rate of $424 million in the coming year. For new public-works spending—which lately has been cut sharply—Mr. Williams proposes that the legislature create a State building authority, empowered to issue revenue bonds.

A LONG-TERM PROBLEM

How did Michigan get into its present plight? Look back at the record, and you see that the State's troubles have been years in the making.

For one thing, over the past decade—the years in which the Williams administration has been in office—total State spending has gone up from about $500 million annually to more than $1 billion.

State financial officials say that inflation and the increase in Michigan's population have accounted for about half that rise. The other $250 million increase in spending is accounted for by new State services, improvements in old ones, or by a shift in costs from local areas to the State treasury.

For another thing, new revenues coming into the State treasury have not kept pace with the rise in spending. Over the years, Governor Williams has sought approval from the legislature for higher taxes. But the legislators, while generally going along with higher spending, have not been eager to provide additional taxes.

A DOUBLE-EDGED RECESSION

Meanwhile, revenues from existing taxes have declined recently because of the recession in business. Sales-tax collections, the largest single source of revenue, fell off. The estimate of revenue from this tax for the current fiscal year had been $323 million. Now the estimate has been reduced to $296 million.

As auto plants and other factories began to lay off workers, welfare costs began to rise. These costs put a heavy drain on State revenues. Normally, the State pays 30 percent of general relief costs, cities and towns 70 percent. Recently, the State has shouldered the entire cost in Detroit and some other areas because the local governments ran out of funds.

FRONT RUNNER IN WELFARE

Michigan's spending for many types of State services—for education, highways, health and hospitals, public safety—run well ahead of the average for other States. Most recent figures show that the State's spending for education, for example, was the highest of all States, at about $61 per capita, compared with a nationwide average of $37.41 per capita.

Other factors, having to do with jobs and business activity, have had a long-term effect on Michigan's financial problem.

Since 1950, Michigan has added more than 1.5 million to its population. This population increase included many thousands of people who came from other States, lured by the prospect of high wages on Michigan's world-famous assembly lines. But new jobs over the past few years have not kept pace with the rise in population.

"COLD SHOULDER" FOR BUSINESS?

One reason frequently cited by some businessmen for this decline in jobs is that the State has an "unfavorable climate" for attracting and holding private business and industry. All through the State government, businessmen say, they run into an attitude of hostility.

Last year, a big Detroit manufacturer closed down its factory with a payroll of 700 workers and moved to Arkansas. There, the company's president says, it will save $75,000 a year in taxes alone—and many times that amount in wages.

In the Detroit suburb of Monroe, Mayor Milton H. Knabusch said that one of the country's largest steel producers decided against building a plant there because the company didn't like the political and industrial climate of Michigan. Since 1947, the Big Three of the auto industry have built or acquired about 100 new plants across the country. Only 30 of these have been located in Michigan. Neighboring Ohio alone got 29.

All these problems have combined to add to the State's financial worries. New business enterprises are slow to come to Michigan. Revenues from existing businesses are down. Spending is way up.

Thus, the people of Michigan, one of the wealthiest States in the United States, now find their government is broke. Many of these people are wondering whether the State can continue to spend as it has in the past—and whether taxpayers are willing to provide the new money that will be needed to support the spending programs already projected for the future.

AREA REDEVELOPMENT

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today, for appropriate reference, an area redevelopment bill which I believe to be comprehensive, effective, and realistic.

It is my belief that an overwhelming majority of the Members of the Congress are in favor of area redevelopment legislation. Despite the tapering off of the recession, and the generally healthy economic condition of the Nation at the present time, we still find pockets of economic stagnation in our country—areas where, because of the decline of certain industries, rapid technological changes in certain industries or the transfer of plants to areas of the United States where cheaper labor is available, there has been a resultant high level of unemployment over a long period of time.

This is a situation we cannot tolerate. In the economic race with the Soviet Union we cannot afford to let any of our communities stagnate economically, and persistent unemployment in certain areas is most surely a drain on our economy. Tax revenues are lower than they ought to be, and the costs of our welfare and unemployment compensation programs are far higher than they ought to be. Worst of all, persistent unemployment in any area means that there is a tremendous human wastage, because able-bodied men, willing and anxious to work, simply cannot find gainful employment.

In the last session of Congress an area redevelopment bill, S. 3683, was passed by the Congress but pocket-vetoed by the President on September 6, 1958.

The President objected to a program in which up to 65 percent of the funds for projects in depressed areas could come from the Federal Government—thus curtailing the area of required local initiative. The President pointed out that S. 3683 provided "for less local participation in the costs of local development projects than is proper or necessary to stimulate and assure the continuing interest and support of local governmental and private interests."

The President also pointed out the danger of placing the administration outside the Department of Commerce "which has primary responsibility for business and industrial development and a long experience in extending to local areas technical aid for economic development."

The President objected as well to the artificially low interest rates provided for in last year's bill.

He had strong reservations about the bill's program of Federal grants for public works in redevelopment areas, requiring no local participation whatever.

While concurring in these objections of the President, Mr. Speaker, I still feel that there is a need for wider and more comprehensive area redevelopment legislation than the administration has yet proposed to Congress. It seems to me that the figure of approximately $50 million which the administration would allow for such a program—$55 million in the budget for fiscal 1960—is inadequate, that a loaning period of at least 30 years is necessary, and that certain rural areas should receive benefits under area redevelopment legislation.

It has been my hope that the area redevelopment legislation introduced in this Congress would show a realistic compromise between the administration's position and the sentiment of Congress as indicated in last year's vote on S. 3683.

For this reason I was extremely disappointed when I read the provisions of the area redevelopment bill, H.R. 3466, recently introduced in this House by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] and other Members, which is the counterpart of the Douglas-Cooper-Clark-Beall area redevelopment bill (S. 722) introduced in the other body.

That bill, while making a few minor concessions to the President's point of view, contains almost all of the provisions he found so objectionable in S. 3683 last year.

Mr. Speaker, as a freshman member of Congress I have no special pipeline to the President, or any way to read his mind. But I find it difficult to see how he could approve H.R. 3466, the Douglas-Flood bill, in the current session of Congress, in view of his veto of S. 3683 last September.

The Douglas-Flood bill provides for loans and direct grants totaling $375 million—seven times the figure the President has mentioned for area redevelopment programs in his budget message.

The Douglas-Flood bill authorizes direct grants of $75 million for public facilities, directly inserting the Federal Government into an area which should remain under primary local jurisdiction.

The Douglas-Flood bill provides that funds be borrowed from the Treasury instead of being appropriated by Congress. It has been the general practice of the House to refuse programs of this nature based on Treasury loans. Realistic control must be lodged in the Congress, so that appropriations may be made intelligently on the basis of real needs, year-to-year.

Mr. Speaker, during recent weeks Members of this body from both sides of the aisle have risen time and time again to point out that one reason for the huge national debt we have today is that various expensive new projects have come in through the back door of Treasury loans, rather than going through the Appropriations Committee where every item is given the closest scrutiny. Not only is this Treasury loan bypass of regular congressional appropriation procedures fiscally irresponsible, but I also feel that such a practice is unconstitutional, in that it contravenes the provision of the Constitution providing that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law. We would certainly be making a grave error if we added area redevelopment projects to the group of expenditures beyond the effective congressional control provided for in the Constitution.

The Douglas-Flood bill, despite some slight corrective adjustments, still contains a mandatory interest rate on loans which would hamper the administering agency in the imposition of reasonable interest rates based on current conditions.

The Douglas-Flood bill establishes still another Federal agency, to be charged with administering the program, instead of placing it within the Department of Commerce where it rightfully belongs.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation I am introducing today is the counterpart of a bill recently introduced in the other body by Mr. SCOTT, of Pennsylvania—S. 268. This legislation eliminates the most undesirable features of the Douglas-Flood bill, but it does go further than the administration's recommendations.

The legislation I am introducing today differs from the Douglas-Flood bill in the following principal respects:

It places administration of the program within the Department of Commerce with an administrator equivalent to an assistant secretary.

It authorizes no direct grants for public facilities.

It authorizes appropriations, rather than loans from the Treasury.

The authorized funds for the revolving fund total $200 million, broken down into $100 million for industrial projects, $50 million for rural projects, and $50 million for public facilities.

The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to determine a realistic rate of interest on all loans.

The maximum Federal loan participation is 50 percent; the minimum local or State participation is 10 percent, and the minimum private participation is 5 percent.

Technical assistance totaling $3,500,000 annually is authorized, rather than $4,500,000 as in the Douglas-Flood bill.

Mr. Speaker, chronic unemployment still plagues many communities in our Nation. In my own district, the Adams-North Adams area has been afflicted with approximately 15 percent unemployment ever since 1957. I feel that we should have no further delays in enacting legislation to aid areas of this type. For this reason I am concerned when bills are proposed which are so extravagant and controversial in nature that they may well encounter a Presidential veto and cause long delays before actual assistance reaches areas of long-term unemployment.

I feel that the legislation I am proposing today constitutes a reasonable compromise between more extreme positions, and I hope that it will be given serious consideration as a method of bringing effective assistance to depressed areas at the earliest possible date.

ALLOCATION OF DEFENSE CONTRACTS

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of a telegram from Mr. J. E. Fishburn, Jr., president of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, which concerns itself with attacks against the awarding of defense contracts to California firms.

Because of the fairness of the appraisal by Mr. Fishburn, as well as the importance of the subject, I wish to insert in the RECORD the text of his communication so that my colleagues may be apprised of the matter. The telegram follows:

> Reports in the press to the effect that New York officials are initiating a political attack upon the defense business being awarded to California firms, with a view to diverting this business to New York, are nothing new in our experience. Ever since California started to develop we have been subjected to political attempts by other areas to deprive us of the industry and business created through the energy and enterprise of our citizens. We believe the defense of the United States and the interest of every American citizen will be advanced if military items are purchased where the best quality can be secured at the lowest price. If such a traditional free market California industry will be glad to compete in full confidence that we will get such business as is justified by our prices and our performance. We are prepared to oppose with all the strength at our command any attempt to subvert the defense of our country for political gain.

TURBINE INDUSTRY VITAL TO NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. STRATTON] may extend his remarks at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, some days ago the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS] arose on this floor to discuss the Office of Civil Defense Mobilization's decision to award the contracts for hydraulic turbines for the Greer's Ferry Dam project in Arkansas to the Baldwin-Lima-Hamilton Co. of Philadelphia, whose bid of $1,750,000 was $300,000 higher than a bid submitted by the English Electric Co. of England, on the grounds of national security.

I am not familiar with the details of this particular award nor of the circumstances that led up to it and I do not desire to comment on it. But as the representative of a district where hydraulic turbine generators are manufactured, I am acutely aware of the vital role which both the hydraulic turbine and the hydraulic turbine generator industries play in our national defense picture. At least some of the comments which I have read on this Philadelphia case, Mr. Speaker, have suggested that a finding of national security by the Director of the OCDM in the case of the hydraulic turbine industry would be hard to substantiate. On the contrary, I believe that the connection between these industries and the national defense is most direct and obvious. I believe that we should be glad that Governor Hoegh has publicly recognized it.

For the Governor's decision in this case gives us hope that perhaps there will also be a corresponding recognition of the unique role which this industry plays in national defense when the time comes, as it must in the near future, for the OCDM Director to make a final ruling on a petition submitted to him by the National Electrical Manufacturers Association and the General Electric Co. asking that the Government suspend any further offers to bid on hydraulic turbines and hydraulic turbine driven generators and other heavy electrical equipment referred to in the petition to foreign manufacturers on the ground of national security.

The case behind this petition is simple. Hydraulic turbines and hydraulic turbine generators are heavy equipment requiring a highly expensive and specialized type of machining equipment, as well as highly trained and skilled personnel to produce. An overwhelming percentage, some 60 percent, of this type of equipment is purchased by governmental agencies, either Federal or State. If these agencies continue to invite foreign manufacturers to bid on this type of equipment they obviously reduce the available market for our domestic manufacturers. These manufacturers, in turn, without reasonable assurance of a steady flow of future orders, will be likely to cut back on productive capacity in these specialized fields and concentrate instead on items likely to be more profitable. Yet the decline of such productive facilities could greatly impair our Nation's capacity to develop the full extent of electrical power that might be needed in some future emergency. Any shortage in local manufacturing facilities would impair our ability to service and maintain foreign equipment installed in this country. Moreover, the lag time involved in the production of hydraulic turbines and hydraulic turbine generators, which is a matter of several years, might even mean that a successful foreign bidder would find himself for political or military reasons unable at the specified time to deliver overseas goods contracted for several years in advance.

Mr. Speaker, the power resources of this country are plainly vital to our productive skill and, therefore, to our ability to defend ourselves in a time of national crisis, as we found out in World War II. Any policies which the Government might deliberately follow which would put in jeopardy the ability of these power installations to continue to operate would therefore jeopardize our whole national defense.

I do hope the Director of the Office of Civil Defense Mobilization, who has already recognized the danger implicit when orders for this type of equipment are placed abroad, will also give favorable consideration to the request that has been made by the General Electric Co. and by the National Electrical Manufacturers Association to permit no further importations in this field. I favor this action not only because I am deeply concerned with the risk that might be created in our national defense structure if the Director failed to approve this request, but also because I am anxious that the great body of skilled and devoted mechanics in the great General Electric plant in Schenectady, N.Y., who have devoted so many years of their lives to an important and complex industry, will continue to be able to look forward to many years of useful employment ahead rather than face the haunting specter of seeing one more great industry go down into the drain under pressures of low-cost labor on foreign manufactured products.

In my district the future of the turbine industry in general and the hydraulic turbine generator industry in particular is a vital, down-to-earth economic problem. I know that the people of my district would certainly not regard any effort on the part of the Government to recognize the importance of this industry in national defense picture as any purely partisan move. I am most hopeful that the facts which I have outlined here will be fully recognized by the administration as well as by the Members of this House.

PROPOSED HARBOR AT DUBUQUE, IOWA

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WOLF] may extend his remarks at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk for appropriate reference a bill to authorize the construction of a harbor on the Mississippi River at Dubuque, Iowa.

The Ice Harbor at the city of Dubuque is an arm of the Mississippi River, 1,200 feet long by 400 feet wide. It was created in 1872 when citizens of the city, wishing to establish the only harbor between Quincy, Ill., and St. Paul, Minn., deeded the land to the city, which thereupon entered into a compact authorizing and empowering the United States to improve and maintain it as a harbor in perpetuity. The Government then dredged the harbor and has, until recent times, maintained the same at its own expense.

In 1946 it was determined that rehabilitation was necessary but no funds were made available at the time. Since that time there has been a constant silting so that depths at normal pool elevation now vary between 6 to 11 feet.

The need for this project is great, Mr. Speaker. The first need is related to our national defense. I understand that under the Mobilization Planning Survey of the Department of Defense, the Dubuque Boat & Boiler Co. is scheduled to build some vessels with drafts comparatively deep. Unless the harbor is dredged, it will be unable to produce what is required by the Department of Defense. It is imperative that the dredging be done previous to M-day, so that the Dubuque Boat & Boiler Co. will not be delayed in meeting this very difficult required production schedule. At the present time this company is unable to take any boats for construction unless their draft is under 5 or 6 feet.

The Dubuque Harbor is the only natural commercial harbor on the Upper Mississippi, and the Dubuque Boat & Boiler Co. offers the only repair yard on the upper Mississippi above St. Louis. Under present conditions, it is impossible to get vessels into the harbor for repairs or layup. In former years as many as 50 to 60 vessels came to the harbor for these purposes.

Due to the shallowness of the harbor, Mr. Speaker, the industries of the city of Dubuque, whose lives depend on water transportation on the Mississippi River and docking facilities at the Dubuque Harbor, have had to restrict their operations.

The Coast Guard icebreaker touches bottom in the harbor.

The Chief of Engineers submitted to the Congress several days ago a favorable survey report on this project, which is being printed as House Document 56, 86th Congress.

If this project is approved by the Congress, Mr. Speaker, there will be many direct, as well as indirect, benefits to the people of the Dubuque area.

It would mean a greater volume of craft which could be repaired and altered at this point. This would mean more employment for the Dubuque area.

The dredging of the harbor would make possible the construction of a proposed set of marine ways. River operators have repeatedly pointed to the need for marine ways at the Dubuque Harbor, and there are no facilities of this nature on the whole river north of St. Louis.

The dredge material will be dumped in low spots on public property, thereby increasing the area available for industrial building.

The Government's investment in the 100-foot by 20-foot marginal pier and the buildings located on the depot grounds will be protected.

Dubuque Harbor is an ideal point for shipping scrap, grain, and other produce and for receiving petroleum, sulfur, coal, molasses, and so forth, since the shore is served by belt or spur lines connecting with the Burlington, Milwaukee, Illinois Central, and Great Western Railroads.

Mr. Speaker, river repair facilities, shipyards, and harbors are vital to river transportation and to defense in times of emergency. The harbors cannot be neglected and allowed to deteriorate, just as the locks and dams and the navigable channels cannot be allowed to deteriorate. All require constant upkeep and maintenance so that they will be available for use at all times. Neglect of any part of the river facilities cannot be overcome in short periods of time because of the vast amount of work required and the limited amounts of equipment available to do the work.

Since the Chief of Engineers has approved this project, Mr. Speaker, I very much hope that this Congress in its wisdom will see fit to authorize it.

McDOWELL SUPPORTS EDUCATIONAL TELEVISION FOR DELAWARE

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. McDOWELL] may extend his remarks at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced in the House of Representatives a bill to provide for Federal assistance to the States in establishing educational television stations. The act would provide for up to $1 million for each State for this purpose. The U.S. Commissioner of Education would administer the act but would be restricted from having any Federal control over such educational television broadcasting. Such control would be left entirely in the hands of a State agency established for that purpose. The legislation states that such a State agency must be under the control of the agency or officer primarily responsible for the State supervision of public elementary and secondary schools, or a nonprofit foundation, corporation, or association organized primarily to engage in or encourage educational television broadcasting, or a duly constituted State educational television commission, or a State controlled college or university, and that such facilities may be used only for educational purposes. The title of the act sets forth the following general purposes: "To expedite the utilization of television transmission facilities in our public schools and colleges, and in adult training programs."

I am thoroughly convinced that educational television is one of the great new opportunities on the horizon today to further the education of our boys and girls and those adults who wish to take advantage of this great national media. Classroom television reception has proven itself to be invaluable as an aid to the classroom teacher. It offers a sound economical approach to the future financing problems of our school boards and State departments of education throughout the Nation.

In less than 7 years after the Federal Communications Commission reserved television channels for education, stations on these channels are now on the air in 24 States and in Puerto Rico. In 37 States, closed circuit television is now being used for educational purposes. The planning for construction of television facilities is now being advanced in many additional areas including Delaware. Educational television is well on the way to becoming an accepted nationwide service.

Industry, labor, philanthropic organizations, local and State governments, civic groups and cultural institutions, the press and commercial broadcasters—all have given assistance to the end that this newest of the mass media might serve the enlightenment of the individual citizen.

I cannot believe that Delaware, which is so often described as one of the wealthiest States in the country, cannot afford to contribute financial assistance that when supplemented by Federal assistance could not provide the very best in educational television for our State. Surely a State and a Nation that is spending billions of dollars for new modern highways can also afford an up-to-date modern educational program. In the long run this new weapon used to improve our educational opportunity can prove to be a sound move for greater efficiency in the public schools. I shall watch carefully hearings which are now being held before the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee on a similar proposal introduced in the Senate by Senator MAGNUSON, of Washington State, and cosponsored by Senator SCHOEPPEL, of Kansas. In the event the Magnuson bill passes the Senate, I would be only too glad to accept it providing it meets the same standards as are contained in the bill which I have introduced.

RELIEF FOR RAILROAD COMMUTER SERVICE

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. CHURCH] may extend her remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mrs. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill aimed at bringing some measure of relief to railroads serving commuter suburban areas and even greater relief, in turn, to those communities and citizens whose economic and other activities are presently threatened by the proposed abandonment of certain commuter lines.

At a hearing held in Chicago in December of 1958, before the Illinois Commerce Commission and representatives of the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States, I urged that the proposed abandonment of the Chicago, North Shore & Milwaukee Railway Line in Milwaukee, Racine, and Kenosha Counties, Wis., and Lake and Cook Counties, Ill., be postponed at least until the Congress could investigate legislative ways of granting relief. I personally believe that it is essential to the economy and well-being of communities in many sections of the country that railroad commuter service be maintained. Proposals to abandon such commuter and other railroad passenger service has, in fact, reached a stage of national crisis.

The present legislation seeks to be of partial help in that it amends the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to assure that tax relief granted by States and municipalities to railroads operating commuter service at a loss would directly benefit the railroads and not be absorbed by increased Federal taxes.

Such Federal leadership in meeting the crisis could be accomplished without preempting State functions or rights, and the assistance so given would, in no sense, interfere with railroad management. In addition, passage of the act should encourage State and local governments to offer at their level the help which is so vitally needed.

Under the present Federal tax laws, a large proportion of the amount that might be saved through tax-relief measures adopted at the State and local levels would be preempted by the Federal Government. The millions of dollars that would be saved under this bill could be spent by the railroads in continuation and improvement of vital passenger service.

It is estimated that there are over 500,000 commuters currently dependent on railroad transportation. At the same time, it is openly acknowledged that, with the exception of one railroad line—the Long Island Railroad, currently benefiting from a Federal tax loss—practically every railroad commuter service is operating at a net loss.

Certainly, railroads cannot be permanently forced to operate at such a loss, and yet it is equally clear that to discontinue commuter service because of this loss would entail serious economic and social consequences to each community and to the Nation.

I do not hold that the bill introduced today, which merely seeks "to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to permit railroad corporations to take full advantage of tax-relief measures enacted or granted by the States and their political subdivisions," is the full or only answer. I hold, however, that its passage would be a step in the right direction, and that passage of the bill as such a step should be immediate.

A BILL TO AUTHORIZE PAYMENT OF UNPAID BALANCE OF PHILIPPINE WAR DAMAGE

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, together with the gentleman from California [Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER] I have today introduced a bill to authorize payment of the balance in full of awards for war damage made by the Philippine War Damage Commission under the terms of the Philippine Rehabilitation Act of April 30, 1946.

Mr. MILLER, who has been a member of the Insular Affairs Committee since the 79th Congress, has consistently shown a deep interest in legislation affecting the relationship of the United States and the Philippines. He took an active part in the preparation and passage of the Philippine Rehabilitation Act of 1946. In an effort to correct a moral and legal outstanding obligation to the Philippine people he has, in past Congresses, introduced similar bills.

As a member of the House Foreign Affairs Committeee, I am deeply interested in U.S. international relations and policies. As chairman of the Subcommittee on the Far East and the Pacific, American-Philippine relations are of particular concern to me. After much careful study, I have come to the conclusion that Congress should consider and review the Philippine unpaid war damage claims. In my opinion, at least a hearing should be afforded the claimants.

In prior proposed legislation, the amount authorized to be appropriated was $100 million. There apparently was some misapprehension of the actual figures involved. Closer calculation discloses a balance of awards actually made, which, after a lapse of more than 12 years remains unpaid, of $154,726,995.79.

In the case of the health, educational, and welfare facilities of religious organizations in the Philippines, however, provision was made by subsequent laws to pay in full the replacement value of the war damaged properties so that actually the entire amount of the balance of the awards will not be required, after excluding approximately $28 million paid to religious institutions. The best estimate of the actual amount required to discharge the obligation of the United States upon war-damage awards is not in excess of $130 million. It should also be noted that, when the Philippine War Damage Commission ended its operation in 1951, it turned back into the United States Treasury $2,457,168.94 of unexpended funds which were appropriated to carry out the work of the Commission.

Volumes have been written and spoken on the long history of our close friendship and political and economic ties with the people of the Philippines. The economic plight of this courageous young country is nothing short of desperate. Certain newspaper articles report that the Department of State intends to reject the Philippine claims. In view of its past policy, it seems unlikely that the State Department would take such a position. During the 81st Congress, when asked to make a report on H.R. 7600, a bill providing for payment of these claims, the Department of State voiced no objections. It does not appear to me to be the part of wisdom to announce such a rejection without explanation and analysis. In this connection, Mr. Speaker, under permission granted, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of Sunday, February 8, 1959:

PHILIPPINE CLAIMS

There is danger that the whole question of the Philippine claims against the United States may be jockeyed out of perspective. It should not be made a matter of contention, disputation, propaganda, or self-seeking, either here or in Manila. What is needed is calm judgment, friendly understanding, and action.

It is a mistake to set one target figure as the total that ought to be assessed and then win or lose on obtaining that figure. The claims fall into different categories and they should be judged on their merits. The assessment, moreover, should be in agreement between the Filipinos and ourselves, and that agreement can be reached if we preserve an atmosphere of good will and good understanding.

Some claims, such as for example the Philippine claim to reimbursement for the loss in their currency reserve that was brought about through the unilateral action of the United States in changing the price of gold back in 1933, are indisputably sound. This obligation should have been met long before this, and the impatience of the Filipinos is natural.

On the other hand, some of the war damage claims require both examination and negotiation. The United States was able to do a good job on the settlement of small claims. The administrative cost of making these settlements was remarkably low, the operation was sound from the outset, and it met an immediate need. The larger claims cannot be settled out of hand in quite the same fashion, but certainly an excellent example has been set. Something can be done and it should be done promptly.

It will be a loss to the Philippines, to us, and to the whole free world if this question is permitted to become a basis for any estrangement between the Filipinos and ourselves. There is enough good sense on both sides of the Pacific to solve this problem and it should be brought to bear.

It is wisely observed that "claims fall into different categories, and they should be judged on their merits." Moreover, the editorial correctly reports that the United States was able to do a good job in the settlement of some war damage claims; that the administrative cost of the making of these settlements was remarkably low; and that the operation was sound. It is apparent that the editorial assumes that the settlement of such war damage claims has been completed, in the past, under a sound operation, and with low administrative cost. As I have pointed out, the fact is that a considerable balance of the awards made by the Philippine War Damage Commission, under that operation, has not been paid.

The full discharge of the unpaid balance of war damages, determined to be fair under a sound administrative operation, pursuant to a law passed in 1946, will constitute an action reflecting credit upon our powers of analysis and our sense of discrimination. Moreover, such a step would be consistent with the "calm judgment, friendly understanding, and action" recommended in the editorial to which I have referred. It will enhance confidence in our Government, rather than engender criticism, and invite a just accusation of arbitrary action, through failure to distinguish between one type of claims and another.

It is my conviction that the Members of Congress in this session will recognize and acknowledge our obligation, and no longer delay in authorizing by law the payment of the balance still outstanding upon Philippine war damage awards made by the Philippine War Damage Commission, prior to March 1951.

I am informed that the Philippine Ambassador to the United States, Gen. Carlos P. Romulo, has submitted a note to our State Department, urging that action be taken by the U.S. Government on the legislation which I have introduced. Favorable action by the Department of State and this Congress will correct a moral and legal obligation to the Philippine people and will help American-Philippine relations immeasurably.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

The Youth Conservation Act of 1959

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, February 9, 1959

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement entitled "Youth Conservation Act of 1959," prepared by myself, together with an editorial entitled "A New CCC?" published in the Medford (Oreg.) Mail Tribune of January 14, 1959.

There being no objection, the statement and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

YOUTH CONSERVATION ACT OF 1959

(Statement by Senator MORSE, of Oregon)

It was most gratifying to me to read another fine editorial appearing in the Medford (Oreg.) Mail Tribune. On January 14 this truly great newspaper of the State of Oregon contained an item entitled "A New CCC?" In it the editor of the Mail Tribune struck a note which I think that the Senate will hear time and time again in the coming months as newspaper after newspaper, the Nation over, joins the chorus of praise for the legislation to create a Youth Conservation Corps, introduced by the very able and humanitarian senior Senator from Minnesota. As a cosponsor of this proposed legislation, S. 812, I am proud to work with the Senator from Minnesota and with the other cosponsors, toward speedy enactment of the bill.

In the last analysis, as I have often reiterated upon the floor of the Senate, the basic wealth of the United States rests not alone upon the raw materials we have at our command, abundant though they be; nor is it to be found solely in the broad rivers which convey our goods to ocean ports, in our forests which mantle the slopes of our snow-capped mountains, in our wheat-golden farms, nor in our blossoming fruit orchards. These all have but a derivative value. No, the truth wealth of our country lies in our basic human resource, the boys and girls who will tomorrow be succeeding us in the trusteeship of our natural resources.

This being so, have we not a plain duty to arrange matters in such a fashion as will conserve this human resource, so that when our children assume the trust of land, water, and minerals in their time they will wisely preserve their inheritance and pass it on, not only undiminished but enhanced? How better can this be done than through a program which gives at first hand a knowledge of and love for our forests, streams, and wildlife?

The boy salvaged from the slums of our blighted metropolitan areas through the Youth Conservation Corps would gain insight into the truths expressed by the great poet when he caused his character to say:

"And this our life exempt from public haunt
Finds tongues in trees, books in the running brooks,
Sermons in stones and good in everything.
I would not change it."

The Medford Mail Tribune editorial wisely points out that the cost is small in comparison with the benefits which would accrue to the boy, the community, and the Nation, through the enactment of this legislation.

The forest-access road program, so urgently needed, would benefit immeasurably from the enactment of the Youth Conservation Corps Act of 1959. Forest-access roads pay for themselves over and over again. Our timber is a crop to be harvested. It is a tragic waste if it falls to decay. It is a hazard when it becomes tinder dry and ripe for fire. Far better that it be harvested at prime and used for homes. The Youth Conservation Corps, under skillful leadership of Forest Service and Park Service rangers and foremen, who would build the access roads, clear the underbrush, and improve our Federal forests, would profit by their growth in skills. Their health would be enhanced. They could contribute to the family income to feed their younger brothers and sisters; but, most of all, Mr. President, they would grow in understanding of the riches offered by our open spaces, crystal lakes, and fragrant forests. This is the experience which would instill a true love of country, to be passed on and treasured by the generations beyond.

It is my hope that this legislation will pass the Senate without dissenting vote when it is reported from committee. Passage by unanimous action would constitute a symbol of the determination of the Senate to develop our country through the aid we extend to the young men of America in the recreation of a Youth Conservation Corps.

[From the Medford (Oreg.) Mail Tribune, Jan. 14, 1959]

A NEW CCC?

A couple of years ago, after a jaunt into the woods with a group of foresters and outdoorsmen, we reported here on a discussion we'd heard about the possibility of forming something like the Civilian Conservation Corps of pre-World War II days.

Several of the men in the party had had experience with the boys who came west to take over the barracks camps, build roads and trails, construct forest recreation facilities, do reforestation work, build firebreaks and fight fires, and generally effect a double rehabilitation—that of the forests and that of themselves.

Frequently these lads were the products of the slums of the East, and often were "tough cookies" themselves—boys who today would be called juvenile delinquents.

A rather amazing percentage of them, if we are rightly informed, went on from the CCC into constructive, useful lives.

How much credit the corps can take for this record is, of course, subject to debate. But many men who watched the tough boys from the streets of New York or Chicago change gradually into men who knew something of the outdoors, something of life, something of their fellow men, and something of responsibility, will swear that it was the turning point in more lives than a few.

The possibility of reviving the CCC or something like it has been broached every so often since the war.

The latest to do so is Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY, of Minnesota, who advocates a Youth Conservation Corps, to provide employment for boys of 16 or over.

After reading HUMPHREY's proposal, Bud Forrester, of the Pendleton East Oregonian talked to one of that newspaper's employees who came to Oregon with the CCC in 1937, who stayed, and who became a responsible citizen. He told Bud:

"There are 12 or 14 of us in and near Pendleton now and all of the fellows have made good. They came out of New York and New Jersey and if they hadn't had the opportunity to leave there I'm afraid it would have been a different story.

"Most of those guys were tough. We had gang fights in the CCC camp here in the beginning. Every guy wanted to show how tough he was. But it wasn't very long before it all got straightened out. Everybody liked his job. We realized that there wasn't any point in trying to prove how tough we were—that it didn't make any difference in this new setup. It was just the right thing for some tough guys from the big city."

And he added that he thought Senator HUMPHREY should add one provision to his proposal, that the boys enlisted in a YCC should first of all come from the slum areas of big cities. He said:

"They are the fellows who need help. The situation that many of those boys face is almost hopeless. Get them into the YCC first. Broaden the program later."

The proposal, on a national scale, is similar if not virtually identical to suggestions for young men's work camps in Oregon, except that the latter would enlist youngsters who had gotten into trouble, or were headed that way.

Such an organization wouldn't end juvenile delinquency overnight, or in any length of time, for the causes are too deep-seated in our society. But it would solve a lot of problems, particularly in the area of the tough guys who really shouldn't be sent to prison, nor yet should be set loose again with a wrist slap.

The costs of such a program would not be negligible, but when compared to the Federal military budget, say, they would amount to probably a tiny fraction of that total.

And who could calculate the good that would come out of it?

It would include the construction of Federal forest access roads, which are so badly needed to get out overripe timber; it would speed up the rehabilitation and construction of forest service and national park recreational facilities now so badly behind the demand, and it would provide the resources for much other work which would benefit the Nation on its Federal lands—work now going begging for lack of budget and personnel.

But most of all it would provide a place for young men to get into a relatively wholesome atmosphere, to gain self-respect, to learn the merits of a hard day's work.

YCC has much to be said for it.

C. R. "Pink" Gutermuth

OF
HON. LEE METCALF
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, February 9, 1959

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday night the National Association of Soil Conversation Districts conferred another honor upon one of this Nation's great conservationists.

At the annual banquet in Houston, Tex., the association gave C. R. "Pink" Gutermuth its distinguished service award.

NASCD President Nolen J. Faqua cited Gutermuth for his long years of successful effort in promoting management of the Nation's soil, water, wildlife and related sources. The award is given in recognition to soil conservation districts and in dedication to their principles of "Conservation—development—self-government." The association represents the more than 2,700 farmer-supervised soil conservation districts throughout the United States and its Territories.

Former recipients of the award include Ervin L. Peterson, Assistant Secretary, U.S. Department of Agriculture; Dr. Hugh H. Bennett, first Chief of the U.S. Soil Conservation Service; and Donald A. Williams, present SCS head.

Gutermuth has been the vice president of the institute, an influential private organization with headquarters in Washington, D. C., since 1946. Prior to that he was secretary of the American Wildlife Institute. He currently is a trustee and the secretary of the North American Wildlife Foundation, vice chairman of the Natural Resources Council of America, and a trustee of both the Wildlife Society and Stronghold, Inc. (Sugar Loaf Mountain, Md.).

He is chairman of the steering committe for the annual National Watershed Congress that is sponsored by more than 20 leading industrial, agricultural, and conservation organizations. From 1934 to 1942 he was first director of education and then director of fish and game of the Indiana Department of Conservation.

In 1957 he received the Leopold Medal of the Wildlife Society, the highest award of that professional organization of wildlife scientists.

Legislation To Prevent Free or Special Travel Rates to Government Officials on Private Passenger Vessels

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS M. PELLY
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, February 9, 1959

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce the introduction of a bill to regulate the granting of free or reduced travel rates to Federal employees and their families.

Last July, during House consideration of the conference report on a bill to authorize construction of two superliner passenger vessels, I expressed regret that the conferees had not retained a provision from the Senate version prohibiting private shipping lines from extending free or reduced rates to Government officials and their families. This new bill would correct that situation.

It has seemed to me that Members of Congress or anyone on the Government payroll either in the legislative, executive, or judicial branches, or any of their relatives, should not be permitted by law to receive favorable treatment as against the general public in travel. No such privilege is allowed in connection with air or rail transportation and I see no reason for there to be any difference when it comes to travel by water. It certainly is inappropriate for persons who adjudicate, regulate and negotiate as well as legislate on shipping matters to be recipients of special favors. The contracts and subsidies involved amount to hundreds of millions of dollars a year, and public confidence, it seems to me, requires a strict standard in this respect.

In my bill I make a distinction as to the historic custom of invitational cruises of newly constructed or modernized ships in that I specifically exempt excursion or trial run voyages when all guests are on an invitational basis.

My bill does not affect the right of the U.S. Government to contract with these same shipping companies for reduced rate costs involving the transportation of military or civilian personnel when such employees are traveling on official business and when such transportation costs are being paid by the U.S. Government.

My bill would restrict, however, any shipping company from giving to any official or employee of the U.S. Government or to any member of that employee's immediate family free or reduced transportation rates below those rates which are offered to the general public.

Legislation Amending the Federal Airport Act so as To Extend the Time for Making Grants for Community Airports Should Be Approved

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, February 9, 1959

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, this morning I appeared before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in support of legislation amending the Federal Airport Act in order to extend the time for making grants and so forth.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, 20TH DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA, BEFORE THE HOUSE INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE COMMITTEE, FEBRUARY 9, 1959, IN SUPPORT OF LEGISLATION TO EXTEND THE FEDERAL AIRPORT ACT

Mr. Chairman, as one who introduced a bill to amend the Federal Airport Act in order to extend the time for making grants and so forth, I appreciate this opportunity to appear before this committee in support of such legislation.

As many of you know, I represent the 20th District of Pennsylvania, comprising the counties of Blair, Centre, and Clearfield, and in this area the communities of Altoona, Du Bois, Philipsburg, and State College are interested in the legislation now under consideration.

For your information, Altoona is served by the Altoona-Blair County Airport located at Martinsburg, Pa.

At this moment the airport is undergoing expansion, and it is estimated that at least another $315,000 of Federal assistance will be needed to complete the modernization program.

In the case of Du Bois, Pa., the airport is under construction at this time with an estimated $300,000 in Federal funds being needed to complete the airport and make it operational.

At Philipsburg, Pa., the Black Moshannon Airport will need at least $100,000 in Federal funds to complete badly needed improvements including a terminal building, and so forth.

At State College, Pa., the site of the Pennsylvania State University, according to communications I have received, the sum of $100,000 in Federal funds will be needed to expand an existing and inadequate airport.

Mr. Chairman, in my three-county area the need of modern airports is acute.

The area is mountainous and what rail service we enjoyed the past many years is rapidly diminishing due to the curtailment of passenger service.

In the wintertime—and our winters are lengthy—travel by highway is precarious.

With the area being serviced by Allegheny Airlines, to obtain full enjoyment we need adequate airport facilities.

The communities which sponsor these airports through an airport authority organized for that purpose find it impossible even with State aid to finance the expansion and construction of airports.

Therefore, without Federal assistance the program of airport construction and expansion will come to a standstill.

It is for that reason I am appearing before this committee in support of legislation to extend the Federal Airport Act.

Rising Retail Food Costs Are Not Caused by Farm Price-Support Programs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALVIN E. O'KONSKI

OF WISCONSIN

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, payments to farmers for food products in 1957 were $19.5 billion, almost the same as the $19.2 billion paid in 1948, just 10 years earlier. This payment applies to food sold. It does not reflect the value of food produced on farms and used there by the farm family.

But the retail value of this same quantity of food in 1957 was $50.4 billion. This is what the consumer paid. It was only $39 billion in 1948. The increase in the marketing charge over the 10 years was $11.4 billion. This is the rising food cost to consumers.

These payments to farmers and retail values apply only to foods produced on farms in the United States and purchased at retail by consumers. The quantity was larger in 1957 than in 1948 because of the increase in population. The retail values are calculated in such a way that food eaten at restaurants is valued in terms of retail store prices.

The table below shows how these values and payments have changed during the 10 years under consideration.

Payments to farmers and marketing charges for farm food purchased by civilian consumers in the United States, 1948–57

[In billion dollars]

Year	Market value	Payment to farmers	Marketing charges from farm through retail store
1949	37.9	17.1	20.8
1950	38.9	17.7	21.2
1951	43.0	20.2	22.8
1952	44.5	20.1	24.4
1953	44.6	19.0	25.6
1955	46.2	18.3	27.9

During the years from 1948 through 1957, the population residing in the United States increased from 146 million persons to 170 million. This averages out at about 2.4 million more persons per year. But the farmers' take from feeding the smaller population in 1948 was $19.2 billion, whereas in 1957, 10 years later, it was $19.5 billion. This is no idle achievement. It shows that the farmers have been very efficient in providing the food supply. Less farmers providing more food each year have delivered enough for everyone with some added for export and at a lower gross cost in a period of serious inflation.

What caused the increase in food costs to consumers? Labor, transportation costs, and taxes seem to have been very important in the increased cost of distribution. Additional marketing services, particularly in packaging, and the preparation of these foods for retailing were also significant sources of increased distribution costs.

The justification of these increases in food costs to consumers is not questioned. If consumers want to purchase their food in more costly prepared forms, that fact alone is sufficient justification. But it is important that consumers should understand the reason for increased food costs. All too often the farmer is assumed to have received a comparable increase in income.

All too often the increase is attributed to price-support programs with respect to farm products. The data above, however, include farmers' total income from food products. His income attributable to price supports is included. The farmers' contribution to the consumers' food bill has not increased in the 10 years reviewed. Even when the increased quantities of food used by the growing population are added, the farmers' take did not increase, but since 1951 has generally declined.

Incomes to persons who are not farmers have increased steadily since the war. The cost of goods and services which farmers must buy has also increased. But farmers' cash incomes for the postwar period have been relatively static. These are facts which should be considered by those who would reduce price supports. Consumers of food have been getting a bargain, insofar as farmers are concerned.

The farmers as a group have a proud record in the past 10 years. Hunger in the United States has been greatly reduced. Important inroads have been made on hunger outside the United States. And all of this at prices which reflect the opposite of inflation in years when inflation has become our No. 1 national problem.

INFLATION HAS NOT AFFECTED BUTTER PRICES

Inflation, we are told, is one of the important problems of our time. Prices rise, and with them, the index of living costs also rises. In the case of butter, however, prices have declined. The average price of 92-score butter at wholesale in 1950 was 61.7 cents a pound. It rose to 72 cents in 1952, but since that time it declined until in 1958 the average price is 58.7 cents, 3 cents per pound less than in 1950. This shows that the farmers who produced milk for butter have not shared in any increase of income. Responsibility for inflation cannot be laid at the door of the dairy farmer. Consumers have been repaid for the tax cost of price support in their lower price for butter.

In 1950, the average retail price for butter was 72.9 cents a pound, and in 1958 it was 74.2 cents, an increase in cost of 1.3 cents per pound for this 8-year period. Retail prices also reached their peak in 1952, and since 1952 have declined, contrary to the general trend in prices. Whereas retail food prices increased by 30 percent between 1950 and 1957, butter prices increased less than 2 percent.

Butter: Retail and wholesale prices, 1950–58

Year	Wholesale price per pound 92°, Chicago	Retail price per pound United States

Interview With Hon. Theodore Francis Green, of Rhode Island—An Elder Statesman at 91 Looks at the World Today

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

OF MONTANA

Monday, February 9, 1959

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an interview with Senator GREEN, of Rhode Island, by the U.S. News & World Report, published in the issue of that magazine for February 13, 1959.

In my opinion, this interview with the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island is noteworthy, because it was participated in by a man who has seen much of the changing history of our country and the world. He has observed with wisdom and concern what has occurred and has, I believe, a good deal of good advice for the rest of us.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTERVIEW WITH SENATOR GREEN—AN ELDER STATESMAN AT 91 LOOKS AT THE WORLD TODAY

Question. Senator GREEN, what do you think is the most exciting period you've lived through?

Answer. Oh, I think this is.

Question. Why would you pick this period?

Answer. Well, I think possibly because more things are happening, faster and over a larger area. We are spreading out into other worlds now. And, partly because I am more susceptible to these changes, I find them more exciting.

Question. You are in the middle of them—

Answer. Yes, yes; I have a part in it and it is wonderful, I think—a wonderful time to be alive for any of us, but particularly those of us who possibly have something to do about it.

Sometimes it works the other way, of course, and it is depressing to think something ought to be done and it isn't, and you can't get it done, but I think it's better to try, even if you fail, than not to try.

Question. What is your general feeling, Senator, about the kind of world we are living in today, compared with earlier years?

Answer. Well, we are living so much faster today in every way—physically and every other way.

Question. Have you found that you can live more slowly than the general mass of the people?

Answer. No, I don't live any more slowly.

Question. Do you think things are moving in the right direction in Europe?

Answer. Well, we are moving so fast——

Question. Are they moving toward us, toward our ideas of what should be done?

Answer. Oh, I think so. I think the rest of the world is developing. They are going through some of the things we went through. The world has gotten so small now—we have to deal with the whole world. Even when I was a boy, our world was very much more limited than it is now.

Question. Are there many big men in the Senate today—and were there many big men years ago?

Answer. I don't think the big men in the Senate seemed as big at the time as they do now, when we look at it historically. Don't you think it makes a difference?

Question. Do you think the system of election by the legislatures gave us better men—more qualified men—than we get now through the primaries?

Answer. I don't think you had as great a variety. No, I think it's a better system—the elected system.

Question. In your quarter century on Capitol Hill, what changes in the service that Congress renders to the people have impressed you most? Hasn't it become more international minded?

Answer. Oh, yes, it has; but that isn't owing to Congress—that's owing to the world outside. I think the Congress has changed as the world has changed.

Question. We read in the papers all about the nuclear age. Are you fearful of our future? Do you think we're going to be destroyed?

Answer. What difference does it make?

Question. Does it make no difference?

Answer. No.

Question. Why? Are you a fatalist?

Answer. I'm going to do my duty as I see it as long as I'm here, and if I'm destroyed and everybody else is at the same time, what difference does it make—for me, for them, for any of us? Here where we are talking about all these worlds—suppose this earth is blown up by sputniks or some new inventions or discoveries.

Question. You don't have any fear about the future, then?

Answer. What is there to fear?

Question. Being blown up——

Answer. I fear a lot worse things might happen to us than being blown up.

Question. Should we stop worrying about it and get down to business?

Answer. That's right. It's our job to do the best we can with things as we find them—try to improve them—we can't make them perfect; we realize that.

Question. You don't think it's wise to look into the future too much?

Answer. Yes; I do. Look to the future. But I wouldn't worry about it. You can't change it probably very much—perhaps you can.

Question. Are you a fatalist? Do you believe what's going to happen is going to happen, anyway?

Answer. No. I think that men can do a great deal to affect their own careers and to affect the career of their country.

Question. Do you think there is much difference between the Republican and the Democratic Parties today?

Answer. I think it's much less than it has been.

Question. Have the Republicans come over toward the Democrats?

Answer. More of that than the other, yes. I think they have become more "liberal."

Question. Do you think the Democrats have become less "radical," and they have gone over to the middle of the road in both parties?

Answer. I haven't seen many signs of that.

Question. Do you think they are still as "radical" as they were in the thirties?

Answer. I think it sways back and forth a little bit. It's more the mood for the moment than it is the plan of the centuries. We're not planning for the good of the generation. Perhaps we ought to, but I don't think we do. How can you these days? A new invention comes along, and everything is changed in a week or a month or a year.

Question. Senator, you're a great traveler. Would you like to take a trip to the moon?

Answer. Yes, I would.

Question. You would volunteer to go on the first planet ship?

Answer. I never ask for invitations.

Question. You've been asked this a lot of times, but how do you account for the fact that you are looking so well at the age of 91?

Answer. Because I had a lot of warnings when I was young. I was an invalid. I had everything—all the usual children's diseases and a lot of extras—everything—pleurisy, pneumonia, typhoid fever—everything.

I was sick most of the time, so I couldn't go to school—not well enough when I was a little boy. I had tutors. Then I got better and better and, when I was old enough, my father sent me to a private school about a mile and a quarter north of where we lived. I remember the winter and I thought I would freeze to death. I withstood it and I got toughened up and I had all the other things I could have so I was pretty well after that and got better and better. I became interested in athletics.

Question. Do you still walk back and forth to the Capitol every day?

Answer. I frequently walk up in the morning—that's 2½ miles.

Question. Do you do any other exercising?

Answer. It all depends on whether I can find the time. Now it gets worse and worse. The longer I am here the worse it is—the less time there is.

Question. You played tennis until recently——

Answer. Yes, I played until about 2 years ago. It was a question of time more than anything. I like to play singles better than doubles.

Question. Do you exercise in the gym now, Senator?

Answer. I don't get time. I wish I did.

Question. You did that regularly for many years——

Answer. Yes, yes. I've had less and less time for myself.

DIET: "I EAT ANYTHING"

Question. Do you follow any particular diet?

Answer. No, no—luckily. I go out to so many dinner parties that I eat anything that is put before me.

Question. And you live through it?

Answer. Yes.

Question. You've spent a good deal of time abroad in recent years, haven't you?

Answer. Well, yes, I went abroad first in 1889. My grandfather thought that a young man—had the old idea about "finishing"—he ought to be "finished" by a trip abroad. I thought it was a very good idea, so he sent my two cousins who were just a little bit older and myself on a grand tour of Europe.

Question. And you have been going pretty regularly ever since?

Answer. Off and on.

Question. But in the last few years you've made official trips abroad, haven't you?

Answer. Yes.

Question. There has been a lot of criticism of our educational methods——

Answer. Oh, I don't think that boys and girls study here as hard as they do abroad.

Question. Should they study harder?

Answer. They should. But I don't think they do.

Question. You went to college both in Europe and here. How would you compare the two?

Answer. Well, it depends. They prepare you for a different life, perhaps. You usually decide there much earlier than you do here what you are going to do in life. In some ways one is ahead, and in some ways the other.

But I do think that, for instance, a German boy had to study a little harder than any American boy that I knew here. I know one of my friends, I remember in those days, could recite a whole book of poetry—I mean the whole thing right straight through—and things like that. They memorize a great deal.

Question. Does that train the mind very much?

Answer. That's one kind of training and the other is to develop your powers of thinking and reasoning. There are different parts of your human brain that you want to develop more.

Question. Do they narrow down the people they are going to educate?

Answer. The universities there had a different standard right along. They didn't care whether you studied or not. It was up to you. I don't think there was any more responsibility developed there than here. I regret to find the tendency seems to be the other way here.

They build these dormitories, for instance, at colleges, and they used to be standing free. Now they like to build them with moats around them, so the boys can't get in and out easily. They have to go through the gates—like they do it in English colleges. They keep tabs on them—when they go out, when they go in.

In Germany they go to the other extreme. They don't pay much attention to the boys. If they want to get a degree, they've got to pass an examination. In order to pass the examination, they've got to study hard to do it.

Question. They put the responsibility on the youth rather than on the teacher?

Answer. That's right.

Question. Do you think an individual's life is fuller now than it was when you were a small boy?

Answer. I think so. I think the average individual life is too crowded. That's the reason they do most things half well.

Question. Is that true on Capitol Hill?

Answer. Yes, certainly.

Question. Who was the first President of the United States you remember, Senator?

Answer. I've known every President—I've met personally every President—beginning with Hayes. Except Garfield—I never met Garfield.

Question. Of the Presidents you have known, which one has impressed you most?

Answer. I haven't known many of them intimately. I've known both Roosevelts—Theodore and Franklin—very well, indeed. I admired Woodrow Wilson very much indeed. He was a scholar, made great sacrifices—he'd go the limit. He practically died for his country. And he had a clean mind, clear. He was more scholarly than those I've known. He worked a great many reforms. He had a deep knowledge of government; he impressed me that way.

Question. Who do you think was the best politician of the Presidents?

Answer. I think Franklin Roosevelt.

Question. How about Teddy Roosevelt? He was pretty successful——

Answer. Not as good. He came to Providence, when he was first running, and he made a rather antiprotection speech. As the subject of tariffs was foremost in the minds of most conservative Rhode Islanders, that was the wrong speech to make there. I am told he never mentioned that subject again during his New England campaign.

I was very fond of him. I knew him very well, indeed. I stayed at his house. I had a standing invitation—a room at my disposal whenever I wanted to go and stay there.

Question. Even though you were a Democrat?

Answer. Yes; I knew all his family well.

I shocked him sometimes. I remember one Sunday morning he came downstairs in his togs—"Rough Rider" stuff—and I didn't have any. And he said, "Here, take an ax. Come out and help me chop down some trees."

And I said, "Well, I won't come down and help you chop down some of your trees because I've got on my 'Sunday-go-to-meeting' clothes, but I'll come around and boss the job." And I realize this was something terrible, and a sort of gasp went around the room because I had the nerve to say that to the President.

He asked me to be his campaign manager when he ran on the Bull Moose ticket. I had just come back from my first experience of a Democratic National Convention in Baltimore. When I got home, I found this request from Roosevelt to be his campaign manager for New England. Of course, I wasn't going to do it, couldn't do it, and had to write him to that effect.

But I ran for Governor that year and I never mentioned the fact—and there was a Bull Moose ticket in Rhode Island, too, but I didn't think it was decent to take advantage of a friendship and hurt him. And so I didn't and I got licked, but that wasn't the only cause.

Well, anyway, I never told anybody about it, except a few intimate friends who wouldn't tell. And I was staying, a couple years afterward—they were having a dinner party at Sagamore Hill, and somebody said, "Well, Mr. President, I guess nobody ever turned you down when you asked for anything."

"Oh, yes," he said, "they did, and he is right at this table now." Then he told the story.

Question. Senator, does government better serve the interest of the people today than when you were trying to bring about governmental reforms in Rhode Island back in the thirties?

Answer. Oh, I don't know. I can't compare those parts of the government. I think that Rhode Island and Pennsylvania were supposed to be the worst-governed States in the Union then. And by the time I got through with my State—I was elected Governor and I changed over the whole government—everything, including the whole supreme court and everything else.

Question. Senator, when you changed over the whole government, do you mean that you changed the people in it, or did you change the system—reorganize the government itself?

Answer. I reorganized it. I had the same constitution and the same laws. I changed those gradually, too.

Question. What changes did you bring? How were you able to get hold of the situation?

Answer. In the 1934 election I got a majority in both the senate and the house.

On January 2, 1935, the date of my second inauguration as Governor, the general assembly met at noon and I was sworn in for my second term about 11 p.m. that night.

Previous to my being sworn in, the house and senate met and several measures which had been carefully prepared as a result of several very secret meetings held at my home in Providence were introduced and passed immediately. I remember one bill vacated the five supreme court places held by the Republicans. The grand committee of the general assembly then elected five new judges—three Democrats and two Republicans.

At that time we had in Providence a Republican State board of public safety which really controlled the Democratic city of Providence.

The general assembly passed a bill repealing the State Board of Public Safety Act, and I named Ed Kelly superintendent of State police and temporary safety director for the city of Providence.

This bill passed the general assembly about 10:30 p.m. on the night of January 2, and I recall very well that I had my secretary, Eddie Higgins, take my car and chauffeur and deliver personally, at that time of night, letters from me to the board of public safety letting them know that they had been fired. The next morning I saw many broad smiles on the faces of the policemen and firemen in the city of Providence.

The assembly, at my suggestion, abolished the office of finance commissioner and created the office of budget director and comptroller—the appointee to be named by the Governor. We also had a bill passed declaring vacant the office of high sheriff of Providence County and reduced the term from 5 to 3 years.

We also passed bills that day restoring home rule to a number of cities and towns. The control of cities and towns had been taken away from these municipalities and placed in the hands of this Republican-controlled machine.

We passed a bill that day providing for the consolidation of about 80 overlapping bureaus and commissions. We set up this reorganization to take effect in 60 days and created under it 11 new departments in the State government.

I recall that at that time Colonel McCormick, of the Chicago Tribune, became very upset about what we did in Rhode Island, and the story is to the effect that he cut out one of the stars from the American flag which hung in the Chicago Tribune Building. From what I am told, someone tipped the colonel off that he was desecrating the flag, and he had it removed from the lobby. I did not know for years why the colonel was interested in Rhode Island politics, but I later found out that one of the stockholders of the Tribune lived in Rhode Island and was very active in Republican circles.

One incident I recall regarding the so-called bloodless revolution on the night of January 2, 1935, is regarding the Republican judges who were still in office. As I recall it, the judges were in a committee room waiting to be escorted to my second inauguration. Of course, there was considerable delay because the general assembly was busy passing these bills and I was busy signing them.

The judges sent some of their sheriffs out to find out what was going on and they soon learned that they might be out of office shortly. In order to save them some embarrassment, I went down to the committee room and saw the chief justice and the presiding justice of the superior court. I told them what was going to happen.

As a matter of fact, the legislature was at that moment passing the bills vacating their offices. I suggested that they might be somewhat disconcerted if they were to stay around, and I understand that they called their sheriffs and all went back to the courthouse.

The next day they were all out of office at 12 noon and the new supreme court, which had been elected in grand committee and sworn in by me, had taken over the supreme court chambers.

LAWYER AND BUSINESSMAN

Question. Senator GREEN, it isn't often that someone serves in business and public life as many years as you have. Did you start as a lawyer?

Answer. Yes. I went to college—Brown, and Harvard Law School, then to the universities of Bonn and Berlin. Then I came back and I practiced law—went in with my father.

The eldest son in every generation is a lawyer. My great-grandfather, the eldest son, was a lawyer. His eldest son, my grandfather, was a lawyer. My father, the eldest, was a lawyer. I was the eldest son, so I am a lawyer. I am not married. My eldest nephew of the name is a lawyer, and I take for granted his son is going to be a lawyer.

Question. How long did you practice law?

Answer. I still am, I suppose—theoretically, anyway. I have a law office in Providence.

Question. Then you went into business after that?

Answer. I never ceased being a lawyer—I am still a lawyer.

Question. You were head of a bank in Providence. Did you give full time to that?

Answer. I couldn't give full time to all these different things, although I did them all contemporaneously. I was chairman of the Providence Plantations Bank; I started it, and I am still chairman of the board, and I know they don't resent that I hang on because, on my 90th birthday, they gave me a large silver punchbowl and ladle.

And I was president of the J. P. Coates Co., the thread company.

Question. You were also a director of the National Exchange Bank in Providence?

Answer. Yes, for many years.

Question. You were officer and director of various railroad companies?

Answer. All of them in Rhode Island.

Question. You've also had an active participation in some of the public institutions there, too. You are a member of the board of fellows and a trustee in Brown University.

Answer. Oh, that's just like being loyal to the family. Ever since Brown University started—except for half a dozen years some member of my family has been on the board of trustees.

My great-great-grandfather's brother was the first—and for 2 months he was the only—student in the college. They had a president and only one student. So nobody can date further back than that, you see, or as far back. So I am a trustee, I am a member of the board of fellows, I am the senior fellow. When the president is absent, then the senior member of the board of fellows takes his place. So I've been president of that, too.

Question. Before you were elected Governor of Rhode Island in 1932, you had already lived a pretty full life. When you became Governor you were 64—an age when most people are retiring. Was the governorship your first elective office?

Answer. No; 25 years before I was elected to the general assembly. That's the first taste I had of politics, the first active part I had in public office.

I was on some good-government drive—they had a terribly rotten machine in Rhode Island—and I saw the rotten government we had. Rhode Island and Pennsylvania were the worst governed States in the Union. "Corrupted, contented," was the combination of adjectives there—it applied to both—and I said, "Well, I am going to change this if I can."

So I started out then and I ran for public office and got licked most times. For 25 years off and on I ran for something—the general assembly or Congress or something or other. I was elected Governor in 1912 but firmly believed as do many others, that I was counted out by the then Republican-controlled State board of elections. The Republican machine controlled everything, including the courts.

Question. How did you overcome that?

Answer. Well, I kept on running and I guess they got tired of voting against me.

NO PLANS TO RETIRE

Question. Do you plan to stay in the Senate?

Answer. In the last campaign they said I was too old to run. At first I thought the proper thing was to ignore it. Then I said it was going too far, I guess I would have to tackle it—so I did. And I said I intended to stay in the Senate until I was 100.

Question. How old was your last opponent?

Answer. Middle aged.

Question. Did you have much difficulty with that campaign?

Answer. No; I had more votes than I ever had before. Every time I have run I have gotten more than I have the time before.

Question. You have gottten practice each time. What's the secret of that success?

Answer. Honesty is the best policy. You'll find it so as you grow up.

Statement of General Pate Before the Senate Armed Services Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARK W. THOMPSON

OF TEXAS

Monday, February 9, 1959

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I desire to insert in the RECORD the recent statement of the Commandant of the Marine Corps, General Pate, before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

It is a precise factual document. It lists in factual language the repeated instances during the past year when our ready Marine forces have had to move rapidly in response to emergency. Our need for this professional amphibious force in readiness in these tense times is starkly apparent from this mere recital of the record.

There follows an equally dispassionate account of the effect of the deep cuts in the Marine Corps which have been directed by the Pentagon. Without editorial comment, the effect of a cut of 25,000 Marines below the 200,000 the Congress considered minimum, and appropriated for, is factually set forth in terms of deactivated combat battalions and aircraft squadrons, and continued maintenance of remaining units at reduced strengths.

General Pate's statement is a simple, dignified statement of facts.

I consider it of such importance that I most urgently ask that all Members find time to study it with care.

For in it we see the actual results of the continued failure of the Pentagon to heed the most carefully considered and clearly expressed judgment of the Congress on a matter of vital importance to the Nation's military policy.

We have determined and provided by law that the Marine Corps shall be organized into three combat divisions and three air wings. We have determined that a strength of 200,000 is the minimum necessary to enable the Marine Corps to comply with the law. We have appropriated the funds necessary to maintain a Marine Corps of 200,000. We have stated our intent regarding this small, professional force in readiness in the most clear, simple and unmistakable words. The Senate Armed Services Committee, for example, used these words:

> This decision to appropriate the funds necessary for a 200,000-man Marine Corps was made with full consideration of the fiscal and military implications. The committee desires that it be clearly understood by appropriate agencies in the executive branch of the Government that it is the clear-cut intent of the committee, and of the proposed appropriating legislation, that the Marine Corps be maintained at the strength of 200,000.

It is against this background that we must assess the Pentagon's order to cut the Marine Corps by 25,000 below what the Congress considered an absolute minimum. We are seeing a deliberate stripping from the Congress of constitutionally imposed responsibility.

This is the true impact of General Pate's plain statement of the facts.

Never has the need been greater for our Nation to possess this combat-ready Marine striking force to respond to any of the potential crises that confront us. Only with such a force as we possess in our Fleet Marine Forces can we apply the proper amount of military pressure to protect American interests, carry out our national policies, and at the same time prevent a localized fire from spreading into a worldwide holocaust.

It just does not make sense to extend the draft and force into Army service unwilling—at least unenthusiastic—recruits while at the same time we arbitrarily direct the reduction of 25,000 hard, lean, highly professional, completely volunteer marines. It does not make sense to say that we can maintain our strength for limited war by reducing each of our divisions by two battalion landing teams—for a total of six battalion landing teams out of the 27 we now have in our Marine Corps.

I am convinced that this arbitrary reduction of the Marine Corps to 175,000 is the deliberate, chosen method of the Pentagon for undermining and vitiating the provisions of Public Law 416 of the 82d Congress, very appropriately known as the Vinson bill after our distinguished chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, who was largely responsible for conceiving, sponsoring, and the ultimate passage of the law that requires three combat divisions and three air wings in the Marine Corps.

The continuing series of crises which have characterized the East-West conflict in the past few years have completely vindicated the position taken by the Honorable CARL VINSON in insisting that this bill be passed and thus provide the Nation with such a striking force of marines. In spite of this congressional foresight the Pentagon, unfortunately, has seen fit to disregard the provisions of the statute and the intent and desire of Congress when we appropriated the money to give meaningful effect to the provisions of the Vinson bill.

The argument that the Marine Corps is stronger by reducing its forces and disbanding a large portion of its combat units in the divisions cannot be understood except as a smoke screen behind which there is a deliberate effort on the part of the Pentagon—which stubbornly opposed the original passage of the Vinson bill—to erode and destroy its provisions. No other conclusion can be drawn from the action that is now taking place in refusing to apply the funds to provide the forces for which they were appropriated.

This is not only a matter of straight military policy. Even more strikingly it poses in crystal clear form the deep issue between the legislative and executive branches in the field of defense policy.

I am not one of those who feels that Congress should go into details of the direction of the Armed Forces. The use of the Armed Forces is the clear-cut prerogative of the President in his role of Commander in Chief. However, the Constitution places squarely upon Congress the inescapable responsibility of providing and maintaining those forces. This responsibility is not one that Congress can pass on to the Executive, nor is it one which in good conscience Congress can let go by default.

The Attorney General of the United States speaking of the power of Congress to raise and support armies and to provide and maintain a Navy has stated:

> This power to raise and support armies and provide and maintain a Navy is plenary and without limitation or restriction, and Congress is the sole judge of how the Army or Navy shall be raised and of what it shall be composed (27 Op. Att'y. Gen. 259).

I know of nothing which has changed the correctness of that opinion. Indeed I am convinced that legally only a constitutional amendment could strip the Congress of the powers so precisely delineated by the Attorney General. I may also note that supine acquiescence by a legislative branch which abdicates its responsibilities to a faceless, general staff type of executive omniscience will just as certainly accomplish the same perversion of the wise separation of power established by Founding Fathers.

We live in perilous times.

The Congress, after exhaustive, careful hearings rejected the proposal of an administration which insists on a Marine Corps of 175,000 as adequate to our needs.

Even as the Congress determined a ready force of 200,000 marines is vital to the Nation's security in these troubled times, the twin crises of Lebanon and Taiwan force an admission of Pentagon error when a Marine Corps of 190,000 is kept in hand to deal with these relatively mild examples of the Communist policy of constant pressure against the free world.

Then as the order is issued to execute the cut to 175,000 the Secretary of Defense tells the Nation that our military policy must be shaped with the lessons of Lebanon and Taiwan in mind.

Do these lessons justify a 12½-percent cut below appropriated strength in what is already the smallest of our active services?

How do they justify this cut—400 percent greater in relation to appropriated strength than that imposed on any other service—in the very forces which were able to respond most rapidly, most precisely, when Lebanon demanded action in a matter of hours?

No one has answered these questions.

No once can. For the true answer is that we are witnessing a return to the disastrous reasoning of the Louis Johnson school—the Alice in Wonderland theory that we gain strength through weakness.

Only strong, decisive, and immediate action by the Congress can reverse our course.

Never has the foresight of our distinguished colleague from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] the sponsor of the Marine Corps bill, been more thoroughly vindicated than in the past year as well as the continuing crises which characterize the probings and incursions of Communist aggression.

Never has the Nation's need for a small professional force in readiness such as the Marine Corps been greater than it is today.

General Pate's statement follows:

STATEMENT OF GEN. R. MCC. PATE, U.S. MARINE CORPS, COMMANDANT OF THE MARINE CORPS, BEFORE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE, U.S. SENATE, JANUARY 26, 1959

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the Marine Corps deeply appreciates the interest you have always shown in our affairs. We welcome opportunities such as this to appear before you, and to report on our status. In general, I feel this committee is quite familiar with the Marine Corps. We are guided by the missions which Congress has assigned us. For the purposes of this meeting I will not make a lengthy statement, but will confine my remarks to two main points: (1) A summary of our activities during the past year; and (2) our plans, programs, and capabilities for the coming year.

During 1958, the basic deployment of our Fleet Marine Forces, which we have maintained for the past several years, was found responsive to the realities of global military pressures. One division and one aircraft wing were maintained on the east coast of the United States with the Atlantic Fleet. At least one battalion landing team of that force was normally on rotational deployment with the 6th Fleet in the Mediterranean. Two divisions and two aircraft wings were assigned to the Pacific Fleet, one division and one aircraft wing operating on the west coast, and one division and one aircraft wing in the western Pacific. The latter division/wing team was under operational control of the 7th Fleet. This distribution of our forces provided for an amphibious capability in each of the great ocean areas.

To render these deployments meaningful, our Fleet Marine Forces were constantly prepared for combat action. The state of their readiness was several times demonstrated, when world events called for limited military action by the United States.

In May 1958, incident to the Vice President's visit to Caracas, Venezuela, elements of the east coast team deployed. Two rifle companies of a battalion landing team were airlifted to Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and embarked aboard the cruiser Boston; a third rifle company was lifted from the parade-ground at Camp Lejeune by helicopters which then accompanied them on board the carrier Tarawa to join U.S.S. Boston.

In the summer, world attention was focused on Lebanon, where the orderly processes of constitutional government were endangered. As tension mounted, the normal amphibious troop strength of the 6th Fleet was increased. An additional battalion landing team was provided in May; in late June a third departed its east coast base. On July 14, the Lebanese President sent an urgent request to our Government for assistance. As the Nation's initial response to that request, the 6th Fleet quickly landed the three battalions of Marines—the first one hit the beach on the 15th of July at the precise hour directed by President Eisenhower. The prompt arrival of those units had a stabilizing effect on a very explosive situation, and ultimately the Lebanese were given an opportunity to work out a Lebanese solution to a Lebanese problem.

In late August, there was need to reinforce the air defense of Taiwan. Marine Air Group 11, stationed in Japan, was alerted for the purpose. The fighter squadrons flew off at once; but it is a mark of the mobility of the entire unit that within 12 days after its new base field was designated, the entire group—aircraft and ground support units alike—had moved their personnel and equipment 1,300 miles by sea and were effectively contributing operational support to units already at Taiwan.

Each of the incidents I have mentioned constituted a real emergency. In each one, the amphibious forces demonstrated professional competence in responding to the requirements of their role in our national defense. As a result of careful prior preparation they reacted immediately, using normal task groupings and communications, and without last minute, frantic planning. They moved at once to the trouble area, and they remained in the area until their presence was no longer required. The real mobility of naval forces was thus made apparent, and the true nature of the fleet's readiness demonstrated. No international political arrangements were necessary to permit the movement of these units. They were free to anticipate international events. They needed no rights of transit; and their own strength and self-sufficiency gave them ability to stay as long as their presence was needed.

So much for 1958. Now let me turn to our plans, programs and capabilities for this year.

The Reorganization Act of 1958 will necessitate no change in Marine Corps operations. Under its provisions we will continue to do what we have done in the past; that is, equip our troops, train them in the specialized techniques of amphibious warfare, then assign them to appropriate field commands. However, we do so in a somewhat different way than do the other services. The bulk of our Marine fighting forces are assigned directly to the principal fleets of the Navy. They become an organic part of the fleets to give them balance and complete the flexibility of their striking power. The fleets, in turn, are assigned directly to the several unified commands. Their commanders thus possess a ready amphibious arm which they may deploy in any locality bordering on the seven seas.

We started this year with a strength of approximately 187,500 officers and men. Right now, today, we have about 185,000. We will continue to decline as we implement the directive to reduce to a strength of 175,000 by June 30 of this year. Our supporting base, and the security forces which we must provide to other Government agencies, have already been reduced. Their strengths have reached the minimum consistent with efficient operation for the forces and missions presently assigned. For this reason, reductions have to be made in our combat units—the Fleet Marine Force. To effect this, we have two alternatives. We can either provide fewer and fewer men to the units than their tables of organization call for, or we can deactivate units.

In fiscal year 1958, with a ceiling of 188,000 personnel, we had a personnel availability in our Fleet Marine Forces equivalent to 8 battalion landing teams per division or a total of 24 within the Fleet Marine Forces. However, I chose to retain the full structure of 27 battalion landing teams in the 3 divisions and levy reductions across the board.

However, during the past year our experience in Lebanon and the Far East clearly demonstrated to us the fallacy of maintaining units at levels seriously below combat strength. I have therefore abandoned this philosophy, and returned to one of maintaining our battalion landing teams at full combat strength. This, linked with the further reduction to 175,000, has required me to deactivate 2 of the battalion landing teams in each of our 3 divisions. Thus our 3 Marine divisions will be reduced from a total of 27 to a total of 21 battalions. All remaining divisional units can then be maintained at not less than 90 percent of their table of organization strength. Also, by June 30, 6 aircraft squadrons and 100 additional aircraft will be deleted from our 3 aircraft wings. Some other reductions in our combat strength will be entailed, but I have mentioned the principal ones.

Elsewhere in the personnel field, in order to get every possible benefit from our Marines, we are making strenuous efforts to improve quality, to keep commitments for housekeeping and support functions to a minimum, and to reduce individual training requirements wherever possible.

These programs are meeting with considerable success. For example, the reenlistment rate for first enlistees has increased from approximately 17 percent in fiscal year 1957 to 25.4 percent in the first 5 months of fiscal year 1959. Added to this, the trend among first enlistees is to sign for 4 rather than 3 years. Last year only 21 percent chose the 4-year term. This has increased to a high last month of 89 percent of 4-year enlistees. The trend should continue. The combined effect of these programs will lead to a significant reduction in our training load, higher quality marines and increased readiness.

Throughout the past year, the Fleet Marine Forces carried out a number of exercises, battalion size and larger, aimed at the improvement of old and the perfection of new techniques of amphibious warfare. Each exercise was in every sense a rehearsal for combat. Each exercise, regardless of size, involved the interplay of Marine air and ground units operating as a team with Navy amphibious forces. This mode of operations is a hallmark of our composition and doctrine, exemplifying, with the Navy, the essential qualities of modern war on the land, on the sea, and in the air. We have another full schedule of exercises planned for this year. Through them we will maintain our readiness for any eventuality.

In all of our exercises and in all of our training, we are stressing modern techniques of amphibious operations—the vertical envelopment concept. The helicopter assault landing capability, which we developed, is a reality now, and it is growing in potential from year to year.

The assault elements of our divisions are organized to make them transportable by helicopter. The structure of each Marine aircraft wing on the Atlantic coast, the Pacific coast, and in the western Pacific provides for a balanced helicopter group in each locality.

In order that helicopter capabilities can be employed in amphibious operations, carrier decks are required. In the Pacific, the Navy has one aircraft carrier specially converted for use as a helicopter platform. This is U.S.S. Thetis Bay, a former escort carrier which in 1955 underwent minor conversion and overhaul to give it a troop-carrying capability, and to facilitate the handling of helicopters. Marines have used it extensively. It has provided the naval amphibious forces with much valuable experience, both in perfecting modern amphibious techniques and for ideas of design to be incorporated in new construction vessels. However, Thetis Bay provides vertical assault capability for less than one battalion and only in one ocean. More is needed.

The Navy's approved shipbuilding program will provide two carriers specially designed for the purpose in 1962, but the problem cannot be put off until then. We feel there is urgent requirement that greatly increased helicopter lift capabilities be available to the fleets right now.

The chief of naval operations and I have, after much study, arrived at an interim solution. By providing additional marines to augment the Marine detachment to help fill out their crew, two—and possibly three—CVS-type carriers can be kept in service and devoted to helicopter operations. We have determined that a Marine detachment of 10 officers and 323 enlisted men will be required for each carrier designated, and I have agreed to furnish those marines. The Marine detachments, organized into two companies, will perform assigned air, guard, supply, communication and other support duties appropriate for marines. I might point out that this solution to our problem is only possible because of the close and intimate association of the Navy and Marine Corps over the years.

In the Atlantic area the amphibious forces inaugurated the use of the carrier Boxer early this month. In addition to U.S.S. Princeton, to be assigned to the amphibious forces in March, one more carrier is under consideration for assignment at a later date. These vessels are not ideal for efficient helicopter operations, nor for amphibious troops habitability, but they do provide a significant increase in our combat potential. They enable us to apply modern doctrine in our amphibious operations.

Any comment on our combat readiness would be most incompetent without mention of the Marine Corps Reserve. We place great reliance upon it. In the event of mobilization, our reserve will provide us immediately backup strength.

Our Ready Reserve comprises 208,000 men. Of these, some 43,000 are organized into drill-pay units. Drill-pay unit training programs maintain these units in a state of readiness that makes them immediately available for mobilization.

The balance of our reserves would be called to duty and placed in combat units as quickly as refresher training could bring them up to Fleet Marine Force standards. Right now I am proud to say our reserve is in the highest state of readiness we have ever achieved short of full mobilization.

Gentlemen, I have summarized briefly our accomplishments during the past year, and indicated our posture for the year ahead. As it always has been, it is now—a posture of preparedness. Everything we have available to us today is in the highest state of readiness we know how to achieve. You have my assurance it will be kept that way.

Kentucky's Future—Soil and Water Conservation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM H. NATCHER
OF KENTUCKY
Monday, February 9, 1959

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, for the second consecutive year a young man from the Second Congressional District of Kentucky has won first place in the soil conservation essay contest. This year's recipient of the award is Glenn C. Dockery, a 17-year-old Ohio County high school senior. He is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Owen Dockery and resides on rural Route 1, Beaver Dam, Ky. Glenn's essay entitled "Kentucky's Future—Soil and Water Conservation," was judged best from a record number of 31,426 written by grade and high school students in 118 Kentucky soil conservation districts. This honor which has been bestowed upon Glenn C. Dockery is to be coveted and is one of which he has every right to be proud. Not only in this particular instance, but by other means he has set an example which can well be emulated by young people throughout Kentucky. He has served as vice president of the Beaver Dam Chapter of the National Honor Society and as treasurer of his high school junior class. This year he is president of the honor society and vice president of the science club. Also he is a member of the student council and the junior conservation club.

Over the years the young men and women of the Second Congressional District of Kentucky have manifested a deep interest and concern in agricultural pursuits, and, by virtue thereof, have received recognition for their accomplishments. In addition to Glenn C. Dockery, winners in this year's soil conservation essay contest from our district are:

Jean Goodman, Scottsville, Allen County; Johnnie Hines, Hardinsburg, Breckinridge County; G. McCoy, Morgantown, Butler County; Mary Alice Wethington, Utica, Daviess County; Jackey Pearl, Big Clifty, Grayson County; Jacqueline Stephens, Pellville, Hancock County; Brenda Briscoe, Hebbardsville, Henderson County; Lena Villines, Nebo, Hopkins County; Sarah Miller, Sacramento, McLean County; Joyce DeBruler, Fordsville, Ohio County; Lynn Caudill, Franklin, Simpson County; Shelby Woodring, Morganfield, Union County; Joe R. Cowles, Bowling Green, Warren County.

Mr. Speaker, soil and water conservation means a great deal to the State of Kentucky. Not only are the people of Kentucky, generally, aware of the necessity for a soil and water conservation program, but our young poeple have been well instructed along such lines, as evidenced by Glenn C. Dockery. The awards received by him and the other boys and girls are indicative of the outstanding work being done by our Soil Conservation Service under able and conscientious leaders. The young people who reside in the congressional district which I have the honor to represent belong to the different farm organizations such as the Future Farmers of America, Future Homemakers of America, and 4-H Clubs. I am justifiably proud of our future farmers and homemakers. I am thankful for the enormous potential that resides in the youth of our land. I feel that such potential for good is being fully realized. As our youth see, they understand, and as they hear, they are comprehending the truth so that they and all the citizens of our land may live more abundantly.

The National Debt: Cheaper To Pay Than To Owe

OF
HON. JIM WRIGHT
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, February 9, 1959

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, our national debt stands today at $283 billion.

In the new fiscal year we shall be paying $8.1 billion in interest.

The trend toward higher interest indicates clearly that the Government soon will be paying 3.5 percent on all its obligations, or a total annual interest of $9.8 billion, assuming the total dcbt remains unchanged.

This means that, of every dollar paid in Federal taxes, approximately 11 cents must go for carrying charges on the debt.

It means also that, if things go along exactly as they have been going, without any change in the total debt and with the Government having to pay 3.5 percent interest on its borrowings, in 28 years we will have paid the total amount of the debt, but we will still owe all of it.

This is a tremendous amount to pay in interest, for which our Government and our Nation get nothing in return. It is the price we are paying simply for the privilege of owing this huge debt.

Of course, so long as we have the debt, the carrying charges must be paid. There is no alternative, unless we were to mimic the Soviet Government and repudiate our obligation to those of our citizens who have loaned money to their Government. This would be so utterly unthinkable that it shames us even to mention it.

HOW MUCH IS $9.8 BILLION?

But the interest charges on our public debt have grown so large that they constitute today an immense burden upon the taxpayers of our Nation. They amount to almost $10 billion annually in deadweight.

As we struggle this year to strike a precarious budget balance in face of national needs, inflationary pressures and high taxes, anyone can think of a thousand beneficial uses for this $9.8 billion annually.

It could build some 15,000 miles of superhighways of the most modern design each year, and thus complete the entire 41,000-mile Interstate Highway program in less than 3 years.

Or, applied to development of the Nation's water resources, it could complete in 1 year three times as many flood control and navigational projects as have been authorized for the next 10 years.

Applied to soil conservation for the saving of our Nation's most indispensable wealth, it could perform more useful works in 1 year than we have devoted to this awesomely important task in the past 25 years, inclusively, or perhaps in the entire history of our Nation.

It could purchase some 700 B–58's, more than we would ever need of the world's best, most sophisticated and most costly weapons system; whereas we are struggling along today purchasing between 30 and 40 a year and wondering nervously if these are enough to serve their minimum purpose of deterring aggression.

Or, considered another way, this $9.8 billion if returned to the taxpayers on an equal prorata basis would mean that the average taxpaying family head could pay some $275 less in taxes every year.

LET'S MAKE A PLAN TO PAY IT OFF

In the interest of our own generation and of generations yet to come, I believe we should make a positive resolution and develop a definite plan of systematic debt retirement. I firmly believe the American public expects such leadership from the National Congress and will be disappointed if we fail to provide it.

I have today introduced a concurrent resolution which would set forth such a plan. It would express the sense of Congress that in each succeeding year we should pay on the principal an amount equal to not less than 1 percent of the present indebtedness.

In other words, the present Congress would be pledging ourselves—and insofar as it is within the power of this Congress we would be calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury and future Congresses—to pay an amount not less than $2.8 billion annually to the reduction and eventual retirement of this burdensome national obligation.

Such payments, of course, would be in addition to the interest payments which we are obliged to pay and over which we seem to have no control. But as the principal decreased, the interest would decrease. In 100 years, the debt would be completely paid and the slate wiped clean.

Under this plan, as I shall point out, we would actually pay many billions of dollars less over the next 100 years, in both principal and interest, than we shall be compelled to pay in interest alone if no such course is embarked upon.

In the beginning, to be sure, it would be an additional burden of expense. But it would be an honest burden, honestly assumed. It shall have to be undertaken someday, and the sooner we face up to it, the less costly it will be to our progeny.

CHEAPER TO PAY THAN TO OWE

If we can demonstrate the self-discipline, Mr. Speaker, to chart such a path and stick to it, we can reach a point in 29 years at which we shall have reduced the debt to a level where we will be paying no more in both principal and interest than we now are being called upon to pay in interest alone.

For the basic figures upon which I found this approach, I am indebted to a man named R. S. Shade, who lives in Tulsa, Okla. He has worked out a table of payments based upon a $2.8 billion application to principal and allocation of interest at 3.5 percent on the unpaid balance.

In profound but simple terms, these figures reveal the amazing and yet inescapable fact that it is more than $485 billion cheaper to pay off the debt in 100 years than it would be simply to continue paying the interest for that period of time.

In 100 years we could completely retire the debt by paying $495 billion in interest and $283 billion of principal, or a total of $778 billion. But if we pay nothing on the debt itself, the interest alone for 100 years will be $980 billion, and we will still owe the debt of $283 billion, or a total of $1.263 trillion.

During the past 4 years we have three times extended the temporary debt ceiling and once increased the permanent ceiling. Since the end of World War II, there has only been one brief period—during the Truman administration—when our Government has made any reduction whatever in the national debt.

Yet these years have been years of comparative national prosperity. If it has not been possible for Congress during these years to reduce the indebtedness, we must wonder seriously if ever in the future we shall find it either expedient or even possible to do so without a definite commitment to some systematic plan.

We have had emergencies during this period, to be sure. But can anyone honestly contend that there exists any realistic prospect for the lessening of these tensions and critical demands in the foreseeable future?

Our Nation is engaged with Russia in a titanic competition which may not be resolved for a generation or more. And we fully intend and expect to be in business as a nation after this period of recurrent crises and ideological conflicts shall have ended.

CHALLENGE TO STATESMANSHIP

Why then, does it not make sense to gear ourselves to the long pull and begin facing in earnest the challenge of true fiscal responsibility which seems so clearly to demand such a course?

It would be a demonstration of our faith that this Nation expects to continue in operation for at least 100 years and are conducting our business with no other end in view.

It should provide a good example of resolution and sound economy to the families of our Nation who must of necessity make plans for the eventual retirement of their private debts. And 100 years in the life of a nation is not so long as it may seem.

Such a plan should have a salutary effect upon the inflationary spiral of cheap money and increasing indebtedness. It should revive confidence both in our own land and throughout the world in the stability of our dollar.

Perhaps more basic than any of this, however, it would constitute a simple act of good faith with those generations of Americans yet to come.

This is a challenge to our vision and to our statesmanship. It will require discipline and self-restraint of both the Congress and the American public. But I believe the American Nation is equal to it. Let it not be said that the Congress lacks the courage or the faith to put it to the test.

Boggs-Daniel Narcotic Control Act

OF
HON. HALE BOGGS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 9, 1959

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement:

Representative HALE BOGGS, Democrat, of Louisiana, today released statistics on the results of the Boggs-Daniel Narcotic Control Act of 1956.

Congressman BOGGS said:

"Since the Congress passed the Boggs-Daniel Narcotic Control Act of July 1956, with its severe minimum mandatory penalties against illegal sellers of narcotics, the improvement in the narcotic situation in the United States has been remarkable. One of the most realistic and accurate yardsticks to gage this improvement is the number of addicts reported in 1958 as compared with the number reported in 1956.

"The District of Columbia shows that the count of new addicts dropped from 200 in 1956 to only 60 in the first 11 months of 1958. In Louisiana there was a decrease in the number of addicts reported from 142 in 1956 to 50 in the first 11 months of 1958."

Mr. BOGGS also pointed out other States which show a significant overall improvement. These are as follows:

State	1956	1958 (1st 11 months)
Texas	523	175
Ohio	92	37
Michigan	543	264
New York	4,138	2,836
Illinois	908	631
Missouri	210	136
California	1,568	1,276

In considering the statistics given above for Ohio, it should be pointed out there had already been a decrease of 80 percent in 1956 from 1955, the year in which the Ohio State law providing for a 20-year minimum mandatory penalty for illegal sale of narcotics was enacted.

"I am tremendously gratified," the Congressman said, "by the figures which have now been compiled showing the operation of the Boggs-Daniel Narcotics Code. Despite the tremendously growing population, the number of addicts has decreased since the enactment of the act.

"I would hope that these figures would persuade some of the people both in the medical and legal profession who have been attempting to sabotage the Boggs-Daniel Narcotics Code. I do not question their good intentions, but it seems to me that these figures show that their approach providing narcotics for addicts is wrong."

The Real Basis for the Foreign-Aid Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD P. BOLAND
OF MASSACHUSETTS

Monday, February 9, 1959

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, the recent column by Walter Lippmann, "The Duty of Rich Nations," which was inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by Senator CASE of New Jersey on Thursday, January 29, 1959, contained an effective and reasoned argument for placing our foreign-aid program on a moral basis instead of on the basis of self-interest and power politics.

Mr. Lippmann's views, of course, are not new. I was present on the floor of the House on June 6, 1956, when THOMAS J. DODD, then a Representative from Connecticut's First Congressional District, made an unforgettable plea that we revive the effectiveness of foreign aid and rekindle public support of it by placing it on the right basis.

Senator DODD has continued over the years to advocate a foreign-aid program that adequately expresses the highest traditions and principles of this Nation. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have inserted in the RECORD excerpts from Mr. DODD's speech on the floor of the House, a speech which so eloquently defines the moral basis for foreign aid:

Our foreign-aid program should not be based solely on expediency, self-interest, Communist competition, or the cold war, but rather upon conviction and principle.

We have discovered in the last century one key to a shared sense of moral solidarity in the principle of the general welfare. This is the principle upon which our entire foreign-aid program should properly rest, for involved in it is the idea of universal brotherhood of men.

Over and over again we have heard it said that the problem of coping with communism is primarily an ideological or a spiritual one. And this is why we must found our foreign-aid program on a great moral principle.

If the basic cause of communism and its threat to our society is on a spiritual and ideological plane, the missing element in our policy of copying with it must be spiritual and ideological.

We can find this missing element in our foreign policy by rediscovering why we hold our democracy so dear and why we should endeavor to share its underlying principles and beliefs and blessings with our fellow men. Democracy is based on a Judaic-Christian ethic concerning the nature of man, his essential worth and dignity, and his inherent God-given rights and freedoms. Man is a valuable being.

Here is where we find the real reason for a foreign-aid program. Thus, we understand that we are engaged in this tremendous project not only because we must resist communism, not only because we must make ourselves secure, not only because we must have strong defenses, but more importantly, because it is the right thing to do.

This is what actually motivates us in the conduct of our affairs at home.

This is why we will not discriminate on the basis of race, creed, or national origin in our immigration laws.

We will oppose segregation in all its forms as a violation of the basic rudiments of Christian charity and another form of Hitler-like racism.

We will support measures to eradicate slums from our large urban centers which to our friends abroad are incomprehensible in the light of our high standards of living.

If God has blessed us with fertile land and a population with a high degree of technical skills and initiative, we shall recognize our responsibility to find ways and means of sharing our surpluses and skills with other peoples of the world who are less fortunate.

Thus, in our foreign aid programs, we should be prepared, when asked, to tell our foreign neighbors who need assistance why we want to help them—that one of our principal motives is to help them establish and maintain a free society. We should be able to tell them why we attach such importance to freedom, and why we are interested in sharing it with them; that it is the nature of man which is at issue.

We should discuss these matters in our churches and civic groups, in our schools and universities.

We should call for volunteers and, like the Communists, develop cadres of young people to dedicate their lives in whole or in part, to serve these ends, both here and abroad. We have never lacked for volunteers when wars, in the traditional sense, have broken out.

But this is a new kind of war—the cold war—but a war nonetheless. And it is a war to the finish between freedom and tyranny.

The American people should realize that these problems are not to be confined to Government action only; we all have a stake in the outcome and we all have a role to play.

Those who recognize these things, have a responsibility to act and to give leadership to others.

We need bold and imaginative leadership to infuse and permeate our foreign policy with this vitalizing element. The people of the United States are ready for it. For this is not a suggestion to introduce an element not already existing on the American scene. It is rather a suggestion to recognize it, and to draw more heavily from our spiritual ideals in the shaping of our foreign policies and our objectives, in the conduct of our foreign-aid programs, and in the content of our propaganda. Let us not be ashamed to explain our ideals publicly, and, above all, let us act as though we really believed in them.

If such a dynamic or positive element were infused into our national thinking on foreign policy it would tend to emphasize the quality rather than the quantity of our assistance programs.

The magnitude of aid would not be so much the measure which is often based on immediate threats of loss to the Communists.

The measure would rather be the economic and social needs of the country or area and our own ability to help on a long-term and consistent basis.

The people who receive our cooperation would not be made to feel that they are simply pawns in an international power struggle between the East and the West.

They should feel that we are doing these things because it is the right thing to do.

And I suggest that the American people and their representatives in Congress would be more willing to appropriate the necessary funds for these programs if they had sufficient confidence that those in charge of our foreign policy had clear objectives and knew what they were doing.

What these people need above and beyond all the technical skills we can give them is to find a way of life which will have some meaning and idealism in it.

They need to discover the essential worth and dignity of the human person, to develop a sense of self-respect as well as earn and receive the respect of others.

The personnel which we send abroad either under Government programs or through private organizations should be carefully selected on the basis of their suitability and capability to express and demonstrate these ideals to the people in the underdeveloped countries.

If we continue to flounder and drift in the conduct of our foreign affairs, we shall ultimately lose all the respect which our present position of leadership requires.

Should this happen, the cause of freedom and justice in the world will be lost.

I earnestly and devoutly believe that we of the United States have the greatest responsibility in this struggle. We are on the right road, and the legislation which is before the House will assist us in reaching our proper objective.

That objective is a world at peace under law. A world in which free men use and enjoy the blessings of creation and live in harmony with God and each other.

Can We Afford Not To Pay Off the National Debt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS M. PELLY
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 9, 1959

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, I have been asking myself two questions which have a definite tie-in with the arguments over Federal spending policies and balanced budgets.

One question is this. Why do investors have a growing apathy toward the purchase of Government securities?

The second question is related to the first. It has to do with the obvious present difficulty of the Secretary of the Treasury. I would like to know whether or not the problem of debt management, the continual refinancing of U.S. note and bond issues, could develop into as serious a situation as it seems to me might easily occur?

There is certainly no lack of public savings. The total savings accounts in the banks and on deposit in financial institutions keep growing and growing. Yet, the regular public drives to encourage purchase of U.S. savings bonds do not seem to be very successful. Corporate investors lack enthusiasm too.

Some economists say we are in an expanding economy with no immediate threat of inflation or decline in the buying power of the dollar due to increasing Government spending.

Other economists do not agree and are fearful of more deficit Federal spending.

The investors seem to agree with the latter, or at least appear to lack confidence in long-term Government securities.

The national debt now stands at $283 billion. Interest on this is estimated during the next fiscal year at $8.1 billion. If the average rate increases to 3.5 percent as some people believe it will, the annual cost to the taxpayers will climb to $9.9 billion. In other words, assuming the debt remains constant, in less than 30 years at this rate we will pay as much as the debt is today but we will still owe all of it.

Meanwhile, it occurs to me, as I said at the start, that lack of enthusiasm for Government securities could be serious. Our increasing debt, it seems to me, could bring on a buyers' strike. I wonder what will be the consequences if Congress, year after year, creates deficits. I wonder as to the consequences of spending enormous and necessary sums for defense, and at the same time paying out ever-increasing subsidies for foreign aid and domestic programs of all kinds beyond the Government's income.

I wonder as to the advisability of the new Federal proposals which call for State matching funds. Many States at the moment face very serious budget dilemmas. Are we not causing them to overspend along with the Federal Government toward more debt and more taxes?

Socialists do not worry about a possible crisis in Government finances. Why should they? It means higher taxes and a possible capital levy. When a business pays a 52-percent income tax, it is more than half socialized. Let us not overlook that. Are we headed for more socialism?

Dictators can rise out of uncontrolled inflation, too. Adolf Hitler did.

As for the Communists, inflation is the means they plan to use to take over. Inflation gave communism its chance in Russia. That is how it started. And so it was with Red China.

Of course, Uncle Sam is not broke and there is no reason to panic, certainly not as long as the Government lives within its means. Not if we exercise self-discipline. Not if we plan and govern ourselves properly.

In this connection, a concurrent resolution was introduced in the Congress earlier this week which points the way. It called for a systematic program of national debt reduction. Its author showed how embarking on such a plan or retiring the $283 billion debt in 100 years, with payments of $2.8 billion annually, would actually save future taxpayers $485 billion as against continuing to pay the interest each year on the present debt.

Mr. Speaker, a policy of balanced budgets, together with regular yearly payments on the debt, could restore confidence in Government securities and the interest rates on Treasury borrowing would decline almost enough to offset the amount of yearly debt reduction.

If the volume of Treasury securities offered for sale declined each year, the demand would stiffen. Suppose as a result of this that the average interest rate declined 1 percent. That would save 1 percent of about $280 billion the first year or the amount of annual reduction under the resolution which I referred to previously. In other words, public confidence and more demand could be the solution of our Treasury problems, but only if we abandon the philosophy of spending ourselves rich. Only if we abandon that kind of quack fiscal remedy.

Mr. Speaker, let us adopt a policy of systematic retiring the Federal debt and set our financial house in order.

That is the road to victory in our economic competition with the Soviet Union.

Unless we hold the line on Government spending, I fear the consequences.

Flood Control in the State of Kansas

OF
HON. NEWELL A. GEORGE
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, February 9, 1959

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, in 1951, a devastating flood occurred which inundated many of the business and residential sections of a number of cities in the State of Kansas. The loss ran into billions of dollars.

A plan of flood control has been adopted and includes a number of large dams and reservoirs. Construction has been started on a number, and Tuttle Creek, one of the major units, has 60 percent of the dam structure proper complete.

The overall plan for the Kansas Basin includes reservoirs for flood control, irrigation, water conservation and recreation, and other purposes. Local protection works, including levees and channel improvements, are to supplement the flood control provided by the huge reservoirs.

Four important authorized projects have not yet been started: Lawrence, Melvern, Hillsdale, and Fort Scott. Detailed studies of the 1951 flood, and those occurring to a lesser extent every year since that date, by the U.S. Army engineers, demonstrated the need for additional reservoirs and some modification of local projects at critical locations for the protection against floods. Eight additional reservoirs of moderate size have been recommended and none of these, of course, has been started, and are not in the budget submitted by the President. Neither were any funds included in the administration's budget for Fort Scott and the other three important projects heretofore mentioned.

On a long-range projection, if the rate of construction is not stepped up, this overall flood protection project will not be completed until the last quarter of the 20th century. The frequency of floods, such as the one which occurred in 1951, cannot be determined, and such a flood may reoccur at any time. Should this happen with its tremendous loss of property and revenue to the Government, the shortsightedness of the administration and of the Congress would be pronounced, and there would be no satisfactory explanation of our failure to take affirmative action in making funds available. In the meantime, the industrial growth of cities such as Lawrence and Fort Scott is at a standstill because water is not available for industrial use, and a tremendous loss of tax revenue to the Federal Government results. The shortsightedness of the Bureau of the Budget by failing to include ample funds for flood control and water conservation is injurious to the economic growth of eastern Kansas and our national economy as a whole.

Realizing these facts, a concurrent resolution has been adopted by both houses of the Kansas Legislature, which has heretofore appeared in the RECORD.

Cuba Revisited

OF
HON. CHARLES O. PORTER
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, February 9, 1959

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech which I delivered last Saturday night in Santiago de Cuba in Oriente Province, Cuba. I was invited to speak there under the sponsorship of the Committee for the Industrialization and Progress of Santiago. However, representatives attended the dinner meeting from a number of other organizations including the 20–30 Club, the Rotary, the Lions Club, and the chamber of commerce. In all, some 250 businessmen attended in the dining room of the Casa Grande Hotel. The hospitality of Santiago was typically Cuban—that is, wonderful and gracious.

CASTRO'S CUBA: A CHALLENGE FOR CUBANS AND AMERICANS

I am sure that a year ago, I could not have addressed you as I am today. In the first place, I am sure Fulgencio Batista would not have permitted an invitation to be extended. In the second place, I am told that your organization, as a demonstration of protest against Batista's tyrannical regime, had refused to convene any meeting or hold elections until civil liberties were restored. Your distinguished President informs me that this is your first meeting of 1959 in free Cuba. Let me say, therefore, that all of us owe a debt of gratitude to Fidel Castro.

Cuba is called the Pearl of the Antilles; she is described as one of the most beautiful islands in the Americas, but how much more beautiful she is now that freedom is restored. Yet, what Castro has won for the Cuban people is but a promise of what great expectations lie ahead.

It is customary in speeches by visiting politicians from one foreign country to another to stress traditional ties. Sometimes this is done as nothing more than a gesture, a courtesy extended as a matter of form. With me, I assure you, it is not merely a formality when I say that Fidel Castro has done more than perhaps any other Cuban to stir the consciences and emotions of the American people and to remind your friends to the north of the deep-rooted historic ties of friendship that bind Cuba and the United States. Ours is a relationship born in a common tradition. It is a tradition of democratic idealism, of revolution. Castro has captured the spirit of that tradition of democratic idealism and has elevated it to a new level of prominence not only throughout the Western Hemisphere but also throughout the world.

More than anything else the spirit of democratic idealism, it seems to me, was one of the primary motivating forces underlying Castro's 26th of July movement. There is something remarkably attractive about the drive, the dedication, the sense of nationality of all these men. A year ago they were regarded in some countries as a group of dreamy idealists caught up in a hopeless cause, adventurers of a sort guided more by self-delusion than by any serious, genuine compulsion. Yet, against apparent overwhelming odds the men of this movement have succeeded with almost miraculous speed in sweeping away a regime of terror, violence, and corruption. Press reports in the United States have stressed the totality of Cuban support behind the Castro forces. This was, indeed, a national revolution; of dimensions like that of the Mexican revolution. Perhaps, this fact coupled with the democratic idealism that is at the heart of the 26th of July movement and the leadership of a young Oriente lawyer, driven by an inner compulsion to bring democracy to his people, were more responsible than anything else for the success of democracy in Cuba and the overthrow of the Batista regime.

At first, many persons in my country were shocked by what seemed to be the excesses of the Castro forces. The belief became widespread that a virtual reign of terror was being directed against the Batista followers. It was difficult for them to comprehend the reality of the situation. They had had insufficient evidence of Batista's oppression. It was difficult to grasp the seeming contradiction of a democratic leader governing in apparent irresponsibility, and, as it seemed to them, governing ruthlessly. Americans neither understood the implications of this crisis nor the complications engendered by a nation caught up in violent revolution. Nor did they understand that the pent up indignation of a morally sensitive, oppressed people had to have some outlet, and that the public trial of known murderers was in fact a safety valve for a nation that demanded retribution against its oppressors.

Now, I believe, the American people realize the magnitude and the high morality of the 26th of July movement. Gradually the knowledge is becoming more widespread in the United States that these revolutionaries are not a rabble in arms but are a restrained, disciplined, and dedicated group of patriots who have the overwhelming support of the Cuban people and who are trying under great difficulties to bring to Cuba genuine democracy. The norteamericanos are becoming more and more conscious of the great problems facing your young lawyer and as a consequence a genuine feeling of sympathy and understanding seems to be taking shape.

Certainly, Cubans do not have to be reminded of the great political and economic problems besetting their new Government. In any revolution there always follows a difficult period of adjustment once the fighting has stopped and the tyrant has been overthrown. The legacy of the old regime is always a tremendous burden for the new Government. The general problem of firmly establishing the legitimacy of the new Government in a period of transition is fraught with grave dangers. The problem of reconciling the broadening of democracy with the necessity of maintaining a steady, centralized authority to insure public order and national progress, all in a revolutionary atmosphere, is a tremendous task for any new government. In our own national history it took almost a decade to establish a viable constitutional order after our war of liberation.

Nor are the economic problems facing Fidel Castro and the Cuban people any less burdensome. The economic legacy of the Batista regime would certainly be sufficiently oppressive to crush the enthusiasm of a far less devoted and energetic leader. Corruption and waste had completely enveloped the Batista regime. It is said that many Batista officials deposited millions of dollars in United States and Swiss banks. I hasten to add, money that was taken from the Cuban people. It is also reported that Batista himself has set aside upward of $200 million to $600 million for himself, for the most part no doubt in Swiss numbered accounts, before his flight to the Dominican Republic—again, money that belongs to the Cuban people, and which, by the way, I am encouraging our Government to locate and return if at all possible.

The war for Cuban liberation has also added to the great economic burden. Destruction by the revolution has been estimated at an insured cost of about $15 million. Damage and destruction to railroad bridges, and other means of transport and communication has been extensive. In all, the Government faces a staggering national debt of some $1,500 million.

The political and economic problems facing the Castro government are great, but they are not impossible. From abroad one gets the impression that political stability and orderly government prevails in Cuba. This is a happy beginning because out of political stability economic and social progress will emerge and flourish. Unless he removed himself entirely from politics for a while, Fidel Castro was right to assume the premiership and to participate actively in the management of governmental affairs. Political responsibility, it seems to me, cannot be disassociated from political authority. To govern effectively, and efficiently, responsibility and authority must be indivisible. He now has both the actual and the legal authority.

It is gratifying also to hear that the Castro government is planning extensive reforms within Cuba. Certainly plans for agrarian reforms calling for the distribution of Government land to the people, proposals to ease unemployment, and the reorganization of the Government and the army will be widely acclaimed in the United States and elsewhere as demonstrations of the genuine democratic idealism of the Castro movement.

Serious problems face Fidel Castro and the Cuban people in their quest for a solid democratic order. Yet, I am confident they will meet the challenges thrust upon them. Certainly, the United States can do much to make these challenges more bearable. I am gratified by the speed with which the United States recognized the Castro government, and I am equally gratified to know that our Ambassador to free Cuba, Philip Wilson Bonsal, is a man who knows Latin America and has a genuine sympathetic understanding of the problems that beset the area. His position with respect to dictators is unequivocal. He doesn't like them.

Problems are bound to arise in Cuban-American relations and the great burdens borne by Castro and his Cuban people are not mainly the concern of persons solely in executive authority. It is important, of course, that understandings be reached on the Government level, but it is even more important, I believe, that as a people, we in the United States should more clearly understand the real meaning of the July 26 movement, not only for Cuba, but also for the Western Hemisphere and even the whole world. It is well, it seems to me, that we should think of Cuba and recent events here in the broad perspective of Latin American affairs.

The winds of democracy are blowing fresh and vigorous throughout Latin America. The Cuban experience is not only the most recent, but the most dramatic, demonstration of the rollback of totalitarianism in the Western Hemisphere. The Cuban revolution is the fulfillment of a dream of a great leader; it is the rededication of a people to democracy. There is, of course, no way of measuring the impact upon the world this event has made, but I am sure that the emergency of a democratic Cuba gives cause for grave concern to all dictators whether of the left or the right, not that Cuba could ever be a physical threat to them, but that Cuba can be the symbol of what they fear most, the rule of the people.

We in the United States are beginning to see the deep implications of the 26th of July movement, and many of us, indeed I hope all of us, are trying in every way to make the golden opportunity of Castro's revolution a reality. As a nation we must maintain an undiminished confidence in the Cuban people to achieve a genuine democratic order. We must work desperately hard on the practical level to help the Cuban people succeed.

We can give Castro undiminished support in the solution of his political problems but there is also much to be done on the economic side. Here, the United States is prepared to help Cuba in this period of revolutionary transition. American economic aid to the Batista regime had been negligible. If I had had my way, there would have been none, economic or military. Even the military aid, which regrettably was given and widely publicized, actually amounted to very little. In the past a small technical assistance program operated in Cuba costing an average of $500,000 a year. At present only 12 technicians are active in Cuba under this program. These technical assistance activities carried on by the International Cooperation Administration (ICA) were designed to aid in the solution of specific problems in the Cuban economy. The broad objective of the program was, however, to point up the spirit of mutual cooperation between the people of Cuba and the United States. Specifically, the program was geared to consultation and inservice training of personnel in agriculture with a view to increasing production of a variety of crops such as tomatoes, cucumbers, cacao, coffee, and tropical fruits for domestic consumption and also for export. This operation undoubtedly contributed to Cuba's economic welfare and diversification. It is even said that production of some crops has increased to such an extent that some imports are no longer needed and small amounts of produce are being exported.

Assistance has also been given in Cuba's mining industry. A civilian aviation project, we hope, has been helpful in working with the Cuban Aeronautical Commission on technical matters such as air traffic control, air safety, equipment procurement, and training. This project has aided in improving air safety and contributed to the growth of Cuban aviation. The technical assistance program has also contributed to improvements in Cuba in the education of aircraft mechanics and the technical advice in public administration provided to the census and statistics services of the Cuban Government in preparation of the coming 1960 census. These activities were carried on throughout all Cuba. I would like to note particularly that a U.S. technician has carried on some specific research work in Cacao here in Oriente Province.

Cuba has, however, received no grant aid from ICA and no loans from the Development Loan Fund. On the other hand, she has received credits from the Export-Import Bank. The most recent of these in the last 8 years was the $17,500,000 credit to expand Cuba's telephone system, an installation that should be of benefit to large numbers of people regardless of the regime which ruled here.

On the whole, official American aid activity in Cuba appears to have been very small, although, of course, private investment of U.S. capital has been substantial. According to one estimate, the total U.S. investment in Cuba is more than $1 billion. Apparently, there was at first some concern in American business circles during the change in governments, but the promise of Provisional President Manuel Urrutia to "actively encourage" U.S. investments in Cuba undoubtedly has reassured the fearful. Reportedly, the system of graft prevailing under the Batista regime has been a deterrent to investment capital, but recently one American businessman was quoted as saying, in reference to the Castro government, "With an honest government, this island could be an economic paradise—it could go ahead and realize its potential." It is possible that if the revolution can be consolidated efficiently and in order and political stability achieved along the lines Castro has promised, Cuba may well become an economic paradise and the development of its great economic potential a reality.

In conclusion, and in all humility, I want to make three suggestions for your consideration, as you go ahead to build a free, honest, and prosperous Cuba.

First, realize that you have the sympathy and support of my country. Call on us for assistance, whether it be more food and clothing for impoverished victims of the revolution, advice on how to attract and hold new industries, or ideas from our experiences how best to solve various social problems. We don't pretend to have all the resources or answers but please realize, as many of you do, our wish to help you establish yourselves in freedom and prosperity.

Second, don't expect too much too soon from the revolution. Insist on civil liberties, yes, and preparations for free elections, but do not expect increased profits and higher wages for everyone immediately. It is one thing to topple a dictatorship, another to build a democracy. Freedom means the right, indeed often the duty, to criticize. It means being able to disagree without being disagreeable. Sometimes it looks awfully sloppy and disorganized, but no better method has been devised for human happiness and governmental strength.

Here I want to leave Cuba a moment and talk about proposals by Cuban and Venezuelan leaders to kick the tyrannies out of the Organization of American States. Certainly this is something to discuss at Quito next year when the OAS convenes there. For my part I believe in universal membership in international organizations, but of course with constant reminders of and obedience to the governing charters. Article 5, part (d), of the OAS charter reads as follows:

"The solidarity of the American States and the high aims which are sought through it require the political organization of those States on the basis of the effective exercise of representative democracy."

I am reliably informed that the OAS at Quito will have an opportunity to consider a concrete, specific definition of "the effective exercise of representative democracy," a yardstick which would disclose at once the respective shortcomings of Trujillo, Stroesner, Somoza, and Duvalier.

It can't all be done in a day—but it will be done if Cubans exercise self-control, tolerance, a sense of humor, and faith in democracy.

Finally, and this injunction is also not needed by most of you, beware of Communists who would try to make you believe they speak as Cubans, Cubans devoted to Cuba and speedy social and economic changes. Communists, of course, thrive on disorganization and are trained to take advantage of it. Their social justice anti-U.S.A. and pro-Cuba themes should fool no one, certainly not any Cuban who hated Batista and would fight against the resurgence of his counterpart in Cuban politics. Cuba's destiny is not that of Hungary today, Hungary where a local revolt cannot win because of the Soviet Union's intercession from outside its borders.

In Oregon, my home State, last week I heard Vice President NIXON—with whom I often do not agree—say something we all might ponder: "We should be more concerned about the meaning of the American Revolution," he said, "and less afraid of the Russian revolution." High officials in our Department of State would do well to heed the Vice President's timely advice.

In the final analysis, therefore, the greatest burden seems to rest upon Fidel Castro and his associates. In a very real sense he is a man of destiny; for if he fulfills the promise of his revolution and succeeds in imparting throughout all Cuba the zeal, the energy, the dedication to duty, and the democratic idealism that is so much part of his personality, there can be no doubt that Cuba and her people will emerge in a new age of progress and prosperity. But, we must all be patient with this man; as he himself recently said: "I am a man, not a god. We cannot do everything in 1 day." Indeed he can't do everything in 1 day. Nor can he do what is to be done without the support of the Cuban people and his friends in the Western Hemisphere. I do not doubt for 1 minute that Fidel Castro has the overwhelming support of the Cuban people. Nor do I doubt that there are millions of my own countrymen who feel as I do that this man deserves the sympathy and support of our Nation.

Fidel Castro has advanced the trend toward total hemispheric democracy one more significant step. Neither we in the United States, nor you in Cuba can permit him to fail, for, after all, he is the symbol of what all of us desire most: a world of freemen.

The Federal Credit Union Act Helps Millions of American Citizens

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEE METCALF
OF MONTANA
Monday, February 9, 1959

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Speaker, for more than a century the credit union idea has given unfailing aid and inspiration to all who have turned to it in Europe. In the United States, too, this courageous outlook has been given all who have participated in the program since it was started in Massachusetts 50 years ago.

This past week in Washington, 175 Members of the Congress assembled at a dinner honoring those 28 original sponsors of the Federal Credit Union Act who still are Members. Accepting in behalf of 26 of his colleagues the plaque given by Credit Union National Association on the occasion of the 25th anniversary of the act was Representative WRIGHT PATMAN, long a champion of the credit union movement. The 26 other Members who were original sponsors of the Federal Credit Union Act are Senators BYRD, CHAVEZ, HAYDEN, HILL, O'MAHONEY, RUSSELL, and DIRKSEN, and Representatives BROWN of Georgia, CANNON, CELLER, COLMER, MCCORMACK, O'BRIEN of Illinois, POLK, RAYBURN, SMITH of Virginia, SPENCE, VINSON, WALTER, ALLEN, MARTIN, REECE of Tennessee, REED, ROGERS of Massachusetts, TABER, and WITHROW.

Representative PATMAN'S address was as follows:

Many things have happened in these 25 years since Congress passed the Federal Credit Union Act.

The Members of Congress whom you have so graciously complimented this evening have supported many good legislative proposals; and not a few of these proposals have aroused in us deep convictions and inspired us to hard and thoughtful work.

Yet we can never know in advance just how a new legislative measure will turn out in practice. Measures that seem to have the greatest promise sometimes turn out poorly. Others meet with only indifferent success. And, of course, a few succeed beyond even our greatest hopes.

I know of no legislation enacted within the last 25 years which has turned out better than the Federal Credit Union Act.

The credit union movement has succeeded mostly because it has been in the hands of good people. It attracts good people. And it makes better people of all who become members of a credit union. It fosters capitalism, because it brings democracy to capitalism. It teaches not just thrift—because thrift is no end in itself—but it teaches humanity, self-help, and community reliance.

Those of us who have been privileged to work for the Federal Credit Union Act, and to work for its improvement are indeed fortunate. It would be hard to find anywhere the kind of satisfaction which comes from feeling that we have had a share in the accomplishments you have made in the credit union movement. Every community in our country is a better community because of the credit unions. Our Nation is a better and stronger Nation because of them. And the other countries of the world to which this progressive and human endeavor has spread are also better off and better neighbors in the community of nations.

With this meaning and record behind them, the beautiful plaques which you have so generously given to the 28 Members of Congress who had the good fortune of helping to pass the Federal Credit Union Act 25 years ago are treasures beyond comparison.

The great public service which credit unions perform, and their basic soundness, had been well demonstrated before the Federal Credit Union Act was passed. At that time there were some 2,200 credit unions in the country, operating under State law. Massachusetts had enacted the first credit union law in the United States in 1909. That law worked so well that President Taft, a few years later, called its great merit to the attention of the Governors of the other States. By 1934, 38 States and the District of Columbia had similar laws.

But the 2,200 credit unions which had then been established had hardly begun to meet the great problems which faced people of ordinary means almost everywhere. These were the days when installment buying was still new but gaining great momentum. Ordinary working people were being victimized by the loan sharks on an unconscionable scale. Shocking incidents came to light such as that of the man who borrowed $30 from a loan shark, paid the loan shark $1,080 in interest charges, and was then sued for the initial $30. Clearly there was a great need for legislation to encourage and strengthen the credit union movement. At least the need was made clear by the vigilant and able campaigning of the late Senator Sheppard, of Texas, who, I might add, had the able and inspiring help of our friend, the late Roy Bergengren.

Recently I reread one of Roy Bergengren's speeches pleading for this legislation—a speech he called "Credit for All the People." And I found that he said the credit union movement introduced three new banking theories, as follows:

1. Ordinary folks can develop capacity to manage their own money.

2. It puts money to work for the benefit of the people to whom it belongs.

3. The purpose of the loan is the important thing.

And to this he added, "the loan must promise a real benefit to the borrower."

Those ideas seemed somewhat radical at that time, but they were also persuasive.

Despite all the persuasive efforts, however, to obtain early enactment of Senator Sheppard's bill in the 73d Congress, the bill suffered the fate of almost all legislation to help the common man, even today: The bill was put over until almost the last moment before Congress adjourned. It passed the Senate on May 10, 1934, very late in the 2d session of the 73d Congress. Finally, the House took it up, amended it, and passed it on June 16, only 2 days before the Congress was to adjourn. Yet, when it was finally put to a vote, it passed almost unanimously. I called for a division vote, and the RECORD shows the House voted 180 to 2 in support of the bill.

But passage at this late date required some pretty fast footwork to get final clearance and get the bill to the White House before the Congress adjourned, as otherwise the legislation would have died with that Congress. The amended bill was, however, brought to the attention of the Senate on the same day; and the Senate passed it as amended. During the next 2 days we worked until the late hours of the night to make sure that the redtape was cleared away, that the Speaker of the House and the Vice President signed the bill, and that it was transmitted to the White House before Congress adjourned on the night of the 18th. There was never any doubt that President Roosevelt would approve it and sign it. In all this activity, I can assure you, Roy Bergengren performed some extremely fast footwork.

It is always pleasant to look back and describe victories that have been hard won, and to recount setbacks that have been narrowly averted. But there is considerable danger in too much looking backward, particularly when there are great new challenges to be met.

The question is, where are you going tomorrow and the day after?

If I might suggest my personal view, it would be this: The credit union movement has made only a beginning. The importance and the excitement in this movement lies ahead, not in the past. This is no time to rest on your past accomplishments. And the time has not come to dig trenches and merely try to hold onto your past gains. If 19,000 local credit unions are good for the country today, then twice that number should be good for the country 5 years hence. If 10 to 12 million people are better off today by reason of their membership in credit unions, then at least twice that number should enjoy this privilege 5 years hence. If the credit unions have proved a successful way of helping people meet their credit needs in their personal and family affairs, then it should also prove successful in meeting the credit needs of people who operate small businesses.

The Federal law authorizes loans for any provident or productive purpose. Provident purposes have been well served in the field of consumer finance, but much more needs to be done for productive purposes. One of the great challenges ahead, it seems to me, is to explore more fully the possibility of bringing small business into the credit unions.

Most small businesses have no place to go. And what a pity. We have in this country a great capitalistic system—a system which is based on credit. Even our money is based on credit. No debt, no money. Yet many of our most efficient and productive free enterprises are being squeezed out for lack of credit.

Here then is a new challenge and one worthy, I think, of the credit unions' great heritage.

The question is whether to push on to new frontiers.

There is a tendency, we know, for great movements to become tired and conservative. There is a temptation to forgo new adventures and new advances because of fears that what has been won may be lost. The time for new crusades seems unpropitious; the climate of opinion seems to turn threatening if not hostile; and the potential opposition seems to grow more powerful and more menacing. The voices of caution in all of us counsel against rising to new challenges; they advise that it is safer to let new growth proceed within the confines of the niche that has already been carved out.

Well, it has seemed to me that when the credit-union movement stops making new advances, it is as good as dead. No crusade can last bivouacked behind a fixed wall.

Of course there are powerful and selfish forces who see in the credit unions a potential threat to their self-interest. There are groups who would use the legislative halls to roll back, confine, and hamstring this movement. But these groups would outlaw all self-help on the part of the masses of the people.

There are groups who would try to find ways to tax the credit unions out of existence. But these gorups would tax the churches and the fraternal organizations.

And I think you will find that these selfish forces of reaction are with us at all times. They may seem more menacing today than in the past, but I doubt if they are. They only seem so because new conflicts and new tests of courage always seem more fearsome than those past.

If you push into new areas there will, of course, be opposition. If you carry on the crusade as you have in the past, there will be fights. But the fights will be no harder than in the past. And certainly the new advances to be made are no less important than those which have been made over the past 25 years.

New legislation is needed to improve and moderize the Federal law—that we all know. Present your legislative needs to Congress clearly and on their own merits, and you may be sure that Congress will give them careful and sympathetic consideration.

Certainly you can count on your staunch friends in the House Committee on Banking and Currency. The two legislative giants of that committee, Chairman BRENT SPENCE, of Kentucky, and the Honorable PAUL BROWN, of Georgia, are still battling for the public interest, just as vigorously as when they gave their able support to the Federal Credit Union bill 25 years ago.

The Federal credit-union bill which was introduced last summer by Congressman LEROY ANDERSON, of Montana, will, I think, receive most sympathetic attention in Congress. And I know that if General ANDERSON continues to carry the leadership for this bill, many Members of the House will be willing to support it and to work to make its provisions and their merits understood. Under those circumstances, it would be my prediction that this Congress will pass such a bill.

You will always have many champions in Congress so long as your cause is good, and I can see little chance that your cause can ever be anything but good.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

II Timothy 2: 15: Study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed.

Eternal and ever-blessed God, may these 40 days of the Lenten season upon which we have entered daily become richer and more glorious in the culture and deepening of our spiritual life.

Cleanse our souls of all unrighteousness as we give ourselves to meditation and quiet waiting upon Thee in the spirit of contrition and confession, of penitence and humility.

Grant that by the exercise of self-examination and self-discipline our minds and hearts may gain the mastery over every insurgent impulse, every inordinate desire, and every self-indulgent habit.

Hear us in the name of our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday, February 9, 1959, was read and approved.

PLACING AND URGING CONTRACTS ABROAD JEOPARDIZES NATIONAL DEFENSE AND INCREASES UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include four telegrams.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, the other day I had occasion to bring to the attention of Members of this House the serious implications of a policy which appears to be gaining acceptance in some quarters of the Government of inviting bids on such heavy electrical equipment as hydraulic turbines and hydraulic turbine generators from foreign manufacturers. I pointed out to Members of the House that although in many cases foreign manufacturers, because of lower wage scales, are able to underbid our American domestic manufacturers, the policy of awarding these contracts solely on the basis of price runs certain very grave risks in the field of national security. Elaborate machine tools and highly skilled personnel are required to manufacture machinery of this type, and if domestic manufacturers are not assured a reasonable predictable domestic market from governmental agencies, these facilities are likely to be discontinued and our capacity to provide the facilities for utilizing our full potential of electrical power in the time of emergency will steadily decline.

Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the General Electric Co., in Schenectady, N.Y., announced that the first order ever placed abroad in behalf of the U.S. Government agency for a large steam turbine was placed by TVA with the C. A. Parsons & Co., Ltd., of Newcastle, Great Britain. This contract was awarded in spite of the fact that General Electric was the lowest domestic bidder, and in spite of the fact that the failure of the General Electric Co. to obtain this order means that some 600 additional jobs which might have been provided in the Schenectady area will no longer be available. In a community which has suffered heavily from unemployment for many months, this comes as a heavy blow indeed. In fact, this blow comes only one day after the Navy Department flatly refused to consider any alteration in their order closing down the naval supply depot with the loss of some 675 additional jobs.

Mr. Speaker, the policy of going abroad for large electrical equipment of this kind, which is so intimately tied up with our economic power and with our ability to defend ourselves in time of emergency, is something that in my judgment is indefensible. Not only for reasons of national defense but for reasons of economic safety in these difficult times, I believe the Government should purchase this type of machinery only from domestic manufacturers, who pay American levels of wages to American workers.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent at this point in the RECORD to include the text of telegrams of protest which I have sent to Gov. Leo Hoegh, Director of the Office of Civil Defense Mobilization, and also to Board Chairman Herbert D. Vogel, of the Tennessee Valley Authority. I also ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD at this point the text of two telegrams that I have received from employees in the Schenectady area protesting the TVA action in this instance. I hope the TVA and the Government will rescind their decision and award this contract to GE in Schenectady.

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
February 10, 1959.

Hon. HERBERT D. VOGEL,
Chairman of the Board, TVA,
Washington, D. C.:

General Electric Co. has just announced that you have awarded contract for Colbert steam plant turbine generators to British firm despite fact General Electric submitted lowest bid on domestic market. This action not only jeopardizes national security but also means the loss of some 600 new jobs in Schenectady area which has long suffered from severe unemployment. I urgently request you reconsider this decision in the light of these facts and suspend further action on this contract until the reconsideration has been completed.

Congressman SAMUEL S. STRATTON.

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
February 10, 1959.

Gov. LEO HOEGH,
Office Civil Defense Mobilization,
Washington, D. C.:

General Electric Co. has just announced that TVA has awarded contract for Colbert steam plant turbine generators to British firm despite fact General Electric submitted lowest bid on domestic market. This action not only jeopardizes national security but also means the loss of some 600 new jobs in Schenectady area which has long suffered from severe unemployment. I request Government reconsider TVA decision and direct that no further action be taken until this reconsideration has been completed.

Congressman SAMUEL S. STRATTON.

SCHENECTADY, N.Y., February 10, 1959.

Congressman SAMUEL S. STRATTON,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.:

Local newspaper this morning rocked city and area by announcing GE lost order for large steam turbine generator to Great Britain despite fact GE submitted lowest bid on domestic market. Order would have supplied 600 new jobs for men in this area for 1 full year. This is first such order placed by us in foreign market. Turbine is scheduled to be installed in TVA Colbert steam plant near Tuscumbia. Schenectady has been placed in priority classification because of large number of unemployed. With this priority Schenectady is supposed to receive first consideration for any type of Government work it can competently perform. Also ordering this type of apparatus from a foreign country puts the United States in dangerous position in event of war. This is true because of constant need for replacement of parts in generators to supply power for the Nation's cities. This seriously hinders defense efforts. In same newspaper on same page Navy rejects all protests to keep Scotia Naval Depot open. This means another 675 jobs. Urge your immediate attention to critical problems now facing entire area.

LEO JANDREAU,
Business Agent, Local 301, IUE, AFL–CIO.

SCHENECTADY, N.Y., February 11, 1959.
Hon. SAMUEL STRATTON,
Representative from New York,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

Schenectady draftsmen's association vigorously protests awarding of large turbine generator order to British firm by Tennessee Valley Authority. Our draftsmen before this recession had 1,300 full-time jobs, now only 800, many part time, are left. Even these jobs now threatened. Please do everything possible to reverse decision.

DOMINIC I. FAZZONEN,
Schenectady Draftsmen's Association, General Electric Co.

COMMUNICATIONS TO CLERGYMEN SHOULD BE PRIVILEGED

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, it is shocking to realize that the Federal courts do not recognize the privilege of a minister of religion to decline to testify concerning confidential communications made by a person who has come to him for spiritual aid. Certainly the right to speak freely to a minister without fear that he will be compelled to disclose the conversation in any circumstances is one of the most cherished of all personal rights.

The rare advantage, if any, to be derived from testimony of this character is far outweighed by the affront to personal privacy by the very threat of compulsory disclosure.

Moreover, denial of the privilege exposes to the risk of unjust punishment every clergyman who is forbidden by the discipline of his faith to reveal what has been said to him in confidence. The thought of a minister being fined or sentenced to jail for refusing to betray the confidence of one who turned to him for counsel and guidance offends the moral sense of the community.

Yet, as the law stands today, that could happen in any Federal court.

It is frightening to contemplate that in our country, which prides itself on separation of church and state, a citizen may be compelled to make a choice between giving up the protection of the fifth amendment against self-incrimination and following the confessional requirements of his religion in order to get spiritual absolution.

Thirty-five separate jurisdictions within the United States have laws making confidential communications to a minister privileged from disclosure in the courts.

The Canal Zone, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands have such statutes. The Philippines, while a part of the United States, had and still has such a law. Alaska, as a Territory had, and now as a State, has such a law.

On January 27, 1959, I introduced two bills to put the same rule into effect in the Federal courts. My bill, H.R. 3493, 86th Congress, applies to all Federal courts, while H.R. 3494 applies only in the District of Columbia.

Both bills provide that no clergyman of any religion shall be competent to testify in a civil or criminal proceeding with respect to any communication made to him as a minister of religion, without the consent of the person making the communication.

From time immemorial, communication between lawyer and client, physician and patient, husband and wife, and priest and penitent have been cloaked with the privilege against compulsory disclosure. Federal statutes continue that salutary rule of law as to lawyer and client, physician and patient, husband and wife. I can attribute the omission of the clergyman and parishioner only to oversight. All must agree that that relationship is much more sacred than any of the others. It is entitled to the same protection.

I am hopeful that these bills will receive the support of the overwhelming majority of both Houses of Congress and that they will be enacted into law at an early date.

IMMIGRATION BILL TO FACILITATE THE REUNITING OF FAMILIES

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, one of the cardinal principles of our immigration laws should be to facilitate the reuniting of families. In the act of September 11, 1957, we took a long step forward in that direction and with humanitarian intent, converted quota immigrants to nonquota immigrants of those who had a petition approved by the Attorney General prior to July 1, 1957. We included in this conversion people registered in the first, second, and third preference categories, but stopped short of including the fourth preference category, which covers sisters and brothers and adult children of American citizens. By so doing, we permitted entry of some 80,000 people who had waited in many instances over 10 years for a visa issuance. Inclusion of the fourth preference category could mean no hardship to the United States, since American citizens stand ready, willing and able to assist their relatives in all the problems of resettlement which would mean of course housing, jobs, and assimilation.

There is an estimated 200,000 who, like others in the first three preferential categories, have waited hopelessly for many years to be reunited with their parents and with their brothers and sisters. In Italy, for example, there isn't a single available quota for the fourth preference group nor is it contemplated that there will be one for many, many years to come. This is true of Poland, of the Philippines, of Hungary, Portugal and Spain and of the Greeks, among others. The consulate in Iraq, for example, is now processing applications that were first filed in 1946. To cite another example, applications from Turkey are presently being processed which were first filed in 1945. It is estimated that there is a backlog of some 200,000 people who daily crowd the offices of our consulates abroad and unless this conversion is made from quota to nonquota, the numbers will grow and the pressures will increase.

It must be kept in mind that this backlog is due primarily to our national origin quota system, which gives such pitifully small quotas to the countries of southern Europe and Asia and gives to Great Britain 65,361 of our total annual quota of some 152,000. Yet Britain uses only 10 percent of this quota allotted her, and the rest are wasted.

Does it not, then, make sense that we rectify in small measure this inequality of opportunity to migrate to the United States by focusing on the desirability of reuniting families?

I am, therefore, introducing a bill which, following the precedent established by the act of September 11, 1957, will provide for the conversion of the fourth preference category registered up to July 1, 1959, to nonquota immigrant status. I believe firmly that this is the just and humane thing to do in the interest of the United States.

FOREIGN POLICY ENDANGERED BY PARTISAN POLITICS

Mr. IRWIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. IRWIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorials:

[From the New York Times, Feb. 7, 1959]

MR. SMITH LEAVES WASHINGTON AFTER ALCORN REVISES SCENARIO

(By E. W. Kenworthy)

WASHINGTON, February 6.—The Republican National Committee was grinding out a sequel today to "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington," and party managers hoped it would do well at the party's box office.

Mr. Smith—in this case, Mr. James H. Smith Jr.—quietly left Washington for his home in Aspen, Colo., last Saturday. This was a few hours after he had turned in his resignation as Director of the International Cooperation Administration.

Mr. Smith went home, it was understood, a disappointed man, unlike the "Mr. Smith" of the film success of the 1930's who managed to survive the political pitfalls of Washington.

The present Mr. Smith had not received the appointment to succeed his friend, Thomas S. Gates, Jr., as Secretary of the Navy as he had confidently expected and as the administration had confidently planned.

Mr. Smith had taken the ICA job in the summer of 1957 on the understanding that he would leave it in January 1959. He was highly regarded in the administration for his performance in the post, and for his prior service as Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

The barrier was placed in Mr. Smith's path, administration and party officials agreed today, by Meade Alcorn, Republican national chairman. Mr. Alcorn was also said to be blocking the appointment of a Connecticut Democrat as Mr. Smith's successor.

Republican politicians made no secret of the fact that Mr. Alcorn had put a big black mark against Mr. Smith more than a year ago, shortly after Mr. Smith became head of ICA, the foreign aid agency.

At that time, it was said, Mr. Smith and Mr. Alcorn had a frank talk during which Mr. Smith told Mr. Alcorn that he was not going to give jobs to Republicans simply because they were Republicans.

Since then, several little black marks have been set against Mr. Smith's name in the book kept at party headquarters at 1625 I Street.

One party official summed up today Mr. Alcorn's attitude toward Mr. Smith:

"Jimmie Smith was unnecessarily neutral."

A further development in Mr. Smith's story, it was reported, concerned Henry R. Labouisse, a long-time Government official. C. Douglas Dillon, Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, has been suggesting Mr. Labouisse as the new Director of ICA.

SERVED U.N. IN NEAR EAST

Mr. Labouisse retired last June as Director of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine refugees. Prior to his 4 years in the Near East, he had held several State Department posts connected with foreign aid.

Because of this professional experience Mr. Dillon wanted Mr. Labouisse. This choice had been cleared all the way up to the White House, officials said today.

However, Mr. Labouisse comes from Connecticut—the home State of Mr. Alcorn, and he registered there as a Democrat in 1941. An associate explained today that this was more than Mr. Alcorn could be expected to endure without outcry.

Associates of Mr. Smith gave this account of how he came to Washington and left it.

When he took the ICA job, it was said, he was led to believe, these officials said, that in due time he would succeed Robert Cutler as Special Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs.

However, Mr. Cutler resigned for health reasons last June, too soon for Mr. Smith to take his post. As a consequence Gordon Gray, head of the Office of Defense Mobilization, was appointed to succeed Mr. Cutler.

Some time ago Secretary Gates, who was planning to resign, approached his Under Secretary, William B. Franke, and asked if it were true, as he had been informed, that Mr. Franke did not wish a promotion to Secretary for health reasons. Mr. Franke, according to officials, said this was so.

Thereupon, it was said, Mr. Gates undertook to get the appointment for his friend Mr. Smith.

According to associates of Mr. Smith, Mr. Gates told Mr. Smith that everything was set. But Mr. Gates also told others the same thing, and the appointment got in the papers before the White House had given the final word.

Thereupon, it was said, Mr. Alcorn got busy. Mr. Franke was persuaded to change his mind.

Mr. Smith left Washington last Saturday. On Monday Mr. Gates' resignation was announced, effective next June. His successor will be Mr. Franke.

THE CASE OF HENRY LABOUISSE

(By Joseph Alsop)

Henry Labouisse is a genial, unassuming, deceptively ordinary-seeming man who belongs to a very special category—the category of Americans to whom every citizen of this Republic ought to feel personally indebted.

In the earliest stages of his career, in the Foreign Service, and for a time in the Foreign Aid Administration, he turned in a most notable performance; but it was not this which created the debt each one of us owes to him. The debt began to be incurred when Labouisse accepted one of the most difficult and heartrending posts in the world today, the directorship of the United Nations relief agency for the tragic Arab refugees from Palestine.

There was no need for Labouisse to leave everything friendly and familiar, and go to the Middle East with his beautiful and brilliant wife, the former Eve Curie. By any ordinary standard, the appointment Labouisse accepted was both repellent and terrifying.

The million uprooted Arabs who are condemned to the grim death-in-life of the refugee camps were then suffering from extreme mass neurosis. Their resentment against the world's injustice was too bitter; their suspicions were too inflamed. They would begin one of their wolfish riots on almost any pretext. The refugee problem was in fact a gigantic ulcer, on the very point of bursting with unforseeable consequences.

When Henry Labouisse took over, it was physically dangerous for the U.N. personnel to enter some of the refugee camps. As an American, a representative of the Nation held responsible for sponsoring the Palestine partition, Labouisse was under extra suspicion. Yet by tact and humor and cool courage, by wonderful improvising from small resources, by model administration under the worst conditions, and above all, by backbreaking, unending, gruelling hard work, Labouisse won the day.

He could not cure the ulcer that is the refugee problem. No one could do that. But he won the confidence and even the affection of these tragic people. He improved conditions in the terrible camps in many different ways. He reduced the inflation of the ulcer, by these means, to a point that was no longer acutely dangerous. And all this he did without any great increase of the niggardly pittance of a few cents per person per day that the United States and the other contributing nations gave to the U.N. for refugee care.

Such, then, was the achievement of Henry Labouisse when he came home at last some months ago. Such, then, was the man whom Deputy Under Secretary of State Douglas Dillon requested to take over the International Cooperation Administration, when Dillon learned that the foreign-aid job was about to be vacated by James H. Smith.

The foreign-aid job is notoriously the hardest major post to fill in the Government today; and it was something of a sacrifice on Labouisse's part to agree to leave his well-earned retirement for this new post. Secretary John Foster Dulles and the whole State Department high command were enthusiastic for the appointment. Labouisse's name went to the White House with the highest recommendations.

At the White House, however, the nomination ran head-on into the peculiar situation created by President Eisenhower's positive detestation of his secondary role as leader of the Republican Party. Despite his semiannual exhortations to the party rank and file to get out and work, the President notoriously avoids the normal political tasks of his office. But in order to justify his avoidance and to control the party officials, the President has done something that his most politically active predecessors never did. He has given the Republican National Committee and its chairman, Meade Alcorn, a right of veto over all appointments.

Alcorn's files of jobseekers, of course, contain no remotely suitable candidate for the foreign aid job. A score of men were begged to take the job and refused it, before James H. Smith was finally induced to serve. And above all officials, the foreign aid chief needs to enjoy bipartisan confidence on Capitol Hill.

Despite these important considerations, Alcorn furiously vetoed the Labouisse appointment on the sole ground that the wholly apolitical Labouisse was not a Republican. The President, despite his repeatedly professed enthusiasm for the foreign aid program, has been too remote from the struggle, too little interested in the problem, too busy quail shooting with George Humphrey, to bother to overrule the national committee chairman. When you recall the great public servants Harry S. Truman recruited from Republican ranks, it seems a little odd to see the Eisenhower crusaders enforcing the crudest rules of old-fashioned pork-and-patronage politics, with certain detriment to the public service of the United States.

ALCORN'S BLACKBALL

Only a week ago President Eisenhower complained bitterly about his difficulty in getting a good man to run the foreign aid program. He blamed the very hostile attitude of Congress to foreign aid for forcing the last man, James H. Smith, Jr., to return to private life after serving only 18 months.

"I don't know who I am going to get to take his place," he said.

The facts apparently are that it isn't so much Congress that is hard to please, but Republican Committee Chairman Meade Alcorn.

Mr. Alcorn successfully opposed the plan to promote Mr. Smith to be Secretary of the Navy because Mr. Smith thought professional competence came before political affiliation in making appointments to foreign aid projects.

Now Mr. Alcorn is trying to block the appointment of an eminently qualified man to be foreign aid chief because—and Republican Party headquarters makes no effort to hide it—the man is a registered Democrat.

The candidate for the foreign aid job—a man desired by Secretary Dulles and Under Secretary of State Dillon—is Henry R. Labouisse, Jr., for nearly 15 years an economic expert for the State Department and for the last 4 years Director of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees (UNRWA).

The right of a party in power to choose officials from its own ranks is firmly established under our political system. But there are some jobs of great difficulty where proven competence in comparably difficult spots should come first. The director of the foreign aid program is one of them.

Mr. Labouisse has been one of this country's outstanding public servants. That he is not widely known in a popular sense is one of the characteristics of his high qualities. He has never played for headlines.

Nowhere has Mr. Labouisse shown his abilities in more exemplary manner than in his last official position—Director of UNRWA from 1954 until late last year. That was a thankless job during a period of repeated crises in the Middle East.

The fact that the refugee camps didn't explode during those 4 years of great tension is in many respects the result of the wisdom and perseverance with which Mr. Labouisse ran UNRWA. And most of the time he ran it with inadequate funds, deliberate obstruction by some governments involved, and too frequently with lack of enthusiasm or interest of his own Government.

We don't know whether Mr. Labouisse—in view of Mr. Alcorn's attitude—would now accept the job. But if Mr. Alcorn's blackball of Mr. Labouisse prevails, then President Eisenhower will get little sympathy the next time he complains about trouble in getting a foreign aid director.

THAT POLITICAL VETO

A strong scent of political interference continues to emanate from the controversy over the choice of a new foreign aid administrator despite President Eisenhower's emphatic denial yesterday that anyone could veto his selections for office. Mr. Eisenhower did not deny the report that Chairman Meade Alcorn of the Republican National Committee had intervened in an attempt to block the appointment of Henry R. Labouisse as the new head of the International Cooperation Administration.

It is known that Under Secretary of State Dillon, whose responsibility includes supervision of the foreign assistance program, strongly recommended Mr. Labouisse for the post. Mr. Labouisse is a natural for the job. As Director of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine refugees, on leave from the State Department, he exhibited enormous good judgment and practical effectiveness combined with rare sensitivity. He has handled a number of tough economic and diplomatic assignments. But he happens to be a Democrat.

Whether or not it was the result of personal intervention by Mr. Alcorn, the recommendation struck a snag. Mr. Labouisse has not been nominated—and at the very time that the President has been bemoaning the difficulty of finding a competent man for the foreign aid post and also criticizing Democrats on Capitol Hill for suggesting cuts in foreign aid funds. There is talk in the State Department that several former Members of Congress are being considered for the job. Simultaneously there are undenied reports that political protests prevented the appointment of the outgoing ICA Director, James H. Smith, as Secretary of the Navy, because he supposedly dealt with too many Democrats.

It is a very strange way to run a railroad—or a government, especially when the administration is so solicitous of cooperation from the Democratic Congress. Chairman FULBRIGHT of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is altogether right in focusing attention on political interference and calling for intensive scrutiny of the qualifications of new political nominees for ambassadorships. We hope that he will press the questions vigorously.

Obviously political considerations do enter into appointments to high positions, and the practice is not confined to the Republicans. No one can compel the President to nominate, or refrain from nominating, any particular candidate. But there is enough damaging experience with political benefactors in diplomatic posts to demonstrate that embassies are not safe rewards for them. By the same token, one would think that a vital program so plainly dear to the President's heart as foreign aid would call for the best director available irrespective of party. What has been happening surely does not help the administration in its foreign objectives; on the contrary, it is curiously reminiscent of the predicament of the man who hit himself on the head with a hammer because it felt so good when he stopped.

LENTEN SERVICES AT THE CHURCH OF THE REFORMATION

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House are invited to attend noonday Lenten services conducted by the Church of the Reformation during the Lenten season. The Church of the Reformation is located at 212 East Capitol, only a short distance away.

For many years these services have been a source of inspiration to thousands of men and women who have desired a period of each day for meditation, prayer, and rest. The services are interdenominational.

Lent is a fitting season for members of all churches to worship their common Lord.

Dr. Lawrence D. Folkemer, pastor of the church, has invited Members of Congress and employees on Capitol Hill to attend services at the Church of the Reformation. I am including a special message from Dr. Folkemer:

In critical times men discover that they need a power greater than human power to face the trying circumstances of the day. The human spirit needs divine power and wisdom to bear the burdens of mankind and to solve the difficult problems which assail us. It is important, therefore, to be able to turn aside a few moments each day to worship God and replenish the spirit.

For many years now on Capitol Hill, community noonday Lenten services have been conducted at the Church of the Reformation, 212 East Capitol Street (opposite the Folger-Shakespeare Library). These services have been a source of inspiration for thousands of men and women who have desired during Lent a short period for meditation, prayer, and rest. The holy season of Lent through the centuries has offered Christians an opportunity to deepen their spiritual life and to face the daily tasks with renewed strength and devotion.

These noonday services are interdenominational in nature. Guest clergymen of all denominations are invited to speak. Here members of all churches meet to worship their common Lord.

Services will be held each day, Monday through Friday (except the holiday, Monday, February 23) at the noon hour. May we respectfully and sincerely invite all the Members of Congress, together with their staffs to these community Lenten services.

Also, beginning Wednesday, February 18, and continuing each Wednesday from 12:30 to 1:30, Christian laymen on the Hill of all denominations are invited to the Churchmen's Luncheon Club in the Fellowship Room of Reformation Church. The guest preacher of the day will speak briefly and informally on matters of current interest to churchmen. Reservations may be made for each Wednesday by calling the church office, Lincoln 3–4200 or Lincoln 3–5455.

LEGISLATION NEEDED TO INCREASE INCOME LIMITATIONS APPLICABLE TO PAYMENT OF VETERANS' PENSIONS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill to permit single veterans to receive an income of $1,650 and married veterans an income of $3,350 and still retain their eligibility for veterans' benefits.

The need for this legislation arises, oddly enough, from the increase in social security benefits enacted by the 85th Congress in the closing days of the session which became effective on January 1, 1959.

In recent weeks I have received a number of letters directing my attention to this situation, which, however inadvertent, will operate to work a serious hardship and create severe economic problems for many veterans who have been entitled to social security as well as veterans' benefits. These veterans will now be required—under the law—to forfeit their VA benefits because their income from social security, after the effective date of the new amendments, will exceed the allowable ceiling on other income established at $1,400 for unmarried veterans and $2,700 for married veterans under existing regulations governing veterans' benefits.

In other words, if a veteran's income from social security has heretofore been $1,320, the 7-percent increase brings him an additional $92 annually, and he is required to forfeit his veteran's pension of over $900 annually because the additional social security income would put him $12 over the statutory limitation on other income.

To illustrate, Mr. Clyde Smith, a veteran residing in my district writes me as follows:

I am writing you regarding a condition that will arise the first of the year due to the new 7-percent increase in social security benefits.

As you know, a veteran drawing a disability pension is limited to an income of $2,700 per year if married and $1,400 per year if single. This income includes any income he might receive, also social security.

In my case, and I presume in thousands of other veterans, this will mean an increase of approximately $74 per year but he will lose the veterans' disability pension of $942 per year, giving us a net loss of $868 per year.

Now I am confident that the Congress in enacting the social security amendments of 1958, did so in good faith and with a view to restoring the deteriorated dollar purchasing power of recipients whose income had failed to keep pace with mounting living costs. The increase was enacted for the express purpose of bringing social security benefits into line with today's price levels.

I am equally certain that it was not the intent of the Congress to penalize thousands of veterans by granting them a cost-of-living increase on the one hand and deny them an amount equivalent to 10 times the social security increase.

Since, as a consequence of the social security amendment, many veterans will receive no pension payment for the current month of January and, indeed, for as many additional months hereafter as it requires Congress to enact corrective legislation, I earnestly hope that the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs will accord this legislation a priority position on its agenda and recommend its prompt and favorable consideration.

LEGISLATION TO IMPROVE ARTISTIC STANDARDS IN OUR FEDERAL ARCHITECTURE

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill to implement the recent recommendations of the Federal Fine Arts Commission with respect to a much-needed provision for higher standards of artistic decoration and architectural design for our Federal office buildings and, in addition, for the restoration and preservation of historic buildings and works of art which have deteriorated.

The need for this legislation was made abundantly evident in a recent report of the Federal Commission on Fine Arts in which they objected to the severity and unadorned functionalism of so many of our recently constructed Federal office buildings throughout the Nation. Accordingly, they recommended the judicious use of artistic decoration to enhance our Federal architecture.

I will concede, Mr. Speaker, that concrete walls and steel windows may make an adequately modern and functional structure, but nothing more; and I, for one, subscribe wholeheartedly to the Commission's sentiment that our Government buildings can and should reflect something more of the spirit and aspirations of the American people.

Surely there need be no conflict between the efficient, functional principles of sound, modern architectural design and the aesthetic enhancement of our public buildings through the judicious use of appropriate works of art. On the other hand, it is often the incorporation of just such artistic expression of a generation that makes a historic edifice significant to posterity and indeed worth preserving.

I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that the enriched inspirational value of our public buildings not only to our contemporaries but to future generations will pay handsome dividends on what little additional dollar investment we may make in the artistic improvement of our new Government buildings.

I am pleased to note here that similar legislation has been introduced in both Houses of Congress and even prouder to observe that it has elicited wide bipartisan sponsorship and support. I earnestly commend the bill to your thoughtful and favorable attention.

NATIONAL DRESS RIGHT WEEK—VALUES INHERENT IN APPROPRIATE DRESS AND GOOD GROOMING

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. TELLER] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. Speaker, on January 29 I introduced House Joint Resolution 202, a proposed joint resolution to authorize the President of the United States to proclaim annually the first week of March as "National Dress Right Week." My proposed joint resolution is grounded in the beliefs that it is fitting and proper that national attention should be focused on the values inherent in appropriate dress and good grooming, that growing boys and girls, as well as adults, derive benefits in the form of greater self-respect and social acceptance from proper dress, which also adds to success and enjoyment of life.

In today's world situation, our Nation must be certain that it shows itself to all other countries in the best possible light.

We most certainly do not want the image America presents to the world to be the image of the hoodlum.

We would no more have this image representing us to the world than the United Kingdom would want to be represented by the so-called Teddy Boys or, for that matter, than the Soviet Union by that segment of its population it has branded as hooligans.

We are a Nation of ever-increasing abundance; a Nation whose dynamic economy has rewarded us with the highest standard of living on earth; a Nation second to none in questions of morality.

As such, we want—and we must encourage—an image of America that is an undeniable reflection of our abundance, our world-leading standard of living, our moral foundations.

I do not picture a nation of dudes or Beau Brummels; nor do I look for a nation of expensively garbed women and men. I say we should encourage the revival of an idea as old as recorded history, the idea the Hebrew fathers had when it was written:

> The doctrines of religion are resolved into carefulness, carefulness into vigorousness, vigorousness into guiltlessness, guiltlessness into abstemiousness, abstemiousness into cleanliness, and cleanliness into godliness.

Which theologian John Wesley centuries later translated into:

> Cleanliness is next to godliness.

I say we should lend the unanimous voice and the support of this most important body to a renaissance of this age-old concept of cleanliness in body and neatness and appropriateness in appearance, making it a national force as much as a personal responsibility.

This is, obviously, not something we can legislate; but we can give it our endorsement and our encouragement.

This was exactly the experience of the school system in the city of Buffalo, N.Y., which launched a dress-right movement through the students themselves for two basic reasons:

First. To reverse the trend to sloppy, inappropriate appearance for school, and in so doing—

Second. To produce better student behavior and study attitudes as a result of the switch to more respectable attire.

The history of the Buffalo experiment is interesting.

It was back in 1955 that Dr. Joseph Manch, who then was Buffalo's associate superintendent for school-community coordination and is today its school superintendent, became concerned about the apparent relationship between the way boys and girls dressed and the way they behaved. He observed on a daily basis that many of the youngsters who were brought before him on serious misconduct charges were dressed in extreme fashion or looked very sloppy and unkempt. From duck-tail hairdos to combat-type boots, many of these freshmen and older delinquents presented extreme appearances of one kind or another.

Dr. Manch thought if he could raise the standard of dress in high school, the conduct of teen-agers would be favorably affected. But, Dr. Manch also reasoned that the steam for this drive should come from the students themselves, because there would otherwise be the human tendency to oppose or resent rules coming down from above.

The inter-high-school student council, which represents all 14 Buffalo public high schools, took up as a special project this campaign for appropriate dress for high school boys and girls. The council is made up of school leaders whose example is looked up to by the majority of other students. The council president in 1955, Caesar Naples, a 17-year-old high school senior at that time, appointed a special committee, with a student representative from each high school, to draft a series of dress recommendations. The council voted enthusiastically to endorse these recommendations and to promote the "dress right" campaign in Buffalo's high schools.

These boys and girls carried out a program of communications keyed to the idea of making neatness and appropriateness the new way of life for Buffalo's teen-agers. Principals agreed with the student council that this was the basis of a good campaign, a campaign that would have many benefits. Posted in every high school division room were the council dress recommendations which have now been documented in numerous articles and publications, including "Buffalo's Magic Mirror" in This Week magazine, November 23, 1958; "Students Vote on Student Dress" by George E. Arnstein, in the Clearing House, March 1958; and "Dress and Conduct; an Inter-High School Student Council Program," by the above-mentioned Dr. Manch, in the Journal of the New York State School Boards Association, Inc., September 1958.

Aided by the educational arm of the male apparel industry, the American Institute of Men's and Boys' Wear, the Buffalo experiment has been given national importance and, according to a survey by Scholastic magazine, approximately 65 percent of our public high schools have followed the Buffalo example and initiated "dress right" programs.

More important than this very convincing statistic is the fact that teachers at schools with such programs report that an improvement in behavior and study habits has generally resulted from this upgrading of appearance standards. The importance of this concept goes far beyond school walls.

The clergymen of the Nation are looking to restore the practice of dressing more appropriately for churchgoing. In the concluding paragraph of an article in the Catholic Digest of March 1958—"What Ever Happened to the Sunday Suit?"—the author, Kay Sullivan, notes:

> In questions of dress or morals, men go in droves, a philosopher once observed. In other words, the few set the pace for the many. One family neatly dressed in tasteful clothing may be the Sunday-morning example a whole parish needs.

And she asks:

> Will it be you and your family?

The Nation's businessmen are also in accord with the "dress right" concept, feeling that the salesman who presents his best face is doing his best for both himself and his company. Thinking along very similar lines, our Armed Forces are encouraging servicemen at home and abroad to put their best foot forward for their own sakes as well as our Nation's. The country's law enforcement officers are strong in the belief that the dress-right movement may provide a partial answer to the problem of juvenile delinquency. A member of New York City's legal department, to cite just one example, has stated:

> When a person begins to disregard convention in his personal appearance, he definitely is on the road toward disregarding other conventions of society and we then begin to get a delinquency problem.

The weight of the evidence, it seems to me, indicates a national tide in favor of a movement toward neater and more appropriate dress. Such a worthwhile effort deserves full congressional support to insure its continuance and growth.

I, therefore, propose in House Joint Resolution 202 that the week of March 2 to 8 this year be proclaimed as the first National Dress Right Week and that in years to come the first week of March be set aside nationally for such observance.

OCEANOGRAPHIC RESEARCH SHIP

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, in December of last year, only a few months ago, the President's Science Advisory Committee made a report to the President, a very interesting report, which every Member should study. In that report the committee said:

> Oceanography is another promising field which has received inadequate attention. For the study of the oceans the United States has only a few research vessels, all inadequately equipped. A vessel specially designed and constructed for oceanographic research has not been built in this country since 1930.

That seems clearly to constitute a recommendation for at least the construction of another research vessel in that important field of research activity. Yet only a few days ago, on February 7, we find that the research vessel Albatross III has been deactivated. In other words, the President's Committee on Science makes a recommendation which is, clearly, to build another research vessel, but only a few days ago the Government agency operating the research vessel orders one deactivated. I think the agency of the Government which made that order should reconsider it and keep this vessel in active operation.

CLARIFICATION AND MODERNIZATION OF LAWS AFFECTING FIREARMS

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SIKES] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, during the 85th Congress efforts were made to clarify firearms legislation and to remove the inequities which exist in that legislation. Those efforts were not successful, despite the fact that they enjoyed the support of sportsmen, firearms dealers, and gun collectors throughout the Nation. Following the adjournment of Congress, a number of meetings were held between representatives of the Alcohol and Tobacco Tax Division, representatives from the National Rifle Association, Sporting Arms and Ammunition Manufacturers Institute, the American Gun Dealers Association, the Importers Association, the National Chiefs of Police Association, the Metropolitan Police Department, and many individual gun collectors. These meetings were held in order to seek to reach a common ground of understanding between the various segments of the industry. Out of these meetings came a fine degree of mutual understanding and accord. General agreements were reached on a proposed series of changes in the present law which it is felt will be beneficial to all of those affected. From these meetings and the accompanying agreements have come proposed legislation which thus far has been introduced in the House of Representatives by me and by the Honorable CECIL KING, our distinguished colleague from California, who also is a director of the National Rifle Association. Our bills are H.R. 4094 and H.R. 4029, respectively.

The purpose of these measures is to amend the National Firearms Act to eliminate the proration of the occupational tax on persons dealing in machineguns and certain other firearms, to reduce the occupational and transfer taxes on certain firearms, to make the transferor and transferee jointly liable for the transfer tax on firearms, and to make certain technical changes in the definition of the term "firearm."

The National Firearms Act—sometimes referred to as the Machine Gun Act—was enacted by the 73d Congress in 1934 to provide a making and transfer tax of $200 on machineguns and certain specified firearms which had become a national crime problem in the prohibition era. In addition to machineguns the act applies to a silencer for a firearm and to sawed-off rifles and shotguns. The law does not apply to pistols and revolvers or to ordinary sporting rifles and shotguns. Any weapon defined as a firearm by the National Firearms Act is required to be registered with the Department of the Treasury and becomes subject to the prohibitive tax provision of the act. Several technical provisions of the law have resulted in a severe hardship on law-abiding gun owners and particularly gun collectors without adding to the effectiveness of the act as a crime-prevention measure. Also, at least one provision in the law has left open a loophole by means of which unscrupulous persons have been able to evade the tax which Congress decreed should be placed upon the transfer of machineguns. It is the purpose of my bill to correct these technical shortcomings.

The National Firearms Act provides, in part, that a shotgun or a rifle having a barrel of less than 18 inches in length is a firearm and subject to the $200 making and transfer tax, except that rifles of .22 caliber are exempt if the barrel length is 16 inches. An area of inequity arises here from the fact that a number of popular sporting rifles and a number of rifles having great value to gun collectors, have barrel lengths just slightly under 18 inches. While such rifles could not be considered concealable and while they do not enter into the crime picture they still must be classed as a firearm subject to the taxation provisions of the law. It is one of the purposes of my bill so to amend the definition of the term "firearm" under the law, that it will not apply to any rifle which has a barrel of at least 16 inches in length. This will mean that all rifles having a barrel length of at least 16 inches will be exempt from the law, not .22 caliber rifles alone as at present.

Another area of inequity from the standpoint of law-abiding shooters and gun collectors, arises from the provision in the law which defines as a firearm, in addition to a machinegun or sawed-off rifle or shotgun, "any other weapon, except a pistol or revolver, from which a shot is discharged by an explosive if such weapon is capable of being concealed on the person." It is apparent from this language that Congress did not intend the prohibitive taxing provision of the Machine Gun Act to apply to pistols or revolvers. The law, however, does not define the term pistol or revolver and it therefore becomes a matter of administrative interpretation as to what is a pistol, excepted under the act, and what is any other weapon prohibited under the act. We see here a complex administrative problem. If a particular weapon is clearly recognizable as a pistol or revolver it meets a specific exception in the National Firearms Act. However, if the weapon is concealable and is not clearly recognizable as a pistol or revolver then it must fall into the loose category of any other weapon and becomes immediately subject to a prohibitive $200 transfer tax.

Highly valued items to gun collectors are the guns which mark stages in the development of firearms from their earliest beginning. In the process of experimentation, trial and error and plain American inventiveness which has led to the modern pistol and revolver, many strange firearms have had their brief moments on the scene. Some are clearly recognizable as a step in the development of a modern pistol; others are not. Many, by administrative edict, now fall in the any other weapon category under the National Firearms Act and are, therefore, subject to its prohibitive controls.

Since pistols and revolvers make up the vast majority of weapons capable of being concealed on the person and, since for good and sufficient reasons the Congress felt that pistols and revolvers should not be included in the Machine Gun Act, it would seem just and equitable that the full $200 transfer tax not be applied to the very small minority of concealable weapons which may be interpreted to be neither a pistol nor a revolver. To the contrary, it would appear that the purpose of the act would be better served by a nominal tax on this category of weapon which would permit them to be possessed and traded by gun collectors while retaining the records and controls now exercised by the Department of the Treasury under the National Firearms Act.

Experience through the years has demonstrated that the type of concealable weapon controlled under the National Firearms Act which has most frequently occurred as a crime is the weapon that is made from a rifle or shotgun by cutting it down in length so as to make it concealable on the person. Under the present law if a rifle or shotgun is altered by cutting off the barrels so that the barrel length is less than that prescribed in the definition of a firearm then the weapon clearly becomes subject to the criminal provisions of the law. In many cases however the criminal not only cuts off the barrel of a conventional rifle or shotgun but may also cut off the shoulder stock and thus create a one-hand weapon of greater concealability than had he sawed off the barrel alone. In the past, criminals apprehended with such weapons have attempted to avoid prosecution on the ground that the weapon they created by cutting off the barrel and the stock of a shotgun or a rifle was in fact a pistol since it was a one-hand weapon. In the view that it was just this type of criminal weapon that Congress sought to control in the National Firearms Act, I am suggesting an amendment to the definition of the term "firearm" by adding the language, "or any weapon made from a rifle or shotgun—whether by alteration, modification, or otherwise—if such weapon as modified has an overall length of less than 26 inches."

The National Firearms Act provides for an annual $200 tax for persons engaging in the business of dealing in machineguns and those categories of weapons defined as "firearms." At present the payment of this occupational tax may be prorated on a monthly basis established on the fiscal year. It has been called to my attention that certain persons other than bona fide dealers have been able to take advantage of this provision to avoid the payment of the transfer tax on machineguns by paying the dealers occupational tax for 1 month only. A person engaged in the business of dealing in machineguns and who has qualified for and paid the occupational tax provided for in the law is permitted an exemption from the transfer tax. As the law now stands a man may qualify as a machinegun dealer in June by paying only one-twelfth of the normal $200 dealers occupational tax. He may then purchase machineguns without paying the $200 transfer tax and, at the end of June, may simply elect not to renew his dealers status by paying his occupational tax for the following year. It is one of the purposes of my bill to remove the pro rata feature with respect to the occupational tax so that a person qualifying as a dealer, engaged in the business of dealing in machineguns, will pay the $200 occupational tax for a year or fraction thereof.

Any weakness in the present language of the law has been that the transferor alone has been responsible for the transfer tax on machineguns. If through false pretense, an individual not actually a bona fide dealer has been able to secure a machinegun transfer tax exempt the Government has had no recourse since no liability for the tax rested on the transferee. The purpose of my bill is to correct this by providing that, if a firearm is transferred without payment of the transfer tax, the transferor and transferee shall become jointly and severally liable for the tax.

The amendments will improve the enforcement of the National Firearms Act with respect to machineguns and sawed-off shotguns and will, at the same time, alleviate some of the inequities that plague gun collectors and shooter-sportsmen without contributing to the effectiveness of the law.

I sincerely hope we may have the support of the House and Senate in securing the approval of one of these measures and that the committee will speedily accord us action toward bringing a bill to the floor.

IMPORT QUOTAS FOR OIL MUST BE MADE MANDATORY

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. EDMONDSON] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Speaker, the time has come when this administration must take action to place oil import quotas upon a mandatory basis, or this Congress must accept its responsibility to preserve a basic and essential industry.

In my own State of Oklahoma, evidence is mounting each day that loosely and inadequately controlled imports under the voluntary quota system are steadily undermining the strength and stability of America's domestic oil industry—and the impact of trouble in domestic oil production is being felt by other business and by State government in the oil producing areas.

The chairman of the committee on oil and gas in Oklahoma's House of Representatives, the Honorable William Shibley, wrote me the other day to advise that Oklahoma "lost 1½ million dollars last year, from our revenue the year before, due to cutting down the allowable and flooding the country with imported oil."

Representative Shibley urged in his letter that existing law regarding import quotas must be amended to provide mandatory controls "as it has been proven that it cannot be successful on a voluntary basis."

Along similar lines, the president of one of Oklahoma's leading oil companies wrote on February 2 to predict that "if no action is taken at this time, the number and importance of those ignoring the voluntary plan will double within 30 to 60 days."

The voluntary plan—

Wrote this veteran oilman—

is gradually, but increasingly falling apart * * * and the amount of unallocated imported crude oil and products has now reached a volume that is having a serious and detrimental effect upon domestic producers, refiners, and marketers as well.

If no action is taken between now and the end of this month—

the whole matter could be thrown into one of detrimental chaos.

Thus far, the answer of the administration to the mounting need of the industry has merely been the announcement of another investigation.

On Wednesday, January 28, the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization announced it planned to investigate the impact of imports of crude oil and petroleum products on the national security. This is an investigation which involves more delay and is entirely unnecessary. During the past 4 years, the problem of excessive oil imports has been studied repeatedly by the executive branch and the Congress. During this time imports have doubled. There is no need for further study. There is real need for action, and action now.

In 1954 the President's Cabinet Committee on Energy Supplies and Resources Policy conducted a long and careful investigation and determined that petroleum imports in excess of the ratio which they bore to domestic production in 1954 would be, in fact, a threat to the security of the Nation. At that time imports were equivalent to 16.6 percent of domestic production. Today imports are almost 30 percent of domestic production.

At the time of this earlier study, Congress and the administration were concerned with the level of imports which, at that time, was about 1 million barrels a day. Today imports total about 2 million barrels a day. If imports of crude oil and products were excessive at 1 million barrels a day in 1954, they certainly are excessive today at 2 million barrels a day with no need for further investigation.

All segments of the domestic oil producing industry are continuing to decline as pressure from these excessive imports mounts. In the last 2 years alone, the drilling of wildcat or exploratory wells has declined 26 percent. About 30 percent of the domestic industry's producing capacity is shut in and idle. Domestic production in 1958 was 450,000 barrels daily below the level in 1956 although demand increased.

In my own State of Oklahoma, oil and gas production is an important segment of the economy. Oklahoma was the first State in the Union to develop conservation laws to assure the State and the Nation an ever-expanding supply of petroleum. Yet, of what value is it to establish practices which put an end to wasteful flush production at home if wells in the Middle East or Venezuela can run rampant resulting in a flood of foreign oil strangling the domestic producing industry?

Since 1956 the number of total wells drilled in Oklahoma has declined more than 20 percent. The number of rotary rigs active has declined nearly 30 percent. Although domestic demand for petroleum during that period increased nearly 250,000 barrels daily, production in Oklahoma actually declined 42,000 barrels daily, or 7 percent.

As a result of these depressed conditions in the industry, there were nearly 7,000 fewer employees in the oil producing industry in Oklahoma in 1958 than there were in 1956.

In Oklahoma, oil or gas is produced in all but 8 of the 77 counties and about half of the entire land area is under lease for oil or gas. Thus, it is obvious that whatever damages the petroleum industry in Oklahoma also damages the State economy. Because the administration has failed to take effective action to limit crude oil and product imports to a reasonable level, those imports have resulted in serious declines in oil producing activity in Oklahoma.

The serious decline that has been suffered by the domestic oil producing industry during the past several years due to excessive oil imports is of concern to the entire Nation. Oil and gas today are produced in 31 States and no commodity is more important to the everyday welfare of our citizenry. Most important, however, overriding the effects on our Nation's economic welfare, is the effect uncontrolled oil imports have upon the Nation's security.

In 1955, the Congress being concerned about the effect of imports of essential commodities upon the Nation's security, enacted the defense amendment to the trade agreements law. This amendment was designed to give authority to the President to limit imports of strategic materials. Paramount before Congress at that time was the critical condition facing the domestic petroleum industry, lead and zinc industry, and coal industry. During 1957, the President took action to limit imports of crude oil, urging the importing companies to voluntarily restrict their individual imports. This program was not effective. As a result, Congress again became concerned about the problem last year and amended the Defense Amendment of 1955 so as to strengthen the President's authority. The President and the Special Cabinet Committee created to study this problem also have recognized that the voluntary program to limit oil imports has been inadequate. As a result, the Cabinet Committee has been studying the problem since last September but has been unable to agree upon a new program. In the meantime, imports have increased day after day.

According to front-page news reports, the first tanker of Communist-produced petroleum is to arrive in New York sometime this month. This may be another entering wedge in the efforts of international communism in its campaign of economic warfare upon the United States. It serves to show that delay on the part of the administration in exercising its authority which Congress delegated to it under the defense amendment invites increased imports accompanied by further damage to the national security.

For 4 years the effects of increasing oil imports upon the domestic economy and national security have been recognized by all concerned as being a most serious problem. There is general agreement that oil imports must be limited. There is general agreement that the voluntary program is inadequate. Certainly under these circumstances it is reasonable to expect an early solution to this problem. If the President and his Cabinet Committee will not or cannot come forth with an answer promptly and without further delay, the Congress must assume its basic responsibility and provide specific legislative limitations upon imports of petroleum.

In this regard I respectfully direct the attention of the House to H.R. 3623, introduced on January 29, 1959, and now before the House Committee on Ways and Means.

Under this bill, three new sections would be added to the national defense amendment of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Extension Act. The first of these new sections requires the President to limit allowable imports of crude petroleum and petroleum products to levels that do not exceed the 1954 ratios between such imports and domestic crude oil production. The second section provides for allocations and mandatory quotas for petroleum producing countries and areas, with import licenses awarded on the basis of bids under Presidential regulations. The third new section makes the new mandatory import quota effective notwithstanding any other provision of law or foreign trade agreement.

Mr. Speaker, unless this administration acts quickly to place the present unsatisfactory quota system upon a mandatory basis, further delay in Washington is going to be disastrous for many of our independent oil producers, and for many who depend upon them.

The time has come for Congress to insist upon action.

INVESTIGATION OF ALFORD-HAYS ELECTION

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALFORD] is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. ALFORD. Mr. Speaker, it distresses me to report that at this moment, the agents of the admired and respected Federal Bureau of Investigation, under orders from the present administration of the Justice Department of the United States of America, are engaged in an invasion of the Fifth Congressional District of the State of Arkansas, in what can be described only as a politically inspired investigation. Permit me at this time, to read in toto an editorial which appeared last Sunday, February 8, in the distinguished conservative daily newspaper, the Arkansas Democrat. I quote as follows:

WHO WANTED AN INVESTIGATION?

Raised eyebrows greeted announcement that the FBI had stepped into the Alford-Hays election. Subsequent revelations at Justice Department press conferences failed to remove the cause for wonderment.

"An investigation is being made," a Department spokesman said, "to see if Federal laws were violated in the election."

The request for the investigation, according to the Department, had come from a reputable official. Who asked for the investigation?

Brooks Hays has disclaimed any connection with it—as he did the protest filed by John Wells, Recorder publisher.

Mr. Speaker, may I say aside here that the Recorder—John Wells, editor and publisher, is a purely political publication having a circulation of approximately 3,000, a weekly publication from the same presses which also print the Daisy Bates newspaper, mouthpiece for the NAACP in Arkansas. Now, I continue with the editorial.

The current issue of the Recorder sees the investigation as an outgrowth of the recent hearing before a House committee.

It's doubtful that the Justice Department would usurp the prerogative of Congress in jumping into a case still filed in the committee's unfinished business folder. The FBI's reputation for doing a job ranks high with all Americans.

But being ordered to investigate an election in which the victory was an outspoken anti to the Justice Department's philosophy could easily be interpreted as political persecution. Such use of the agency could brand the G-men as an Americanized gestapo.

An investigation of a questioned election is in order. But such investigations should originate, not with a reputable official in Washington, but with the injured parties—the defeated candidate and the voters in the election area.

If politics dictated the FBI's entry into the election case, it's a sad day for the Nation—and suggests the Justice Department is misnamed.

Press releases quote Attorney General Rogers as saying a reputable official requested the investigation. This is not the first time we have had illegal intervention into the affairs of our State by this administration. In a book entitled "The Case of the Sleeping People," written by my wife and myself, to be released this week, we call attention to the fact that the people of our area have been finally awakened by Little Rock school frustrations and the occupation of a peaceful community by a combat division with fixed bayonets and loaded rifles ordered to police a public high school supported solely by the people of a sovereign State. In this book we call attention to the fact that as late as last September the present Attorney General set himself and his Department against the rights of a free American people guaranteed them under the Constitution of the United States.

In the present politically inspired investigation they are asking questions—interviewing residents of my district—seeking to document a series of politically inspired charges concerning my election to the House of Representatives. The obvious political overtone of this unwarranted use of our Federal investigative force is best demonstrated by the fact that these agents are asking questions on only one side of the proposition. They are not concerned with the whole story of what happened last November when the people of my district decided they had grown tired of inaction and had grown tired of subservience to an all-powerful central Federal administration.

It is more distressing to me that this is not the first such invasion of the Fifth Congressional District of Arkansas by the Federal Bureau of Investigation on orders from the, then, Attorney General of the Justice Department. We know that this is embarrassing to the loyal agents of this distinguished service of our Government. The FBI is not to be condemned; they are merely obeying orders from above albeit these orders are shaded by political retribution.

Little more than a year ago, they swarmed into the district by the dozens—yes, by the scores under direction of the Justice Department—in an effort to justify an equally as unwarranted and illegal use of Federal police powers in a matter reserved to the discretion of the States. Then, as now, they sought information on only one side of the issue—they sought only evidence that would support the politically inspired action of the Department of Justice—yes, even the politically inspired action of the executive department of our Government. Then, as now, the Federal police powers were diverted from their intended purpose—in which the FBI always has enjoyed the approbation of the American people—to a scheme that borders on being nefarious.

They interrogated hundreds of people. Guns in shoulder holsters, they came in teams into the newpaper offices to question reporters—to demand access to private files—and they asked questions on only one side of the issue. They sought out newspaper reporters in their homes—invading their privacy—and when all else failed, they attempted to wheedle out hearsay information that might support the political position that had been dictated from above.

I say this is an unhealthy situation in America.

There is no room in America for a police state—a gestapo, if you please—engaged in the political soirees aimed at any who may take issue with those who are presently, although temporarily, in power. And I say that, if this condition is permitted to continue, then the name of the Department of Justice should be changed—for it certainly is a misnomer.

I welcome an investigation, but it is my feeling that the FBI has no place in questioning residents of the Fifth Congressional District of Arkansas on the circumstances surrounding the selection of their Representative in this Congress. I repeat, that is a matter reserved exclusively to the Members of this House. And I have every confidence in the ability and the intent of the Members of this House—and their duly constituted committees—to decide fairly and impartially upon the question of whether I shall serve as the Representative of the Fifth District of Arkansas.

It is my understanding that there are several Members of this distinguished body whose margin of victory was much narrower than mine. Yet, it is strange, indeed, that apparently, to our knowledge, there is no investigation by the Justice Department in these elections. Just why is the Justice Department investigating the Fifth District of Arkansas if it is not for political persecution? Just what are they seeking? Who is the responsible official who ordered such an investigation? Certainly the FBI was not ordered by any committee of this House, for this distinguished body is capable of carrying out its own investigation.

Mr. Speaker, I resent with all the power that is in me the loosing of the Federal police upon my constituents. And I suggest that it is time this House let the Department know—and in no uncertain terms—that it will no longer tolerate such politically inspired activities by the Federal Bureau of Investigation on orders from the Justice Department.

Within the next 10 days I shall be prepared to present evidence to this House that subversive forces are the real masters of deceit behind the school crisis and the so-called civil rights issue in America today. Do the people of the Fifth District of Arkansas have no civil rights?

I submit to this most distinguished legislative body that my motives are honorable and patriotic and that I represent a people who resent being ground under the heel of a combat division and now are intimidated by the present administration simply because they, the people, voted the dictates of their own conscience.

The present administration has torn to shreds the 14th amendment and the 10th amendment—and now, if we loyal Americans permit these gestapo-like methods to continue, we shall be, in fact, under a dictatorship—and the 9th amendment, too, will have been illegally destroyed. The question I leave with you is whether or not political intimidation and retribution is the American way or whether we will defend the right of every American, whether from your district or mine, to have his vote counted without fear of reprisal.

In America today we stand between two great mountain peaks of disaster, atheistic communism, on the one hand, and dictatorship through judicial fiat on the other. In the valley between these two monstrous evil forces the small voice of patriotic Americans cries out for simple justice.

Mr. FORRESTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALFORD. I yield.

Mr. FORRESTER. I think I understood the gentleman correctly. Did I understand the gentleman to say the Justice Department released an item to the effect that they were investigating you and your election?

Mr. ALFORD. That is right, sir.

Mr. FORRESTER. Then I would like to make this comment which I think will be appreciated by the lawyers in this House from the North, South, East, and West. It certainly was a departure from the custom and ethics of the Justice Department or an investigating or prosecuting agency. It certainly was not ethical. It does not reflect credit upon the Department of Justice because they, above all, should operate on the principle and upon the idea that a person is innocent until he is proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. Therefore I believe that the lawyers in this audience would have to agree with me that there must have been something that would cause the Justice Department to violate the ethics of the prosecuting department of this Government to give views of that kind to a newspaper. Then I will have to say to the gentleman that as a matter of fact, while I happen to know that the gentleman is making a great sacrifice to serve in Congress, because he is one of the outstanding eye, ear, nose, and throat doctors in the State of Arkansas, that the gentleman has committed what, in the minds of many people of this country unfortunately is an unpardonable sin. That is, the gentleman happens to be a segregationist.

Mr. ALFORD. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Was not the investigation to which you have made reference an effort to ascertain whether civil rights had been violated and an election properly held?

Mr. ALFORD. It is my opinion that the investigation of an election is the prerogative of this distinguished body.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. On the qualification of the Members, that is right. But that was not my question. The question was whether or not the investigation made by the FBI was not along the line of protecting the right to vote.

Mr. ALFORD. We have not been informed as to what the line is. I think the gentleman should realize that that is one of the reasons I am standing here today. There has been no notification, and the people of my district are very concerned about this investigation and feel that I should speak in their behalf.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I am not finding any fault with that. The overall picture, as far as the national situation is involved, I thought from what you said, was along the line of trying to ascertain whether or not someone's civil rights, the right to vote, had been violated.

Mr. ALFORD. We do not know why they are investigating.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. If it was, I was just going to add that that civil rights legislation was one of the outstanding achievements of your own party, and perhaps this is a part of the harvest.

Mr. ALFORD. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALFORD. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I understand the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALFORD] to say that the Attorney General of the United States on inquiry said that this investigation was requested by a responsible Federal official?

Mr. ALFORD. That is correct.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Have you been able to find out who the responsible Federal official is or was?

Mr. ALFORD. I have not been able to find out who that Federal official is.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Do you think you will be able to find out?

Mr. ALFORD. No, sir. My personal opinion is that we will not be able to find out except by this method.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALFORD. I yield.

Mr. LINDSAY. Does the gentleman take the position, apart from any particular case or cases that he may have in mind, that under no circumstances does the Justice Department have authority to investigate alleged irregularities in Federal elections?

Mr. ALFORD. According to the best legal minds I can consult, they are completely out of bounds, because that is the prerogative reserved to this House of Representatives.

Mr. FORRESTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. ALFORD. I yield.

Mr. FORRESTER. I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. LINDSAY] was connected with the Justice Department. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. LINDSAY], is it the policy of the Justice Department to publicly announce that they are going to make investigations of persons until they have determined what they are going to do, and bring their indictment, and, then make that public information?

Mr. LINDSAY. I have no knowledge as to whether the Justice Department in this particular instance made any public announcement that they were conducting an investigation of this specific case. But I do know and I do say that the Justice Department would be remiss and negligent in its responsibility to the American people if it did not, on its own initiative, if not on specific complaint, investigate allegations of irregularities in Federal elections.

It has done so in many instances over the years.

Mr. FORRESTER. Just a minute. The gentleman is not answering my question. I am asking the gentleman: Is it the policy, and is it the proper policy, for the Department of Justice to make public announcement that they are investigating citizens of the United States?

Mr. LINDSAY. Based on my own experience with the Justice Department I can say that on many occasions the Department has been asked whether or not it was undertaking an investigation of a matter within Federal jurisdiction, and in each instance the Department has answered publicly, "Yes," if this was in fact the case.

Mr. FORRESTER. Then I would apprehend that this gratuitous and unsolicited announcement is under the new constitution of the Supreme Court and under these new laws that none of us ever had the privilege of studying or reading, or passing or not passing.

Mr. ALFORD. I thank the gentleman.

THE CASE OF HENRY LABOUISSE

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOLAND] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, Joseph Alsop on Monday devoted his newspaper column to the case of Henry Labouisse, former director of the United Nations relief agency dealing with the Arab refugee relief program.

A few years ago I had the privilege of witnessing the tremendously effective job Mr. Labouisse was doing in what could easily be termed "the world's toughest task." In the light of his magnificent performance it seems tragic that petty partisan politics is now keeping him from an appointment to a position that cries for a man of his talents and caliber.

Assuredly, there are positions in the administration to which Mr. Alcorn ought to apply his political veto. But, certainly not to this one. The job as Administrator of the International Cooperation Administration is too important to the security and welfare of this Nation to be sacrificed on the alter of political spoils.

Mr. Speaker, on Monday I obtained unanimous consent to include Mr. Alsop's column from the Washington Post with my remarks. However, Senator FULBRIGHT also asked in the other body to have the Alsop article included and it was printed with his remarks in the RECORD of Monday. I now ask permission to have my remarks of Monday on the Labouisse case inserted in the RECORD for today.

THADDEUS KOSCIUSKO

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, February 12, we observe the anniversary of the birth of Thaddeus Kosciusko, an outstanding hero of our Revolutionary War and a champion of liberty in his native Poland.

Born in Poland in 1746, he was educated at the Jesuit College at Breesc, the Royal School at Warsaw, and at Mézières, France, where he studied engineering and artillery.

His imagination stirred by the American Revolution, he borrowed money to come to America to offer his services to the struggling colonies. His success in planning fortifications for the Delaware River won him a commission as a colonel of engineers in the Continental Army. His choice of battlefields and erection of fortifications contributed greatly to the brilliant victory of our forces at Saratoga. During the winter of 1782 he was stationed near Charleston, S.C., where he was more conspicuous as an officer of cavalry than as an engineer. He was among the first of the Continentals to enter Charleston after its evacuation by the British. On October 13, 1783, Congress made him a brigadier general.

Having served this country brilliantly, in July of 1784 he returned to his native Poland, hoping to carry on the fight for freedom there. For more than 20 years he continued his valiant but unsuccessful efforts for Polish liberty and independence. He died in exile in Switzerland in 1817.

Kosciusko's name will live forever—symbolic of man's age-old struggle against the forces of oppression. It is fitting that on the anniversary of his birth we pay tribute to the memory of a valiant champion of liberty and justice for all mankind.

RACKETEERING

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BONNER). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the local press last night and again this morning carried illustrations showing the chairman of the Senate Rackets Committee, Senator McCLELLAN, and his counsel, Robert Kennedy, pointing to a jukebox. They seemed to be interested in how it operated. In committee hearings they are interested in who determines when and by whom they shall be used and how much do the extortionists take for servicing them. In the paper this morning clear across the front page is a streamer telling again about the jukebox investigation.

Shakedown," we find a paragraph that states:

The owner of a small Chicago confectionery speaks: "The man from the syndicate came around and told me that they were going to put a jukebox in my store." I said: "Fine, how much do I get out of it?" And he said: "If you're nice about it, you can keep your health." But he ain't been too bad. He gives me 25 percent of all the money that goes into the machine.

Someone might think from reading these magazines and the daily press that this jukebox business as practiced by racketeers is news. Well, it is not. Some 35 years ago a similar situation was in existence in Michigan. I had apples to sell. I live over on the west side of the State and I wanted to send them over and did send them over to the Detroit market. A lot of CIO boys and a lot of Teamsters like apples and, of course, I wanted to get them there and on the market as cheaply as possible, considering, of course, my own interest.

But when they got the apples over there, do you know what happened? I could not get those apples off of my own truck and on the market unless I paid a union man $25 to watch the hired man unload them. Was not that a sweet situation? Of course, the $25 had to go on the price of the apples. So the union boys paid that much more for every one they bought. There is no getting away from that. That is it. And with everything one buys where an unnecessary payment is added.

Somewhat later I learned in a congressional hearing being held in Cleveland in 1953 that the AP—a big organization—I was a little fellow and I could not do anything except ship my apples to Grand Rapids—which I did—could not unload its groceries at its own warehouse docks in Cleveland unless they paid $25 for the privilege. It was just that bad. That was 6 or 7 years ago.

Now, here is this committee in the other body, the McClellan committee, which is doing a wonderful job, as is its staff, again putting on the record the deplorable situation that exists in the jukebox industry, where the law is still being violated, where racketeering and extortion is nationwide and a daily procedure. When will the Congress legislate in the interest of, for the benefit of, all rather than for just a minority group.

This jukebox business is not news, at least it is not new. The present situation is just a repetition, or rather a continuation, of what has been happening for many years. I hope the committee will continue to keep that situation before the public. The disclosure it is making is many, many times larger than anything heretofore put on the record.

Away back in 1953—and before me is a copy of those hearings—beginning on page 63, you will find a statement by the president of a milk drivers' union. How he got mixed into it I do not know, unless he was selling milk to a storekeeper and found his deliveries curtailed. He branded the Teamsters' demand for that $25 union dues as a racket. He testified under oath it was a racket. That was a union leader, the president of the union, local No. 361.

Along came Mr. Presser. If you have been following the hearings you have heard of Mr. Presser, a gentleman in Ohio. He testified, and what did he say? What, in substance, did he testify to? He testified that if anyone wanted to operate a jukebox in Toledo—the same situation existed in Detroit—those juke-boxes had to be serviced by the member of a certain union, or else. What does the "or else" mean? It meant the store building was damaged, it meant that the Teamsters Union would not deliver beer, cigarettes, food, or anything else to the fellow who was operating the place—coercion of the worst kind, unless the money was paid over to the racketeer who hid behind a union card.

Racketeering? Of course, it was racketeering and extortion—continuous over at least 7 years as shown by the record and long before.

Then there is Buffalino. You have heard about Buffalino. You heard about him in 1953 in those other hearings. Buffalino is the expert who has heart failure—heart trouble, I should say; his heart does not fail him, and neither does his gall—he has heart trouble every time he is subpenaed as a witness, and he can always find a doctor or two who come along with a certificate that if he is made to appear before a committee in answer to a subpena, his health will be endangered. The number of people whose health and physical well-being have been endangered by Brother Buffalino just runs into the hundreds. They do not have heart trouble. They have trouble with their heads when they are cracked and with their faces when they are disfigured. That is the kind of trouble they have; trouble that the doctor cannot prevent, but a law officer could.

What is the point of all this? The point is that, while the McClellan committee is doing a wonderfully fine job on the Teamsters, they have not gotten around to Reuther. No, I want to strike that; that would not be good in the RECORD, Mr. Speaker, and I ask unanimous consent to strike it out in my revision.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The McClellan committee has the money, the staff, and is doing the job which every good citizen familiar with its activities hopes will continue, 50 times as effective as that of any other committee which has tackled the job, and public opinion is now such that it cannot be throttled. But the record in the clerk's office shows that some 180, I think it is, Members of this House have received financial contributions; a Republican or two just here and there, spotted only like a defective apple in a barrel, and not many of them from unions. And, I cannot help but wonder whether that has anything to do, because of our charity and gratefulness for a gift or a kindness, with the way we fail to act as legislators concerned with the welfare of all the people.

I want now to talk to the Republicans for just a moment or two. Democrats, please do not listen. What I am wondering, my friends, is when our Democratic friends on this side will awaken to the thought, the truth, that what the union contributors are doing is not helping the Democratic Party or the Democratic candidates. What they are doing is strengthening themselves, their own political organization—getting ready to take over the National Democratic Party just as they have taken it over in Michigan. I wonder when folks are going to awaken to that fact over there on the Democratic side and quit going along.

You remember last year when a Member on that side was a candidate in a primary, and what these contributors in Wayne County did? They put another candidate in the primary. The Democratic candidate and his father, both Members of the House, had gone along conscientiously and honestly, in my judgment, with the CIO; but, when the opportunity came and they thought they could liquidate him, in they jumped with a union candidate. They did not do it, thank the good Lord, because the voters resented their treachery. But they did make the effort—they put their candidate in, a union member, and put their money back of him, and that is just what they will do to the Democrats who take their money and go along just as soon as the union leaders think they have the strength to win. The instant the union boss thinks he has the votes—zip, and out comes the rug from under the Democratic candidate, and he will hit the floor so hard when that day comes that he will not be able to understand what happened to him.

Here is a cartoon that came to one of our colleagues from Missouri, the only Republican, I think, from Missouri, Mr. CURTIS. This came from the secretary of this union and it pictures the Republican Party elephant with a swelled head. Well, we have not had any swelled heads since last November. Do not make that silly charge. We are getting next to the facts of life, and some of us are beginning to realize that we have to stand up to fellows like Soapy Williams and his boss, Reuther, or forget about the welfare of our State and perhaps the welfare of our country.

That may be true, but at least we are not fooled as are some of our Democratic friends—into the belief that the CIO boys who contribute to your campaign are real friends—the CIO and A.F. of L. politicians are just fattening you up for slaughter on election day. They will stick the knife in and twist it around the first time they get a chance.

This follows the first line:

The party symbol's right for you—
We're fed up with your big gung-ho!
Why don't you pack your trunk—and go?

Well, we might just as well, so far as getting any contributions from them for political purposes. They do not give us any. Nor do we wish to be "stooges" swallowing legislation which is unsound and will ruin our country. What is the point of all this?

This is the point. While the McClellan committee and its staff are doing a remarkably fine and exhaustive job, there are two things to keep in mind. They have not reached the point where they will really go into the Reuther camp. In addition to this horrible picture which they are putting on the record by their hearings, I suggest that they bring down a few of those people who have been ruined by the racketeering of the unions—say a father, the owner of the business, a mother and her kids in rags, because he has been put out of business, the kids being hungry, without a proper and comfortable home all because of union activities. The picture must be made dramatic because otherwise, no one pays any attention any more to extortion or abusive conduct. People are familiar with that picture. They have hardened their hearts and refuse to see or act. If the press and TV, the editors and a few of the columnists would show the picture as disclosed by the committee, and its effect upon all of us, some action might result. I do not usually pay any attention to what happens to my good friend from Virginia, Mr. HARDY, and he does not pay any attention to what happens to me. Neither is interested unless it is something unusual. But when something happens to either one of us we get on the ball, do we not? Our people have become accustomed to violence on the picket line, to extortion—we ignore the facts—it affects us all—think only the fellow is hit. My hope is the McClellan committee will make each of us realize that under present policies none will go unscathed.

That is the point and the only point I am trying to make.

INFLATION AND PUBLIC POLICY

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BONNER). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CURTIS] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, incidentally, I might say to the gentleman from Michigan, that that was the only contribution I received from the labor leaders in my district—this valentine.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That came in after the election, did it not?

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. That is true.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Then you cannot call it a contribution.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I might say, Mr. Speaker, I thought it was very humorous and I enjoyed it.

Mr. Speaker, last September the Joint Economic Committee of Congress sent a questionnaire to 1,500 economists in 150 colleges and universities on the subject of inflation and public policy. The replies have now been published by the Joint Economic Committee with a press release by the gentleman from Texas, Mr. PATMAN, who was chairman of the Joint Economic Committee when the survey was taken. I do not mean that the press release was published by the Joint Economic Committee.

I have notified Congressman PATMAN's office that I was going to take the floor because I wanted to discuss to some degree his press release. Before discussing it I want to say that I have been endeavoring for many years, with some degree of success but largely lacking in success, to bring onto the floor of the House public debate where it should be. This business of issuing press releases that are not subject to the rebuttal of those who may disagree with them is no way, in my judgment, of moving forward the public's business. I believe that if Congressmen want to comment on things of a public nature, they should take the well of the House or the Senate and subject themselves to rebuttal.

In view of the characteristic bias of many of our good academic economists in favor of maximum employment at any cost, it is really remarkable that this survey turned up as conservative an overall response as it did. In fact, it was quite conservative.

I point out what I think are the salient findings.

First. Sixty percent of the economists said they thought it feasible to have high employment and price stability over short periods; 73 percent said this was feasible in the long run.

Second. Exactly 36 percent said they would accept an unemployment ratio—and this was a surprising thing—an unemployment ratio between 5 and 7 percent as a "condition for achieving a high degree of price stability." Thirty percent would insist on a lower ratio; the remainder would allow the ratio to go even above 7 percent.

Third. Seventy-five percent said they thought tight money had helped dampen inflation in 1955–1957 and 70 percent—contrary to Congressman PATMAN's viewpoint—said they did not think tight money had contributed to rising prices.

Fourth. Despite a very inept wording of the question, 50 percent of the economists said they thought that wage increases in excess of productivity improvement had contributed significantly to rising prices in recent years.

Fifth. Fifty percent or better said they thought Federal Reserve policy had been used appropriately in the recent recession.

I want to call attention to a very serious mistake in the press release of the gentleman from Texas. He says that two-thirds of the economists believe that our banking facilities have important inadequacies. Actually, only about 25 percent took this viewpoint.

I shall not attempt to explain why the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] made the statement that he did in his press release, but in fairness I think his full press release on this subject should be put in the RECORD.

The gentleman from Texas pointed out that:

> The bankers of the country might well find cause for some thoughtful self-examination in the fact that nearly two-thirds of these economists, all trained as objective observers of economic institutions and practices, indicated that they felt there were important inadequacies in the banking facilities of the country, growing out of the tendency of bankers to content themselves with holding riskless assets in the form of Government and Government-guaranteed bonds and loans at ever higher interest rates rather than to function as vigorous and enterprising suppliers of funds to business by meeting local banking needs.

It is possible that the gentleman from Texas simply made an error, because he took part (b) of this question, which appears on page 8 of the committee report, where it said:

> If your answer is yes, that there are important inadequacies of banking facilities, what is the cause?

And several causes are listed. Of those who did answer "Yes," 61.6 percent did say there was a tendency of bankers to hold riskless assets, Government and Government-guaranteed bonds and loans, rather than to function as enterprises meeting local banking needs.

The rest of the comments in the press release of the gentleman from Texas are not on the question, but as to the 61 percent; this was only 61 percent of the 20 percent who said that there were important inadequacies of banking facilities. So far, from two-thirds of these trained, objective observers of economic institutions and practices, as the gentleman from Texas calls them, saying this, it is less than two-thirds of about one-fifth, or two-fifteenths, which is a very small group.

As a matter of fact, in answer to the basic question whether important inadequacies of banking facilities existed, with respect to three items on the national level:

First. Business needs—the answer was yes; 20.25 percent thought there were inadequacies, but 57 percent thought there were not.

Second. Were there inadequacies in the broad public interest?—26 percent thought there were, but 50 percent said no. On assuring adequate competition, 26 percent thought there were inadequacies, but 48.6 percent thought there were none. So just the reverse was true as a result of this question as sent out—just the reverse of what the gentleman from Texas said in his press release.

Further, in his press release he makes this statement:

> It should, moreover, prove of interest to the Congress in evaluating the recent proposals of the President for amendment of the Employment Act of 1946 to know that more than half of the economists responding would give greater emphasis to maximum employment than to price stability as an objective, if the two objectives were not wholly compatible. Only 18.4 percent would give greater emphasis to price stability.

This is an unfair comment on the President's suggestion for amendment to the Employment Act. The President had suggested merely that the Employment Act be amended to include price stability as one of the goals in our employment procedures and practices.

I, personally, I might say, do not agree with the President in this area simply because I think the Employment Act implies that price stability, of course, is one of the goals. But in light of the confusion that certain people, including Congressman PATMAN, in this press release—the confusion that some people are trying to create in the minds of the people about the need and the value of price stability, perhaps, it might be better if it was expressed explicitly in the act. The real point I am making is that the majority, and the overwhelming majority, of the economists who answered that question thought that we could maintain maximum employment and maintain stability and a general price level at the same time. I think it was 73 percent of them, felt that that could be done. Those economists, I daresay, are agreeing thereby that price stability is a very basic objective in the Employment Act. Whether it should be a stated objective in the act is to a large degree a matter of semantics. Certainly, though, Congressman PATMAN's press release stressing the relative importance of maximum employment in respect to price stability in the opinion of the economic experts is beside one point of the President's recommended change to add price stability as one of the objectives of the Employment Act.

In closing I would like to observe that I question one value of questionnaires such as the one sent out by the Joint Economic Committee. I think it is a technique the Joint Economic Committee should not have used in this instance, and I trust it will not be used again. What are economic facts cannot be determined by selecting a group of experts, however expert, and obtaining their majority vote by letter ballot. What is true is not changed one jot or tittle by the proclamations of thunderous majorities. If this were not so the sea Xerxes whipped would have whimpered and the tide Canute told to stop, done so.

FEDERAL AID TO EDUCATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BONNER). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. Speaker, last Monday, February 9, I introduced two bills, H.R. 4267 and H.R. 4268, designed to carry out the administration's program to strengthen American education. As ranking minority member of the General Education Subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor, I am particularly hopeful that immediate consideration can be given to H.R. 4268. This bill should assist many needy school districts throughout the country to build new classrooms—possibly as much as $3 billion worth in the next 5 years.

No matter how one feels on this matter of Federal aid, it is hard to deny that there is a persistent, widespread, substantial, and serious shortage of classrooms. In every State, there are school districts which cannot meet their classroom needs solely from their own resources. The handicaps which millions of children endure because of overcrowded and inadequate facilities is a serious national problem.

President Eisenhower has suggested in the past that Federal action to alleviate this situation will be necessary. His recommendations formed the basis for legislation which was considered in the House both in 1956 and 1957, but which unfortunately was defeated on both occasions. The current recommendations represent another effort to suggest a reasonable role for the Federal Government in the solution of this shortage of classrooms.

At this point I should like to summarize the main elements of H.R. 4268.

GENERAL

The bill would authorize a 5-year program of assistance to needy school districts in meeting the debt service, that is, annual installments of principal and interest, on bonds or other obligations issued to finance construction of urgently needed elementary or secondary public school facilities. This assistance would be in the form of Federal advances to pay one-half the annual debt service on such bonds, with the State advancing the other half.

PROHIBITION AGAINST FEDERAL CONTROL

Federal interference, in the administration of the bill, with the personnel, curriculum, or program of any school would be prohibited.

ALLOCATIONS

The bill provides for allocating amounts each year among the States to serve as maximums on the school construction bonds on which the Federal Government would undertake to make advances. This maximum for a State would apply for the year for which the allocation was made, but any part of it not used in that year would be available for the same purpose for the next year—along with the new allocation for that year.

The total available for allocation among the States for this purpose for any year would be the amount, not exceeding $600 million, specified in appropriation or other law for such year.

The allocations to the States would be made on the basis of three factors—the relative State income per child of school age, the relative number of public school children, and the relative State effort for school purposes. Subject to adjustment on account of the State's school effort index, each State's allocation for the year would be equal to an amount bearing the same ratio to the total available for allocation for that year as the product of, first, the number of children in average daily attendance in public elementary or secondary schools in the State multiplied by, second, the State's allocation ratio, bears to the sum of the corresponding products for all the States.

A State's allocation ratio would depend on the income per child of school age for the State as compared with the income per child of school age for the United States, with the ratio for the State at the national average being 0.50 and the ratios for the other States varying inversely with their relative incomes per child of school age between a minimum of 0.25 and a maximum of 0.75.

The income per child of school age for any State would be the total personal income for the State divided by the number of school-age children in the State. The income per child of school age for the continental United States would be similarly computed.

The allocation ratios are to be promulgated as soon as possible after enactment of the bill and again in the third calendar quarter of 1961. They will be based on data averaged for the three most recent consecutive years for which satisfactory data are available from the Department of Commerce. The first promulgation will be conclusive for the period from July 1, 1959 through June 30, 1962, and the second for the period from July 1, 1962, through June 30, 1964.

Special provisions are provided for Alaska prior to the time satisfactory per capita income data are available for it. Before such data are available for a full year, Alaska's allocation ratio will be 0.75.

STATE SCHOOL EFFORT INDEX

Allocations determined as provided above would be reduced by the percentage, if any, that the State's school effort index was less than the national index; and the total of the reductions would be added to the allocations of the States not so reduced, in proportion to their original allocations for the year, determined as provided above.

A State's school effort index would be determined on the basis of the ratio of school expenditures per child in average daily attendance in public elementary or secondary schools to the State's income per child of school age. The national index would be based on these figures for the continental United States—which excludes the District of Columbia and, for a temporary period, Alaska.

The State and national indexes would be deemed equal for Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and Guam and for any State whose expenditures per child in average daily attendance in public elementary or secondary schools were not less than those for the continental United States. This assumed equality would also apply temporarily in the case of Alaska.

The school expenditures referred to above would include expenditures by States and subdivisions thereof for elementary or secondary education made from funds derived from State or local sources. These would be determined by the Commissioner of Education for the most recent school year for which satisfactory data from the States are available to him. The number of children in average daily attendance would be similarly determined.

The income per child of school age for the States and the continental United States—mentioned above—would be determined on the basis of data for the most recent year for which satisfactory data are available from the Department of Commerce.

STATE PLANS

Before the Commissioner could undertake to make Federal debt service advances on bonds or other obligations issued to finance the construction of schools in any State, the State would have to submit and have approved a State plan which provides for administration by the State educational agency.

The State plan would provide for limiting the Federal—and State—advances to local educational agencies which undertake to exert a reasonable tax effort—determined under the plan—in financing their school-construction needs, and which would be unable, if they exerted this reasonable tax effort and fully utilized resources from all sources to pay the debt service on bonds issued to finance the buildings they need. Federal and State advances must also be limited to bonds issued to finance the construction of urgently needed schools; that is, schools needed to relieve or prevent overcrowding, double shifts, or unhealthful or hazardous conditions.

The plan would set forth standards and procedures for determining a reasonable tax effort for each applicant local educational agency. The standards and procedures would assure that the tax effort so determined will be a reasonable one in the light of the taxable resources of the local educational agencies, the local and State shares in financing school construction, and the tax effort and methods of financing used by local educational agencies in the State. An approvable plan would also set forth priority standards and procedures which assure that the highest priority will be accorded to local educational agencies which are least able to finance the full cost of urgently needed school facilities, and that the order of priority will in other respects be based on relative need for financial aid in construction of such facilities and relative urgency of need for such facilities.

Finally, approvable State plans would provide for establishment of State standards for planning and construction of school facilities, for affording an opportunity for a hearing to unsuccessful project applicants, and for the making of the reports to the Commissioner of Education which he needs to administer the act.

DEBT SERVICE COMMITMENTS

For each local educational agency whose application is approved, the Commissioner would make a Federal debt service commitment obligating the Federal Government to make advances for payment of one-half of the annual debt service on the obligations covered. These obligations could be to finance all or a portion of the construction of a school facilities project. The latest maturity of obligations, in any issue thereof, would have to occur in 20 to 30 years, with the first payment of principal due before the end of the third year after issuance.

Applications of local educational agencies would be submitted by the State educational agency to the Commissioner with a request for a Federal debt service commitment. The State would certify that, first, the local educational agency is eligible for the commitment and the construction project is entitled to priority over other projects in the State under the standard priority standards and procedures in the State plan; second, the project is consistent with applicable State redistricting plans or policies and is in accord with applicable State construction laws and standards; and, third, the financing of any portion of the cost of the project which is not to be financed from obligations covered by the commitment, has been arranged.

The State educational agency would also have to accompany its request for the commitment with satisfactory assurance that the local educational agency will take appropriate steps to secure the most favorable rate of interest and other terms for the obligations to be issued to finance the construction of the project, and that the local educational agency will, during the life of the obligations and for 10 years thereafter, exert the tax effort determined to be reasonable under the State plan and apply any surplus of revenues thereby produced to payment of the debt service on the obligations until they are retired.

After the obligations are retired, one-half the surplus produced during the next 10 years would have to be applied to repayment of the advances made under the Federal debt service commitment, plus interest from the date of retirement of these obligations, the interest rate to be based on the rate for Federal obligations having maturities comparable to the 10-year repayment period; if one-half the surplus produced during this period does not suffice to repay the Federal advances plus interest, repayment would be forgiven. The other one-half of the surplus would be used to repay the State debt service advances or would be retained by the local educational agency in case the State did not require repayment.

The amount of the surplus produced by the local educational agency's reasonable tax effort would be the amount which remained after applying the proceeds of this effort—and any other resources available to the agency for paying school construction debts—to payment of financing charges on school construction debts incurred prior to the request for Federal assistance, and on debts for school facilities projects incurred after the request but approved by the State educational agency as being needed to prevent or relieve overcrowding, double shifts, or unhealthful or hazardous conditions.

STATE MATCHING REQUIREMENTS

No Federal debt service commitment could be made under the bill to advance half the debt service on any obligations unless the State made an equal commitment to advance the other half. However, instead of so committing itself, the State could make a capital grant covering a portion of the cost of the construction project; in such case the Federal debt service commitment would be to pay the full annual debt service on so much of the obligations issued to finance the rest of such cost as did not exceed the amount of the capital grant by the State. The Federal Government and the State would share equally in the annual debt service payments on any remaining obligations.

The State educational agency could make its commitment to advance one-half the debt service on obligations of a local educational agency without requiring any repayment by the latter. Or it could require that all or any part of its advances of debt service to be repaid—with or without interest—after the obligations have been retired, from the surplus proceeds produced by exercise of a reasonable tax effort and the use of other resources available for school construction financing purposes. During the first 10 years after retirement of the obligations, of course, this repayment would be made through sharing with the Federal Government in the surplus proceeds of the local educational agency. Thereafter the full surplus could be applied to repayment of the State advances.

PAYMENT OF FEDERAL ADVANCES

Advances by the Commissioner of Education on the Federal Government's one-half of the annual debt service on obligations covered by any Federal debt service commitment would be made by the Commissioner from time to time, in advance or otherwise, to the agency, person, or persons designated in the State educational agency's request for the Federal debt service commitment. As previously indicated, advances in any year would be reduced to the extent of any surplus revenues produced through exercise of the required reasonable tax effort and applied toward such debt service.

STATES EXCLUSIVELY RESPONSIBLE FOR SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION FINANCING

In some States or Territories a State agency may have exclusive responsibility for financing the construction of school facilities. In others, a State agency may have exclusive responsibility for financing such construction for particular areas, such as unorganized territory. The Commissioner would be authorized to modify or make inapplicable to such State, or area of a State, any provisions of the bill which he determined to be inappropriate by reason of the absence of a local educational agency or agencies responsible for school construction financing, to the extent he deemed such action necessary in order to achieve the purposes of the bill.

FAILURE TO EXERT REASONABLE TAX EFFORT

If any local educational agency with respect to whose obligations a Federal debt service commitment has been made fails, in any period during the life of the obligations and the 10 years thereafter, to exert the reasonable tax effort required pursuant to the State plan, it would be obligated to repay to the United States the additional amount it would have paid toward the annual debt service—or toward repayment of the Federal advances, plus interest—for the period involved had it exerted the required reasonable tax effort.

ABANDONMENT OF FACILITIES

The Federal advances—or such lesser amount as may be determined to be reasonable by agreement or Federal district court suit—would have to be repaid to the United States if the construction of facilities financed by obligations with respect to which the Federal advances were paid is abandoned or not completed within a reasonable time.

LABOR STANDARDS

The Commissioner would not be able to make a Federal debt service commitment for financing the construction of school facilities except upon assurance that labor standards, relating to payment of prevailing wages and overtime pay for work in excess of 40 hours per week, or 8 hours per day, would be observed in such construction.

ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

The Commissioner would be authorized to agree to modifications of Federal debt service commitments and of the obligations with respect to which commitments have been made. He would also be authorized to waive or compromise claims. His financial transactions under the bill, while subject to audit by the General Accounting Office, would be conclusive on all other Government officials.

COURT ACTION

Suits would be authorized in the district courts of the United States by any person holding bonds covered by a Federal debt service commitment, to enforce any undertaking of the Commissioner under the commitment.

DEFINITIONS

A number of terms used in the bill are defined. These terms are Commissioner, State, State educational agency, local educational agency, debt service, annual debt service, school facilities, obligations, and construct, constructing, and construction.

WITHHOLDING OF FUNDS AND JUDICIAL REVIEW

Notice and hearing to the State educational agency would be required before Federal debt service commitments to the State could be suspended for failure to comply with the required provisions of approved State plans. A State agency dissatisfied with such suspension could obtain judicial review thereof in the Federal circuit court of appeals.

MISCELLANEOUS

Utilization of other Federal agencies in administration of the bill would also be authorized, as would be delegation of the Commissioner of Education's functions under the bill to personnel of the Office of Education.

CONSUMER INTERESTS AND STABLE PRICE LEVEL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ZABLOCKI] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced three legislative proposals intended to protect the interests of the consumers, and to promote reasonable stability of the price level in our economy. These objectives are vitally important to each and every one of us—and specifically to the average taxpayer. For that reason, I hope that this legislation will receive early and favorable consideration from the 86th Congress.

My concern for the problems of the consumer is not new. As early as 1953, I introduced my first resolution proposing the establishment of a joint congressional fact-finding committee to protect the consumers' interests. I believe that the objectives of that resolution are sound, and that its enactment is as badly needed today as it was when I first introduced it 5 years ago.

For that reason, I am reintroducing that particular resolution today. In addition, I introduced two other proposals which go with it hand-in-hand. One of them would direct the Federal Trade Commission to undertake an immediate study of the consumer dollar, to see what that dollar goes for, and how its purchasing power can be safeguarded. The second proposal would amend the Employment Act of 1946 to include reasonable stability of the level of consumer prices among the objectives which should be pursued by the Federal Government.

I would like to comment briefly on each of the three proposals which, taken together, constitute a package approach to the solution to the grave problems which are being met daily by the average consumer.

COMMITTEE ON CONSUMER INTERESTS

During my service in the Wisconsin State Senate, and in the Congress of the United States, I have noted repeatedly that the consumers, as a whole, have very little organized representation to counterbalance the power of producers' lobbies.

In passing laws affecting commerce, agriculture, labor, and industry, our legislators carefully consider the expected effect of such laws on the various producer groups. The interests of the consumers, who come at the end of the producer, processor, distributor, consumer chain, are treated as secondary and subordinate to producer interests.

Broadly speaking, each of us is a consumer—the buyer of goods and services. Yet when people approach Congress to make their views known on certain bills, they invariably do this as members of a given producer, processor, or distributor group. The people who appear before congressional committees to testify for or against given legislation, in a great majority of cases represent such groups as the automobile manufacturers, the meatpackers, the bread bakers, and so on. Only very seldom is the voice of the great consuming public—of the people who buy those goods—ever heard.

This is not right. Virtually all congressional decisions and Government policies ultimately affect the consumer. Consequently, careful and thorough consideration should always be given to the potential effect of all legislative bills and Government policies on the average consumer.

The special congressional Committee on Consumer Interests which I have proposed would help to assure that this objective will be fulfilled. The job of this committee would be to investigate the impact of proposed legislation on the consumers—and to furnish their findings to other congressional committees and to the public. In that way, we will make certain that the interests of the consumers are never overlooked, or made subservient to the interests of various producer groups.

The first resolution which I have introduced today provides for the establishment of such a congressional committee. As I mentioned earlier, this proposal has been before the Congress for a number of years. I sincerely hope that action will be taken on it this year.

STUDY OF THE CONSUMER DOLLAR

My second proposal calls for an immediate and thorough study, by the Federal Trade Commission, of the consumer dollar.

This study would have the following objectives:

First. To determine what portion of consumer expenditures in the United States may be attributed to each of the following: Labor costs, material costs, costs of distribution, advertising costs, profits, and other factors;

Second. To determine what portion of consumer expenditures in the United States for food and other farm products is realized by the farmer, by the processor, by the distributor, and by other persons;

Third. To determine the relationship between prices, profits, and wages;

Fourth. To determine the factors primarily responsible for inflation and deflation in the economy of the United States; and Fifth. To determine if any measures are necessary to safeguard the position of the consumer in the economy of the United States.

We need this information to know where the consumer dollar really goes—and how we can safeguard its purchasing power.

Some persons may point to the activities of various Government agencies presently engaged in the work of gathering and compiling statistical information, and question the need for the study which I have proposed. I would, therefore, like to elaborate on the need for this particular undertaking.

It is true that several Government agencies, including the Federal Trade Commission, presently gather and publish statistics on prices, profits, wages, and so on, in our economy. The wage-and-hour data gathered by the Bureau of Labor Statistics is a case in point. I could cite other statistical series, such as the Federal Reserve Board's index of industrial production, Labor Department's consumer and wholesale prices indexes, Commerce Department's income statistics, the Agriculture Department's figures on farm income and production, and many others.

The fact remains that each one of these series is compiled with a specific, limited purpose in mind. The Consumer Price Index, for instance, measures the average change in prices of a predetermined "basket" of goods and services purchased by urban wage-earner and clerical-worker families within certain income brackets. It is not a general cost-of-living index. It tells us only about the average change in prices of certain types of goods and services, purchased by certain types of families, in specifically designated areas. It is a valuable source of information—but of information which has specific and limited application.

What I have said is not intended to reflect in any way either on the Consumer Price Index, or on any other statistical series compiled by our governmental agencies. I am merely trying to show that these series, taken individually, do not answer the questions which I have raised—the questions about the relationship between prices, wages, and profits; about the causes of inflation; and about a detailed breakdown of the consumer dollar, and it is precisely these questions that must be answered if we are to adopt programs and policies aimed at protecting the interests of the consumers.

So what we need at this point is not a new, lengthy project involving the gathering of information all over the country. What we need, instead, is a thorough, impartial, and expert review and analysis of the many individual statistical series presently available, to see whether we can arrive at some conclusions about the issues that I have mentioned.

I believe that the Federal Trade Commission is the logical agency to fulfill this task. The Commission already has a large store of information relating to these issues, and it has an expert staff well versed in this type of work. For that reason, my resolution proposes that the study be conducted by the Federal Trade Commission, with such aid and assistance from other appropriate Government agencies as may be needed and necessary.

BENEFITS OF THIS INVESTIGATION

The information obtained through such a study would be of great help to individuals, to groups, and to governmental bodies throughout our Nation.

It would be helpful to businessmen and investors. The individual businessman could compare his costs with those of the industry, and thus get some idea as to his relative efficiency. Similarly, investors and financial institutions would be provided with a standard against which they could compare the efficiency of business concerns seeking financial assistance.

The consumer would know who is getting his dollar. When he pays a price at the store, he would know how much of that price goes to the retailer. How much to the wholesaler. How much for transportation. How much for materials, labor, overhead, and so on, in the production of the item.

Our Government, too, must have adequate facts if it is to deal intelligently and responsibly with the major interest groups in our country. I believe that the study which I have proposed would aid our Government in fulfilling its responsibilities to our people.

AMENDING THE EMPLOYMENT ACT OF 1946

My third proposal calls for an amendment to the Employment Act of 1946. It would amend the act by including "reasonable stability of the level of consumer prices" among the objectives which should be pursued by the Federal Government.

I believe that the implications and the importance of this proposal are self-evident. Creeping inflation can blight the lives of millions of our people, and seriously damage the strength of our entire economy. Inflation robs people of their savings, cuts into the purchasing power of the dollar, and generates never-ending price increases. It hits hardest those who can least afford to stand its damaging effects: the widows, the older folks, the workers earning low wages, and those with limited, fixed incomes or salaries.

Surely, if the Federal Government has any concern for the interests of the average taxpayer and consumer, it cannot remain indifferent to the hardships wrought by creeping inflation. The Federal Government should, and must, lead in the battle against inflation.

The amendment to the Employment Act of 1946 which I have proposed will not of itself lick inflation. It will, however, place our Federal Government squarely on record in acknowledging its responsibility to promote reasonable stability of the level of consumer prices. This in itself is very important, and it should aid in safeguarding the interests of the consumers and in furthering a balanced growth of our economy.

CONCLUSION

Mr. Speaker, I have briefly outlined the three proposals included in my package approach to the problem of protecting the interests of the consumers.

I sincerely hope that they will receive early and thorough consideration from the 86th Congress.

THE DAVIS-BACON PREVAILING WAGE ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FOGARTY] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, I have today reintroduced my bill to modernize the Davis-Bacon Prevailing Wage Act. This bill has four major objectives. They are:

First. To broaden the coverage of the present act by adding to the present coverage (a) all nonfarm construction in excess of $25,000 in value, at least one-third of which is financed by Federal funds, loans, payments, grants, or contributions; and (b) all federally insured or guaranteed loans for the purpose of financing any nonfarm construction program other than housing developments of less than 10 units.

Second. The term "prevailing wage" would be modernized by requiring the Secretary of Labor to predetermine and Government contractors would be required to pay not only the prevailing hourly rate as presently covered in the Davis-Bacon Act but also prevailing employer payments to (a) health and welfare funds, (b) retirement funds, (c) vacation funds, and (d) apprenticeship funds.

Third. Hours of work and overtime are put on a prevailing basis. Under this particular provision of the amendments, the Secretary of Labor would be required to predetermine and Government contractors would be required to pay the prevailing overtime rate for each construction craft on a daily and weekly basis including prevailing practices on Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays. In addition, as a minimum requirement, contractors would be required to pay not less than time and one-half for hours worked over 8 per day, over 40 hours per week, over 5 consecutive days and on Saturdays, Sundays, and the holidays.

Fourth. Enforcement centralized and Construction Appeals Board created. Under this particular amendment, the Secretary of Labor would have (a) authority to make uniform enforcement procedures for all Federal Government contracting agencies; (b) direct power—including the use of subpena—to investigate violations; and (c) authority to apply violation penalities, including authority to blacklist.

In addition my bill provides for the creation of a Construction Appeals Board appointed by the President consisting of one representative from the public, one from contractors, and one from labor. This three-man independent board would be required to speedily review and issue final decisions on, first, the Secretary's wage predeterminations; and second, the Secretary's findings of violations.

These four major amendments are necessary so that Federal money will not be used to destroy prevailing wages, hours of work and working conditions and to eliminate the present bidding advantage of certain contractors who are not in collective bargaining agreements with unions in those areas where the union conditions are in fact the prevailing practices.

LET US MAKE THE SMALL BUSINESS INVESTMENT ACT OF 1958 A REAL INCENTIVE

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to provide further incentive for assistance to small business concerns by small business investment companies operating under the Small Business Investment Act of 1958.

This measure is similar to that introduced in the other body by the Honorable JOHN SPARKMAN. The amendments offered are needed and excellent improvements in order to clarify the intent and purpose of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958.

Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, the amendments to the 1954 Internal Revenue Code are:

First. To permit new companies to receive the same treatment as banks and certain finance companies in the matter of the personal holding company surtax. Presently, investment companies organized under the 1958 act—the purpose of which is to encourage the investment of risk capital—obviously appeal to high-bracket income taxpayers. However, this type of investor is wary of any arrangement that could subject him to the personal holding company surtax.

Second. To encourage small business investment companies to make long-term loans to new business by means of allowing a tax deduction in an amount equal to 15 percent of the interest received on such long-term loans made pursuant to section 305 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958. This would encourage loans to new business rather than continuing the current and understandable bias in favor of primarily loaning money to presently well-established corporations. With SBA holding small business investment companies to legal interest rates on straight loans, what inducement is there for a small business investment company to make a long-term loan to a company which presumably is more risky than normal?

Third. To remove the possible imposition of the accumulated earnings tax under section 531 of the 1954 Internal Revenue Code. This tax should not—in my considered judgment—apply to small business investment companies so long as 90 percent of their accumulated earnings and profits are reinvested in long-term loans or equity investments. Potential investors obviously want to know if these companies will be subject to said tax. The Internal Revenue Service has been reluctant to commit itself in this matter. Hence the need for this amendment to clarify the issue.

I also wish to call to the attention of my colleagues that Chairman WRIGHT PATMAN of the Select Committee on Small Business plans other and fuller revisions of the 1958 act which will be of great importance to small business.

The problems and status of small business remain a critical and pressing problem. Therefore it is my hope and belief that all measures which will make the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 more workable, practical, and of real benefit to the small business community will receive early consideration.

RELIEF FOR THE FEDERAL HIGHWAY PROGRAM

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill providing that all of the excise tax on automobiles, trucks, buses, trailers, parts, and accessories shall be deposited in the highway trust fund to counter agitation for increase in the Federal gasoline tax from 3 cents per gallon to 4½ cents per gallon to keep the Federal highway program on a pay-as-you-go basis. My bill would provide for a transfer of approximately $1½ billion yearly into the rapidly diminishing highway trust fund and would discourage the Federal Government from further encroaching on a tax area which has already been preempted from the States.

Presently one-half of the 10 percent Federal excise tax on trucks, buses, and trailers is deposited in the highway trust fund, but I see no reason why the entire amount should not be treated the same way to meet the future demands of the building program. I am not unaware, Mr. Speaker, of those who have introduced legislation that would reduce, or eliminate altogether, the 10-percent excise tax; but since so little thought has been given by the Congress to a reduction or elimination of it altogether, it would seem appropriate to me that this revenue raised from the automobile user be put to use that would inure to his direct benefit. Upon completion of the highway construction program, we should definitely do away altogether with these burdensome excise taxes.

As we all know, the Federal highway program was originally scheduled to be a 13-year program to build some 40,000 miles of interstate highways. The program should go ahead at full speed, but we all know costs have increased considerably since the program was initiated. The original estimated cost of $27.6 billion has already risen to a figure in excess of $40 billion, and I still believe it should continue to be paid for out of current revenue. Transfer of the balance of these excise taxes to the trust fund would keep the program on a pay-as-you-go basis.

In the current fiscal year 1959 revenues from the 3-cent Federal gasoline tax are expected to be $2.2 billion. In the next fiscal year 1960 it is estimated to be $2.3 billion, but it should be borne in mind that in 1960 the Federal portion of the highway construction program will cost $3.1 billion. By fiscal year 1962 this should increase to $3.6 billion. If we add the additional $1.5 billion in automobile excise taxes to the trust fund each year, total revenues will come to something like $3.8 billion and give us a cushion for any future increases in costs.

Mr. Speaker, I am aware that, if enacted, my bill would simply cause moneys now flowing into the general fund to be earmarked for the highway trust fund. True, it would cause a temporary imbalance of the Federal budget, but it would move all of us to strive to further reduce spending in those areas where moneys are drawn from the general fund. It would serve to point up to the people something which all of us here in the Congress are aware of but the majority say so little about when talking with our people—that you cannot get one solitary thing from the Federal Government without paying for it. I have, personally, taken the consistent position that those who want something from the Government must pay for it, and it makes no difference to me whether one wants better postal service or an increase in social security benefits, the direct beneficiary should still foot the bill. By the same token, I do not believe the automobile owner and user should be unduly taxed in amounts exceeding that for which he receives a direct benefit from the Government. Automobiles, trucks, and buses are not luxury items in these United States of America. Gasoline certainly cannot be considered a luxury, but continues to be taxed as such, beyond the level of such items as jewelry, furs, and liquors.

Together, Federal and State taxes presently average about 9 cents per gallon which is an increase of a little more than 6 cents over the past 10 years. By 1960, the average could be close to 11 cents per gallon. Putting it in another way, Mr. Speaker, if the proposed 1½-cent increase were enacted, it would mean, in effect, a combined Federal and State sales tax on an average of almost 60 percent of this product. Currently, the average of combined taxes is equal to 80 percent of the refinery price, 54 percent of the wholesale price, and 41 percent of the retail price.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe America's motoring public is going to stand by and support a further tax increase on the gasoline they consume, knowing that there is currently $1½ billion a year extracted from him by way of excise taxes which could and should be used to provide him with a modern, safe, interstate highway system. We can certainly do the motoring public a good turn by simply revising certain statutory programs to adapt them to present day and future conditions, and this is one important step that ought to be taken.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Hon. R. Walter Riehlman

OF
HON. WILLIAM M. McCULLOCH
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 11, 1959

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, we learn with a great deal of regret that our distinguished colleague, the Honorable R. WALTER RIEHLMAN, of New York, has reluctantly decided to relinquish his membership on the House Select Committee on Small Business.

Mr. RIEHLMAN'S recent appointment to the very important new Committee on Science and Astronautics and his continuing membership as the second ranking Republican member on the Committee on Government Operations and ranking Republican member of the Subcommittee on Military Operations of the Committee on Government Operations, makes it virtually impossible for him to give the required time and attention to the duties involved in the Small Business Committee.

As I have said, we as Members of the House on both sides of the aisle regret to learn of Mr. RIEHLMAN'S decision, but we bow to the inevitable since we realize the vast amount of time which would be required in his new committee assignment on the Committee on Science and Astronautics. Our colleague's interest in national defense has long been well and favorably known and the kindred duties in connection with the national defense on the two committees which he retains are of the utmost importance.

Mr. RIEHLMAN has said that his interest in small business and small business problems will not be diminished and I know we will call on him for the advice and counsel which he is so capable of giving after 12 years of outstanding service on the House Select Committee on Small Business.

At this point I would like to include Mr. RIEHLMAN'S announcement in which he sets forth the several reasons for giving up a committee service in which he has always shown selfless and dedicated service.

Mr. RIEHLMAN'S statement follows:

RIEHLMAN ANNOUNCES TERMINATION OF SERVICE ON SMALL BUSINESS COMMITTEE

WASHINGTON, February 11, 1959.—Congressman R. WALTER RIEHLMAN announced today that he has reluctantly decided not to accept appointment to the House Select Committee on Small Business for the 86th Congress. RIEHLMAN has served on the committee for 12 years and, due to the retirement of Representative William Hill, of Colorado, would have been the ranking Republican member. RIEHLMAN stated, "It is with a great deal of personal regret that I turn down reappointment to the Small Business Committee of the House of Representatives. During my 12 years' service on the committee many accomplishments have been achieved in the interest of small business.

"I have had a vital interest in the affairs of the small businessman for many years," RIEHLMAN continued, "and I do not intend to let that interest lie dormant as a result of this decision. I shall continue my efforts in behalf of small business and I shall continue to cooperate with every proper movement in the interest of our small business economy."

In emphasizing his recent appointment to the Committee on Science and Astronautics, REIHLMAN said, "this committee will undoubtedly become one of the most important in the House of Representatives, not only because of the tremendous responsibility it will have in keeping America in the foreground of scientific research and astronautical development, but also because of its close relationship with the development and maintenance of our national defense. Committee activities will encompass relatively new fields and hearings will be quite extensive."

RIEHLMAN pointed out that the Science and Astronautics assignment, in addition to those as second-ranking Republican on the Government Operations Committee and ranking Republican on the Military Operations Subcommittee, would require a great deal of time and effort.

"I am convinced," he continued, "that there would not be enough hours in the day to do an efficient and effective job on all three committees. It was a question of time and I came to the conclusion that I had to give up something. In the final analysis, I decided to concentrate my efforts in the fields of space development and national defense.

"The small businessman in America is faced today with countless difficulties. A great responsibility lies with Small Business Committee members in this 86th Congress and I hope, for the sake of the small business community, that it will be fulfilled with sincerity and objectively.

"My membership on the committee has been both enjoyable and profitable over these past few years. I have been afforded a chance to see this important area of our economy in operation and have gained a much more extensive knowledge of its conditions and requirements as a result. I leave with reluctance and I want to emphasize the fact that I do so only as a result of my increased assignments in other areas."

Tadeusz Kosciuszko and the American Revolution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 11, 1959

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow, February 12, marks the birthday of Tadeusz Kosciuszko.

Tadeusz Kosciuszko was one of many distinguished and gifted Poles who played a signally important part in our War of Independence. Today in observing the anniversary of his birth we once more pay our respects to his memory and express our gratitude for his great services.

Kosciuszko was born into a middle-class family on February 12, 1746, 213 years ago. In his early youth he showed unusual liking for books and study, and his relatives—his father died when he was 13 years old—did everything in their power to educate him. After he finished the Royal School in Warsaw, he earned a scholarship to study in France where he entered the famous Mezieres Military School, specializing in artillery and engineering. While in Paris stories about the American Revolution fired his imagination. He decided that this was a fight on behalf of a good cause. He borrowed money from friends, sailed for America, and arrived in Philadelphia in August of 1776. There he applied for military service; immediately he was admitted and charged with the drawing up of plans for fortifying the Delaware. His success in this first assignment earned him a colonel's commission. From then on, a high place in our Revolutionary War was assured him. Everything he did was done with distinction, and in October 1783, Congress made him a brigadier general.

With the end of the fight for our cause here, he sailed to Poland, to engage there in the fight for Polish freedom.

Unfortunately all his efforts to that end were unsuccessful. He ended his gallant career in exile in Switzerland, where he died on October 15, 1817.

Today Americans of all rank and creed solemnly observe the anniversary of his birth and do homage to his memory.

Birthday of the Mountaineers

OF
HON. KEN HECHLER
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 11, 1959

Mr. HECHLER. This month my home State of West Virginia observes the 92d birthday of one of its proudest and noblest institutions, West Virginia University at Morgantown.

The university was chartered February 7, 1867, in the fourth year of our State's existence. It was born from a merger of Monongalia Academy and Woodburn Female Seminary, and was at first known as the Agricultural College of West Virginia. It assumed university status and its present name in 1868.

The university is one of the cultural and educational centers of our State. It has grown from humble beginnings to a giant institution which dominates the city of Morgantown. Its enrollment has climbed markedly to the neighborhood of 8,000 full-time students, and an additional 6,000 in its various extension services.

The university now has 17 separate divisions and is fully approved by accrediting institutions. It enjoys a reputation for academic excellence.

This month brings more than a birthday anniversary to the university. On the first day of February, the office of the president of West Virginia University was filled by Dr. Elvis Stahr. Dr. Stahr is uniquely qualified by way of education and experience to administer the affairs of our university. His arrival has been welcomed by alumni and other West Virginians as the opening of a new era in the steady growth of the university.

Dr. Stahr succeeds another admirably qualified and able man, Dr. Irvin Stewart, who is returning to the classroom at his own request. Dr. Stewart steered the university through its difficult and hectic period of explosive postwar growth, and the present quality of the University will stand as a monument to his skill, resourcefulness and determination.

The proudest new achievement of the university is a vast new medical school, now being completed. The center, which cost many millions of dollars, is one of the largest, most up-to-date and completely equipped centers in the United States. Its benefit to every West Virginian will be of lasting significance.

In a less-serious vein, it should be pointed out that the university's football and basketball squads have enjoyed great success in recent years, and have attracted much favorable publicity to our State. Both football and basketball squads have long records of being undefeated in play within the southern conference, of which the school is a member. The West Virginia gridiron forces have contributed many players to professional ranks in recent years, and the basketball teams have numbered no fewer than three men selected for All-American mention in the past decade. The 1958 basketball squad was chosen national champions by the Associated Press, and this year's squad is again given high ratings.

Every school and college within the university has produced graduates who have attained leadership and outstanding recognition in their chosen fields; this is a tribute to the high quality of instruction which the university maintains. As the university moves into another year, plans are already laid for new growth, for new advances. I believe the university merits fully the words expressed in one of the school's marching songs, "It's West Virginia, It's West Virginia, the Pride of Every Mountaineer."

ORT Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FLORENCE P. DWYER
OF NEW JERSEY
Wednesday, February 11, 1959

Mrs. DWYER. Mr. Speaker, one of the most remarkable and constructive programs in the field of human welfare is the Organization for Rehabilitation Through Training or, briefly, ORT. On March 4, 1959, members and friends of ORT will celebrate the 79 years of service to displaced and underprivileged Jews throughout the free world.

ORT Day has become a traditional observance in those hundreds of communities throughout the country where dedicated ORT members work for the rehabilitation of their fellow Jews wherever they may be in need.

Through its 400 vocational training installations in 20 countries, the ORT program offers youths and adults both the opportunity to learn the industrial skills which will make them self-supporting. Through this process of rehabilitation of individuals who would otherwise live out their lives in idleness without practical utilization of their talents and abilities, ORT also contributes to the economic development of free-world nations by training productive citizens.

ORT Day, 1959, will have special significance for the 50,000 members of the Women's American ORT, since it marks the 32d year of service by the organization to a total of several million people. On March 4, in my own city of Elizabeth, N.J., as in cities from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the 100,000 members of other American ORT federation affiliates and many thousands of friends of the ORT program will join in special celebrations.

It is a privilege, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of our colleagues to this important occasion in the history of man's humanity to man.

The South Ward Boys' Club of Newark, N.J.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE M. WALLHAUSER
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 11, 1959

Mr. WALLHAUSER. Mr. Speaker, today in this great city of Washington, we are honored to have visiting us a fine group of children from the great city of Newark, N.J.

Their visit magnifies for me the importance of the youth of America and the role many of our adults are taking to help prepare them for the future when from among their numbers will come those who will take our places as guardians of our Nation.

The children—numbering 50—here today are enjoying the sights of our Capital City because of the efforts of a civic minded and determined group of men. What these men have accomplished should be a shining beacon for all adult Americans. I would like to give a brief outline of their activities.

Led by Mr. David L. Warner, a successful Newark businessman, this group formed the South Ward Boys' Club of Newark, N.J., in January of 1956. Within a few months, the club, because of its outstanding accomplishments, gained affiliation with the Boys' Club of Newark, N.J., and the Boys' Club of America.

Joined with Mr. Warner in this very worthwhile endeavor, both in its inception and through its 4 years of activity, are many of the leading business and professional men and public officeholders of the area.

In 1957, two new and very important divisions of the South Ward Boys' Club were founded. They are the Mothers' Club and the Fathers' Club. More than 600 parents are enthusiastic and hard-working members of these divisions. They are interested in the welfare and future of their children.

The youth membership in the South Ward Boys' Club has grown steadily. From a handful in 1956 it now numbers close to 1,500. Significantly, I think it should be pointed out that membership is open to all children regardless of race, creed, or color and that the membership represents all walks of life in the highly populated south ward of Newark, N.J., which is a part of the 12th Congressional District which I have the honor to represent.

In helping prepare our youth for the future, the South Ward Boys' Club engages in many educational and recreational endeavors. Today's visit to Washington is the fourth annual trip to the Capital City sponsored by the club. Each year a different group of children make the visit. And as he did on the first three occasions, Mr. Warner again is chaperoning his flock.

Today's tour will cover visits to the White House, my office in the New House Office Building, the Capitol, the House of Representatives, the U.S. Senate, the Supreme Court, Lincoln Memorial, Arlington Memorial Cemetery, and Mount Vernon.

I know today's visitors will be awed by the things they observe, just as their predecessor visitors were awed. And, I know also, that they, like their predecessors, will leave Washington with a great respect and reverence for the Nation which is their own.

The Washington tour is only one of the major activities of the club. Since its inception, the club has provided a varied and extensive educational and recreational program for its youthful members.

This has included visits to the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, N.Y.; historic shrines in the State of New Jersey, special children's theater shows in Newark and at the New Jersey seashore; sporting events in Newark and New York City, and in particular baseball games of the world champion New York Yankees; outings to the many fine amusement and recreational parks in the New Jersey-New York area.

There also has been a wide range of participation sports for the youngsters, such as swimming, golf, baseball, basketball, track, and field. Many of the youngsters have become very proficient in the sports of their choice. In 1957, the club's basketball team won a statewide tournament.

Presently, the club is conducting a drive to build a modern headquarters where there can be a further expansion of the activities of the youthful members. I know the drive will be successful, for the men and women have the determination to bring to success any undertaking in which they participate, particularly when it affects our youth.

Through all of its activities, the club has geared itself to one aim—building character in the youth of America and to prepare them for adulthood when they can take their places as dedicated and responsible Americans. Each one of these people who have made the South Ward Boys' Club and its activities possible deserve the resounding applause of all Americans. As one who has had the opportunity of observing first hand their activities and the fruits of their efforts, I salute them.

Through my observations, I have become fully convinced that the boys' clubs have become the greatest organization for the building of character outside of the church, and in closing I would like to recite the boys' club code:

I believe in God and the right to worship according to my own faith and religion.

I believe in America and the American way of life * * * in the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

I believe in fair play, honesty, and sportsmanship.

I believe in my Boys' Club which stands for these things.

Certainly, it is a code that might well be recited time and again by all Americans.

Address by Hon. Stuart Symington, of Missouri, Mississippi Valley Association Banquet, Chase Hotel, St. Louis, Mo., February 2, 1959

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN E. WILLIS

OF LOUISIANA

Wednesday, February 11, 1959

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, on February 2, 1959, I had the privilege of listening to an address by Senator STUART SYMINGTON at the 40th annual convention of the Mississippi Valley Association in St. Louis, Mo. This distinguished American is particularly qualified to discuss water resources and water utilization problems. While Chairman of the National Security Resources Board, Senator SYMINGTON suggested to President Truman the idea of creating the Materials Policy Commission, headed by Mr. William Paley. The Commission made an excellent projected survey of the general resources requirements of this country over the next few decades. It made a stern warning of the ever-increasing need for better water management in this country, necessitated by the great growth of our population and the tremendous and growing demand of industry for fresh water. In fact, to the great surprise of those who take water resources for granted, the Commission stated that by 1975, of all our resources, the No. 1 American shortage by that time will be fresh water. In his address before the Mississippi Valley Association, Senator SYMINGTON gave graphic examples of the ever-increasing need of fresh water and the insatiable thirst of such industries as the chemical and atomic and aluminum industries for phenomenal additional quantities.

Senator SYMINGTON made an earnest plea for a national water policy, and his seven-point program in that connection deserves national attention and consideration and for that reason I, under unanimous consent, insert in the RECORD a copy of his address for useful reference and research material in connection with water resources, water management and water utilization legislation:

Thank you very much for the honor of being with you at this 40th annual convention.

I have followed the activities of the Mississippi Valley Association for many years.

Your work in developing a consistent and intelligent policy for the use of water in the vast subcontinent of this valley area is of vital importance to the entire country.

As a Senator, my particular interest has been the State of Missouri and the development of its water resources. The work you have done for this State has been outstanding.

Many thanks for the advice and cooperation you have given to me and my State over the past years, and I look forward to many more years of our working together.

No river valley has played a more important role in the history and growth of this country than has the Mississippi Valley.

Exciting images of the past are evoked by the names: Lewis and Clark, DeSoto, Marquette and Joliet.

Picturesque days are recalled by the names Mark Twain, Mike Fink, memories of the sidewheelers, and Abe Lincoln's float trip to New Orleans.

Since the days when the wilderness was conquered and the great steamboats became queens of the river, the Mississippi Valley has been settled.

Thanks to the efforts of many of you here tonight, to a large extent the rivers themselves, either have been or are being tamed.

But these rivers are not only a part of our history. They are vital to our present. The Mississippi Valley is the heartland of America, and its rivers the great arteries of commerce.

Their great past and present is to be followed by an even greater future.

For they are the most vital resources of the decades ahead.

Too many people take water resources for granted. They believe we will always have an abundance.

This is dangerous thinking, for without an adequate supply of water, our civilization and our industry will not be able to expand to meet the needs of tomorrow.

Tonight I should like to discuss briefly two recent developments which show the ever-increasing need for better water management in this country.

Both have occurred since the end of the Second World War.

One is the great growth of our population.

The other is the tremendous and growing demand of industry for fresh water.

Many people have studied the population explosion now taking place in this country and the rest of the world.

But it has been studied primarily in terms of its effect on schools, on cities, and on industrial production.

Comparatively little attention has been paid to how this population increase will strain the water supply of our country.

In 1952, the President's Materials Policy Commission, headed by Mr. William Paley, issued an excellent survey of the resource requirements of this country over the next few decades.

This study was based on what we would be most short of 25 years from 1950—16 years from now.

To my great surprise, as well as that of many others, the No. 1 American shortage in 1975 will be fresh water.

The study pointed out that between 1900 and 1950, per capita water consumption in the United States has doubled.

Because our population has also doubled in that period, the demand for water had thus actually increased four times.

The Presidential Commission predicted a similar doubling of per capita consumption over the period from 1950 to 1975, as the Nation's standard of living rose; and with it the use of such luxury items as air conditioners, automatic washers, etc.

This famous report issued a stern warning that steps should be initiated now to assure an adequate water supply for the growing population.

The warning was based on a 1975 population projection of 193,400,000.

But this 1950 estimate has turned out to be far too modest. Our country is growing so fast that, under present projections, the 193 million point will be reached, not in 1975, but in 1965.

By 1975 we will have in America a population of more than 230 million, perhaps more than 240 million.

This would create an immense water supply problem even if the per capita consumption remained constant.

But it will rise with our standard of living, and therefore become even greater.

This country, and the Mississippi Valley in particular, is blessed with a large supply of fresh water. Properly utilized, it cannot only support this huge population but give the people an ever-increasing standard of living.

The Nation as a whole, however, has certain water problems, posed by nature.

Many areas have insufficient water supplies; and because of maldistribution of both rainfall, and access to water supplies, increasing control must be exerted over our water.

Such control will involve a conscious choice on our part. If we are willing to spend the effort and the money, however, the years ahead can see better living for all citizens.

If we do not heed the warnings of such studies as the one referred to above, the consequences are equally clear.

Now as to the increasing use of water by industry.

Since the war, such industries as the chemical and atomic and aluminum industries have grown tremendously.

And they have an insatiable thirst.

The amount of water consumed by an atomic energy plant is classified. But public figures do exist on some of the other industrial plants.

Water and oil may not mix, but 10 gallons of water are required to refine 1 gallon of gasoline.

Three hundred gallons of water are needed to turn out one barrel of beer.

With the growing interest in paper and steel mills in Missouri and the Mississippi Valley, it is significant to note that 64,000 gallons of water are needed to make 1 ton of sulfate paper; also 65,000 gallons to make 1 ton of steel.

A pulp mill requires more water each day than does a city of 50,000 people.

The Fairless works of the United States Steel Corp. on the Delaware River uses as much water daily as the cities of Buffalo and Boston combined.

In 1950, not counting the streamflow used mechanically to generate hydroelectric power, the water used by industry weighed almost 50 times the total of all other used materials combined.

Industrial consumption can only increase with our industrial growth; in fact, the President's Commission predicted that the total amount of water used would nearly triple in the 25 years from 1950 to 1975.

But even more important is the percentage share of all water used in the United States which goes for industrial use.

In 1950, it was estimated that industry withdrew 43 percent of all water used.

In 1975 estimates are that this percentage will be increased to 62 percent.

Is it not rather startling to realize that, during the Second World War, plans for building at least 300 industrial or military establisments had to be abandoned or modified because of inadequate water supply.

In the opening of the President's Materials Policy Commission report, it was stated that by 1975 access to good water might become the most important factor in deciding where to locate industries.

This is most significant for us here in the Mississippi Valley. It presents both a challenge and an opportunity, for we are blessed with an abundance of water.

If we shape our water management plans to provide an adequate industrial supply, the areas along the rivers of this valley will be able to attract more and more industry.

Associations such as yours will continue to play a key role in seeing that these Federal and State plans are best suited to developing the industrial potential of the areas served by our rivers.

If we plan wisely, we need never fear the ever growing thirst of industry.

If we do not, some of our brightest hopes for industrial development will be snuffed out before we know it.

Civilizations have always been dependent on water.

Early civilizations flourished on the banks of the Nile, the Tigris, and the Tiber.

Though our cities no longer need lie on the banks of our rivers and lakes, we are no less dependent on water.

In a sense, our dependence is even greater, for as these studies show, water is no longer as abundant as it was to the ancients.

The supply is not shrinking. But we use it more.

As our population and industry grow, we must think in terms of the very real possibility that, unless we plan wisely today, we will have a water shortage tomorrow—even in our now water-abundant areas.

To meet the demands of the future, therefore, it is imperative that we adopt a national water policy which will provide an adequate supply of this vital natural resource.

I present seven proposals.

Some are now being taken haltingly, some not at all.

All of them should be followed resolutely:

First. We must have a coordinated program of flood control, water storage, and power development through the construction of multiple-purpose reservoirs, wherever feasible, on the rivers of the Nation.

In this connection, I second the proposals General Itschner made earlier today in regard to the preservation of future project sites.

Second. I support the program of cooperation between Nation and States for organization and development of local watershed districts to control water runoff at its source.

This program has run into unnecessary delays. These must be overcome.

As the program is expanded, we will be better able to conserve and preserve a supply of fresh water on the land where it falls.

Third. Our stream-pollution-control programs should be accelerated.

We should place first priority on interstate cooperation in the control and prevention of pollution; second priority on Federal grants-in-aid to towns and cities for the construction of sewage-treatment plants, along with other water-purification facilities.

Fourth. There should be a cooperative national and State program for the reclamation of used water by the removal of waste, and through the use of purification processes.

Fifth. We should have a cooperative national and State program for the development of new ground water reservoirs, including the presently unavailable underground lakes and streams.

Sixth. We need a national research program designed to investigate the possibility of inducing rainfall through artificial means; and also to consider the development of a practical method of removing salt from sea water.

Seventh. Finally, a coordinated program is necessary to assure proper navigation of our water arteries wherever economically feasible, so as to provide the fullest utilization of these natural streams of commerce.

These programs cannot be carried out without the sympathetic aid of groups, such as yours, people with interest in, and devotion to, the cause of water resource development.

In establishing the details for this water management program, particular attention should be given to the problems of geographical distribution of our water resources.

As the Materials Commission stated: "If a single word were used to sum up the water problems of the United States, that word would be maldistribution—maldistribution in regard to time and geographic areas."

In the past, maldistribution was not a great problem because the center of our population was always near the Atlantic Ocean.

This center has been moving steadily westward, however; and indications are that it will continue to do so for the foreseeable future.

With reference to the point of navigation in this program, may I comment on the situation here in the Mississippi Valley.

In this connection, we know that the potential of our valley has not been fully utilized.

The upper Mississippi, Ohio, and Illinois have been dredged to a depth which allows full utilization of their navigation potential. Annual traffic on these rivers ranges from 20 million tons on the Illinois to some 80 million tons on the Ohio.

By contrast, with a record volume last year, the Missouri River carried only a little more than half a million tons.

The Missouri is the poor relation when it comes to navigation. It is the only major segment of the Mississippi River system lacking a 9-foot channel.

This association has been a strong proponent of a 9-foot channel for the Missouri.

I have consistently supported such a channel in the Congress, and I intend to continue to do so, because this channel would bring more industry and prosperity to our State.

Yes, the great volume of water in the Missouri can be used to attract the water consuming industries of the future, and if it is a fully navigable stream the attraction will be twofold.

In recent years it has been disturbing to see how our national policy toward rivers and harbors has been deteriorating.

As example, the President's budget for the fiscal year 1960 did not request a single dollar for either new construction or new planning.

This is false economy.

Such public dollars as are saved by eliminating dollars for water control and utilization can result over the years in heavy losses to private enterprise and our communities.

In addition, each year that we postpone the benefits of flood protection, we increase the danger from annual floods.

Recent disasters in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and West Virginia underscore this fact.

None of us will ever forget the flood tragedy of the Kansas City area at the start of this decade.

Planning and construction to correct and improve our water position should be continual and orderly. It should not come in uneconomic spurts.

For it does not make much sense, when building a house, to put the roof on a bit at a time.

And so, my friends, this national problem involves the interests of all our States, and all our people.

In the future, as in the past, the Mississippi Valley Association can play a vital role in striving for a successful solution to this problem of fresh water.

Such a program will bring greater prosperity, not only to this rich valley, but also to the entire country.

The future of our society depends on our ability now, to plan wisely for coming generations.

What a tragedy if future growth is stunted by any failure on our part to plan against water shortage.

It is written in the second chapter of Genesis: "The Lord God took the man and put him into the garden * * * to dress it and to keep it."

Let us all band together to keep this garden in which God has placed us, and make it even richer for the generations to come.

Farm Price Supports in the Existing Pattern of Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

Wednesday, February 11, 1959

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Speaker, few, if any, areas in the United States are untouched by subsidies. Subsidies are as old as our Government and long have been used as an acceptable and serviceable adjunct to the free economy. Condemnation or praise of subsidies are academic and unrealistic unless the public purpose of the subsidy is taken into account. The above are general conclusions from a historical review of Government subsidies made by the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives of the United States.

What constitutes a subsidy? A definition is very difficult. Some would think of a Government subsidy as Federal moneys or their equivalent paid out to individuals. But this would exclude legislation under which certain groups in the economy are authorized to directly increase their "take" from the total economy. By such activities, the same purpose and result is achieved as that of a direct subsidy paid out to the same group. One of the first official acts of the Government of the United States was to enact a tariff to protect the growing industries of the infant Nation. Another gave preference in custom duties to goods imported on American ships. Both were designed to improve the competitive position of domestic businessmen and enhance the growth of American industry. In this respect, both were subsidies, although nothing was paid out directly by Government.

Early in the history of the United States, our Government recognized the need for improved transportation. Public lands, direct contributions, and loans were used to encourage construction of canals. Later, similar contributions were made to many railroads. Mail subsidies developed and supported other means of transportation and have been used extensively. The first mail subsidy was reported in 1845. More recently, millions of dollars have been paid out to subsidize the merchant marine. Hearings with reference to postal deficits also suggest considerable subsidy in the form of low postal rates, the benefits of which accrue to certain publishers.

For the reasons suggested above, it is perhaps desirable to avoid the notion of a subsidy in terms of cash paid out and think in terms of a welfare state. The evidence of the welfare state are actions by the Government designed to improve the economic position of specific groups or classes of the population. All actions of the Government, in fact, fall in this category. The promotion of public health, education, and the maintenance of order and tranquillity are all costly activities of Government which directly benefit the public. We think of the welfare state as one which is interested in specific activities for specific groups of people, and, sometimes, as in the case of graduated taxation, to the economic detriment of other groups. The attempts of the Government to achieve a leveling off process both in individual incomes and in human welfare benefits some and penalizes others. The activity of the welfare state includes not only cash paid out to individuals, but also the levying of tariffs, the creation of stockpiles for surplus products either by the Defense Department or in the Department of Agriculture, marketing agreements, and the like. Perhaps it is desirable to list some of the specific activities which seem to fall in this category.

At the head of such a list certainly one finds the graduated income tax. Older, however, and more important in its time, was the protective tariff. Activities under the antitrust laws also fall in the welfare category. Of the more recent devices, the following come quickly to mind: Bank deposit insurance, the conservation of natural resources, transportation subsidies, school-lunch programs, Government assistance through charitable organizations, price supports for farmers, defense stockpiles, allocation of defence contracts to job deficit areas, old-age and survivors pensions, minimum-wage laws, job insurance and separation pay, and labor legislation giving unusual privileges to unions.

It is not the purpose to evaluate these programs. It is only proposed to show their antiquity, on the one hand, and more recently the extent of the activities of the welfare state both in direct subsidies and in other programs with similar objectives.

Virtually every person in the population of the United States would seem to be a receiver of benefits from one or more of these activities. The entire Nation, in one way or another, is affected by the various programs, whether for industry, for labor, for the young, for the aged, or for agriculture. It seems inappropriate, under a condition where activities of this nature have gained such wide acceptance as in the United States, that the public, through its legislators, should withdraw from support of any group unless that program had failed in its objective, or an improved program was conceived. Who in the United States has the right to say of another, "You get too much."

The program for support of farm prices was designed to improve individual incomes in agriculture. It was also designed to equalize farm and nonfarm incomes and to create agricultural purchasing power, thereby improving the market for goods produced by others. There were no important failures. Until better programs have been proved, farm price supports have justified their position in the welfare state. They should be reexamined and amended to keep them abreast of the changing facts of the world, but they should not be abolished.

The programs for price supports for farm products have, in fact, contributed much more to public welfare than was planned in the original objectives. Through distribution programs, hunger has been largely eliminated in the United States and significant contribution has been made to reduction of hunger in other lands. Growing farm efficiency has made it possible for a declining number of farmers to produce food for an increasing domestic population for less total dollars. This is no idle achievement in a nation where inflation is the general rule. In terms of progress in the solution of basic human wants, it seems quite likely that the farmers of the United States who produce food have made a greater contribution than any other group in the world during the period beginning in the middle 1930's.

May 22, 23, and 24 Selected as Dates for 1959 Congressional Tour of New York City for Members of Congress and Their Families

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 11, 1959

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, plans are being perfected for the 1959 annual congressional tour of New York City for Members of Congress and their families.

The weekend of May 22, 23, and 24 has been selected for the tour which provides for three fun-packed days in New York at a cost of $39.50 each for adults and $34.50 each for children between the ages of 5 and 12 years. This year's trip will include a reception at New York City Hall, a visit to the United Nations, a reception aboard a transatlantic liner, a boat trip of New York's harbor, a visit to the Empire State Building, together with receptions, and so forth, at various hotels and clubs. Opportunities for attending New York theaters are included in the schedule.

Since this is not a congressional election year, the weekend of May 22, 23, and 24 should now be reserved by all Members who desire to make this enjoyable visit to New York City. Those wishing to obtain further information may call Miss Patricia Bryan in my office, telephone extension 4576.

The Real Lincoln

OF

HON. FLORENCE P. DWYER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 11, 1959

Mrs. DWYER. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be an ironic rule of history at work when it comes to dealing with great men.

It might almost be said that the greater the man and the farther removed in time he is from our own generation, the more freely he is quoted and the more loosely he is interpreted.

Thus, few people in our Nation's history have been more vigorously embraced by representatives of more diverse points of view than has Abraham Lincoln.

In a very real sense, this is a tribute to Lincoln's greatness. He was a unifier, a builder, a man who loved his fellow men regardless of political differences.

In another sense, however, this is unfortunate. For it obscures what Lincoln really believed and sometimes what he really said and meant.

And worst of all, it tends to hide the real Lincoln—a man from whom other men in all ages have much to learn.

It behooves us, then, to see him now as he really was. In this, our purpose may be better served by examining the characteristics of the man Lincoln, rather the words and the policies by means of which the public figure Lincoln dealt with the concrete political realities of his particular time.

Granted the importance and the wisdom of what he said and what he did, we must do Lincoln the justice of dealing with him in the perspective of his time. And this means restraining ourselves from using his words to serve our own ends.

The irony in this should be apparent. For Lincoln was addicted to the truth. It has been said of him that he was morbidly preoccupied with truth—morbid, perhaps, because too few of his contemporaries, as too few of ours, gave evidence of valuing it as highly.

Lincoln was a man with a passion to be understood. He abhorred indirection, despised glittering generalities, shrank from evasion and ambiguity.

His respect for man's mind led him to rely on demonstration, rather than on emotional appeal, to convince those with whom he dealt.

His outward style—his manner, his taste and his writing—reflected the inner Lincoln: self-contained, direct, clear, sometimes terse, precise, simple, and undecorated.

He was a realist, about himself and about others. He lacked sentimentality of any kind. And he would, it is certain, have scorned those who, however sincerely, have sentimentalized him. For he recognized that sentimentality destroys a man's integrity, fuzzies up the truth about him, and makes him a pliable instrument for the service of others' interests.

Lincoln was no storybook hero, no romantic fool. He was a difficult, complex human being, the material of true greatness.

He valued excellence. He recognized it in others. He understood the painstaking, laborious price of achieving it, and willingly paid that price. And, afterward, he appreciated honestly what he knew to be his own great worth.

This self-control, this mastery of himself—no easy accomplishment for this giant of many moods and passions and ambitions—was the source of his strength and his mastery of others.

Was Lincoln really modest and humble? Not in the conventional sense of false self-effacement or self-righteousness, but genuinely so, as one who knew and understood himself as he really was.

He was a great man—a man for our age and every age.

Washington Report

OF
HON. BRUCE ALGER
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 11, 1959

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my newsletter of February 7, 1959:

WASHINGTON REPORT

(By Congressman BRUCE ALGER, Fifth District, Texas, February 7, 1959)

The veterans' direct housing loan bill provided $300 million more for direct Treasury loans and increased the maximum interest rate from the present 4¾ percent to 5¼ percent. Arguments for: (1) Additional veteran home purchases may result; (2) more private investment money may become available to veterans through the increased interest; (3) the President is not forced to spend this money, it is only made available. Arguments against: (1) There is $192 million still on hand for such loans; (2) Congress' control of expenditures is bypassed by this direct Treasury payout; (3) this is $300 million beyond the budget. The bill was passed 310 to 89 (35 not voting). I opposed the bill. As I see it, the merits of the bill were completely eclipsed by the unconscionable expenditure of $300 million we don't have, to that extent unbalancing the budget.

The "battle of the budget" is on, the opening gun being the vote on this loan bill. Not a single Democrat voted to keep the budget balanced (all 89 were Republican). Several Democrats spoke vehemently against the bill. Some, like myself, consider the bill clearly unconstitutional, since such appropriations bypass the expressed provisions of the Constitution for appropriating money. This back door to the Treasury, or House appropriation procedures bypass, accounted for $4½ billion of the 85th Congress' expenditures. Why this unconstitutional procedure? Why does not even one Democrat vote against it, including all alleged southern conservatives? Why? Could it be politics, pure and simple—the attempt to discredit and embarrass the President who is now trying to hold the line, trying to cut spending, trying to tailor spending to income—as all responsible fiscal practice demands—even household operation?

In the Senate Democrats are pushing a $2½ billion housing bill (creating the inflation which wrecks the income of the very people who politicians claim need housing); then there's the Armed Forces budget struggle with the "defense at any cost" cliche (our defense is based on a sound economy and can be wrecked by inflation); or how about agriculture with the Democrat plan now for direct subsidy payments to farmers. Well, where's the money coming from? The Federal Government hasn't any—it's broke and in debt. Do people want their taxes raised? The President reminded the spenders—"include the taxes in each of these programs to pay for them." Politicians vote for every appropriation and against every tax. If ever conservatives of both parties had the courage of their convictions, now is the time to support the President's balanced budget for the sake of our Nation. Surely, not even rabid partisans can oppose economy moves just because it's the President, a Republican, asking it. A prevalent distortion now presented by Democrat leadership is "the Democrat Congress clipped $5.6 billion off the budgets for 1958 and 1959." What a transparent distortion, even to the untutored, when it is remembered that the Democrat-led Congress piled up a deficit of $12.7 billion during this period. As Knebel, columnist, says of the budget battle: "Ike challenges Democrats to raise taxes to cover their spending. That's pay-as-you-go, but Democrats have their own slogan: 'Pie now—pay later.'" For myself, I dislike thinking the labor leaders, the ADA, and/or liberal Democrat leaders can so influence the traditionally conservative southern Democrats.

The draft bill extension passed handily 381 to 20 (32 not voting) extending for 4 years compulsory military service. Many Congressmen dislike a draft in our freedom- and peace-loving country, but this cannot blind us to the reality of the dangers confronting us. We don't seem to be able to maintain the necessary manpower by voluntary methods.

The mountain of debt in this country now totals a staggering $788.8 billion; that's $4,650 for every man, woman, and child, a total debt more than that of all the rest of the world. The breakdown: Federal, $283 billion; State, $14.7 billion; farm, corporate, and family, $449.6 billion. Isn't it time we held the line on spending, taxing, and borrowing, and lived within our Federal income? The Alger thumbnail legislative program might be said in one sentence—cut Government spending, cut Federal taxes, make social security a sound pay-as-we-go system, free farmers from regulations and subsidies, evaluate all existing law, and stop the socialistic labor trend of government.

Voice in the Washington Wilderness Department: Last year, when a something-for-everybody boost in railroad workers' unemployment compensation was being whistled through the Interstate Commerce Committee, only senior Republican Member JOE O'HARA and I protested in a separate report that under current conditions the unemployment insurance fund might well drop dangerously from $170 million to less than $100 million "within a year's time" O'HARA blocked the bill during the closing days of the session. Now this proposal is up again, backed by the committee chairman. Meanwhile in 8 months the compensation fund has plummeted to $80 million and the retirement board head requests authority to borrow around $100 million—coupled with a move to increase benefits.

National Security and Hydroelectric Equipment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD M. SIMPSON
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 11, 1959

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, during the past few days we have witnessed the strange spectacle of a foreign government launching a campaign of recrimination in the American press against our Government's award of a contract for two hydraulic turbines to an American company in preference to a British firm.

Letters have been sent to American newspapers by the British Information Service, an agency of the British Government, quoting the British Ambassador to Washington and the president of Britain's Board of Trade as, in effect, impeaching the honesty and integrity of U.S. Government officials.

The president of the British Board of Trade, a Government agency similar to our Department of Commerce, the British Ambassador and the British Information Services speak for Britain and British interests, not for the United States.

The direct approach of a British agency to American newspapers, with its implied slurs at American officials and policy, has met with a mixed response. One segment of our press has been quick to echo the British position.

In sharp contrast, the Oakland Tribune, of Oakland, Calif., speaks up for America.

The Oakland Tribune published the following editorial on January 28 under the heading "British Campaign":

Attention was called yesterday in these columns to the unhappy state of mind of much of the British press over the awarding of a contract for hydroelectric equipment by the U.S. Government to U.S. firms in preference to lower priced British equipment.

Now we learn that the comments of the British press were Government inspired, and that a campaign has been launched in this country by the British Information Service, an agency of the British Government.

The San Francisco office of the British Information Service is sending out letters to financial editors and the city desks of newspapers in this area, and no doubt elsewhere, referring to the preference for American equipment over British as a slap in the face for Britain.

It refers to a statement by Sir David Eccles, president of the British Board of Trade, also a British Government agency, in which he said:

"Rejection of this tender is hardly consistent with the ideas of interdependence and freedom of trade upon which the two Governments have agreed. The rejection came as a shock and nothing that the U.S. Government has so far been able to tell us in any way reduces my disappointment."

Then the letter refers to vehement protests made by the British Ambassador in Washington, who among other things said of the U.S. Government's explanation: "Tell that to the marines—sailors won't believe you."

It was not necessary that the United States give any explanation, but it did. It was pointed out there is a Federal statute known as the Buy American Act, designed to give preference to American products by the U.S. Government. It was also pointed out the purchase was made in conformity with requirements that Government expenditures be made, wherever possible, in areas of unemployment.

It aso was made clear that security requirements had to be met, in this case the availability of parts when repairs might be needed and the availability of the machine tools needed to turn out replacements in the event of a major emergency.

I am happy to see the Oakland Tribune speak up for America and American employment, security and interests, and I am not surprised. The assistant publisher of the Oakland Tribune is William F. Knowland, who served his State of California and the Nation with distinction in the U.S. Senate for 14 years and retired voluntarily at the close of the recent session as Senate Republican leader.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the clamor which has been raised over the rejection of this English company's bid on two hydraulic turbines I would like to present this case in its proper perspective.

There has been an obvious effort in some quarters to represent this action as having shut out all foreign competition for such contracts.

The facts are that foreign overseas manufacturers during the past 7 years have received orders from American governmental agencies for 14 giant hydraulic turbines totaling 1,526,000 horsepower, 24 hydraulic turbine driven generators with a combined rating of 1,295,210 kilovolt-amperes, and 399 heavy power transformers.

Each year increasing millions of American tax dollars have gone into procurement from foreign suppliers of heavy equipment for our expanding federally owned or publicly owned power production and transmission facilities.

All of the 14 hydraulic turbines above mentioned have been supplied or are on order from the English Electric Export & Trading Co., Ltd., of Stafford, England, the foreign bidder on the two turbines for the Greers Ferry Dam in Arkansas over which the present British-inspired controversy has arisen.

Of the 24 generators of foreign construction, this company has built or has contracts to build the 12 largest, and also a 13th generator of lesser rating. It also has received the contracts for 39 of the 399 heavy power transformers being supplied from overseas.

With reference to two of these transformers, the English quarterly review British Affairs, stated in March 1957, as follows:

Two of the largest transformers ever built have been ordered by the Tennessee Valley Authority from the English Electric Co. of Stafford. The transformers are for the Authority's new power station at Gallatin, Tenn. When they are ready they will form one of the heaviest loads ever shipped from Britain.

Fifty British heavy transformers for other governmental power systems in the United States were ordered from another English company, bringing the British total for this type of heavy electrical equipment to 89.

Governmental procurement of the remaining foreign-built electrical equipment is divided between Swiss, Austrian, Italian, and British firms other than British Electric. It is evident that the latter has not done badly in this overseas competition for our hydroelectric power generation and transmission equipment market.

Industry data submitted to the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization shows, with reference to heavy power transformers, that in 1951 the Federal Government purchased none from overseas. In 1952, 27 percent of the purchases were from overseas, in 1953 50 percent, in 1954 40 percent, in 1955 60 percent, and in 1956 they exceeded 80 percent. This data applies to transformers only.

In 1956 the Corps of Engineers bought 26 percent of all its power equipment, which includes turbines, generators, and circuit breakers, from foreign sources, the Bonneville Power Administration 39 percent and the Bureau of Reclamation 47 percent.

The U.S. Corps of Engineers has installed or purchased 37 heavy power transformers with a total rating of 2,692,000 kilovolt-amperes in the Chief Joseph Dam, the Dalles Dam and the McNary Dam—

An industry statement filed with Director Leo A. Hoegh, of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization states.

Also the Corps of Engineers has two foreign manufactured hydraulic turbine-driven generators, each with a 73,684-kilovolt-ampere rating, in the McNary Dam.

Also the Bureau of Reclamation has three large power transformers (kilovolt-ampere rating totaling 130,000) and six sizable hydraulic turbine-driven generators purchased from abroad and installed in this area.

Also, 32 heavy power transformers of foreign origin have been installed or ordered by the municipal power systems of Seattle and Tacoma or by the public utility districts in the area. They have a combined kilovolt-ampere rating of 2,372,000. In the same category are 10 hydraulic turbines totaling 1,140,000 horsepower, and 10 large hydraulic turbine-driven generators.

The same report states that the Tennessee Valley Authority has purchased 45 heavy power transformers with a total of approximately 4,098,000 kilovolt-amperes from foreign sources and has issued a letter of intent for the purchase of three 60,000 kilovolt-amperes hydraulic turbine-driven generators, while the power authority of the State of New York has purchased some 32 foreign-produced transformers with a total kilovolt-ampere rating of 4,098,000, identical to that of TVA.

Mr. Speaker, when we consider these facts, particularly those which apply to Federal projects for which Congress has appropriated the funds, the question must arise whether these wholesale foreign purchases are in the interest of our national economy, welfare, and security.

Yet, when the question arises there is an outburst from British officialdom and the British press which is reflected in several of our own newspapers, and the occasion seized upon is the rejection of one award to a company which has received previously many awards from American governmental agencies involving millions of dollars. They would have us subscribe to the view that it is un-American to be for America.

I do not know of any prior occasion when an award of an electrical equipment contract was denied when an English company was the low bidder, although I do recall such an instance when a Japanese firm entered the low bid.

Now what are the facts in this most recent case which has so aroused our British friends?

The Corps of Engineers last July advertised for bids on two turbines for the Greers Ferry Dam in Arkansas. English Electric was the only foreign bidder. Four of the five American companies manufacturing hydraulic turbines entered bids. The bids were opened September 4. The English company's bid was $1,450,700. The lowest American bid, that of the Baldwin-Lima-Hamilton Corp., of Philadelphia and San Francisco, was, $1,757,210. The difference between the low foreign bid and the lowest American bid was $306,510 or approximately 19 percent.

May I say at this point that Federal Government specifications officially recognize that from 45 to 55 percent of the American contract price for the design and manufacture of hydraulic turbines represents the labor cost.

Baldwin-Lima-Hamilton estimated that 207,250 man-hours of work were directly involved at its plant in construction of the two Greers Ferry turbines, and that an additional 81,000 man-hours would be provided by its immediate suppliers, a total of 288,250 man-hours.

I do not have an estimate of the total labor costs on this contract, but I do know that the construction of hydraulic turbines requires highly specialized techniques and skills, and that the average earnings for all labor in American manufacturing industries as of last October was $2.13 per hour.

On this basis, had the contract been given to the English company, which already has received many such contracts as I have pointed out, American wage earners would have lost $612,000, or double the difference between the English and the American bids.

Or, if we take the 45 percent minimum percentage recognized in Federal Government specifications as the proportion of labor costs to contract price in manufacturing hydraulic turbines the loss would have increased to $790,744 had the English company's bid been accepted.

The award of the contract, therefore, provided a net gain to the American economy of at least $300,000 and more than 7,200 weeks of productive employment to American citizens in an area where 6 to 8.9 percent of the total labor force is currently unemployed according to the January report of the U.S. Bureau of Employment Security.

The award of this particular contract to the lowest American bidder instead of to the foreign bidder was clearly justified, in my opinion, on economic and social grounds, in addition to that of national security expressed by Director Hoegh and upheld by Secretary Dulles.

American wage earners buy American goods in American shops and stores.

Foreign labor does not.

American wage earners pay Federal, State, and local taxes.

Foreign labor does not.

American employment and American households support our schools and colleges, our churches, and our civic and religious institutions.

Foreigners do not.

Americans man our military and industrial defenses.

Foreigners do not.

When Government tax money is paid out for Government projects and facilities American taxpayers are entitled, in my opinion, to have that money paid to fellow Americans with the realization that the benefits of these expenditures will accrue to all Americans in national security and an expanding economy, particularly where qualified American workers and taxpayers are unemployed.

Why should American jobs be sacrificed because British labor is content to work for one-half or one-third of our wage scales, thus permitting his employer to underbid American industry on public contracts?

I concede that this was not a factor taken into account by the Director of OCDM, but offer it as supplemental justification of his determination.

The decision was based solely on national security considerations.

Congress in 1933 passed the Buy American Act, designed to grant American producers a 25-percent differential over foreign suppliers on Government purchases on which both domestic and foreign bids were offered.

Written into that law was a provision that empowered authorities, regardless of any differential, "to reject any bid or offer for materials of foreign origin if such rejection is necessary to protect national security interests."

In 1954, the Buy American Act was superseded by Executive Order 10582 which, in effect, reduced the differential to 6 percent but retained the national security exception stated above.

It is, of course, the sovereign right and duty of any nation to protect its national security.

Director Hoegh's decision was consistent also with the national security provisions of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1958 which strengthened and expanded similar provisions in the 1954 Extension Act.

Section 8 of the 1958 act directs the Director of OCDM to investigate and determine the effects on national security of any article upon request of the head of any department or agency, upon application of an interested party, or upon the Director's own motion.

If, as a result of such investigation, the Director is of the opinion that the said article is being imported into the United States in such quantities or under such circumstances as to threaten to impair the national security, he shall promptly so advise the President.

Then, unless the President determines that the article is not being imported in such quantities or under such circumstances as to threaten to impair the national security he shall take such action as he deems necessary to adjust the imports of such article and its derivatives so that they will no longer threaten to impair the national security.

A definite standard and criteria were written into the law to guide the Director and the President in arriving at a determination.

Congress directed that the Director of the OCDM and the President consider:

First. Domestic production needed for projected defense requirements.

Second. The capacity of domestic industries to meet the projected defense requirements.

Third. Existing and anticipated availabilities of the human resources, raw materials, and other supplies and services essential to national defense.

Fourth. The requirements of growth of such industries and such supplies and services including the investment, exploration, and development necessary to assure such growth.

Fifth. The character, use, and quantity of the imported articles under investigation as they affect industry in the United States and the capacity of the United States to meet national security requirements.

These considerations are not optional with the Director of the OCDM or the President. They are statutory requirements and not subject to the whims of foreign trade expansionists or foreign press releases.

These provisions were written into the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1958 by the House and retained by the Senate. The Senate added a further consideration to be recognized by the Director of the OCDM and the President in arriving at a determination of the impact or effect of imports of a given article on national security.

I quote:

> In the administration of this section, the Director and the President shall further recognize the close relation of the economic welfare of individual domestic industries; and any substantial unemployment, decrease in revenues of government, loss of skills and investment, or other serious effects resulting from the displacement of any domestic products by excessive imports shall be considered without excluding other factors, in determining whether such weakening of our internal economy may impair the national security.

Thus the authority of the President to deal with imports which threaten to impair our national security is unequivocal.

Nor is the question of reciprocity involved where a nation's security is at stake.

Britain drastically restricts imports which compete with British industries which she considers essential or strategic.

She does this under the Safeguarding of Industries Act of 1921 as extended and amended.

She does this through a rigid system of import licenses and exchange permits.

She does this through her British token import plan, described by our own Department of Commerce as follows:

> The British token import plan, established with the United States in 1946, enables eligible U.S. manufacturers or other eligible U.S. firms to export to the United Kingdom token shipments or specified commodities whose importation from other dollar sources is otherwise generally prohibited by the British Government.

Participants are permitted to make shipments under the plan in an amount not exceeding 30 percent of the individual certified firm's average annual exports of specified commodities to the United Kingdom in the base years 1936, 1937, and 1938.

The years 1936, 1937, and 1938 were depression years in which the total exports of the United States to all countries averaged less than $3 billion. The British token plan permits slightly over 500 American firms which were exporting to Britain in those depression years to export annually now 30 percent of what they exported to Britain then.

I am informed that there is no record of any heavy electrical equipment—generators, hydraulic turbines, transformers, or circuit breakers—having been supplied to British industry by any American manufacturer in recent years.

In fact, according to testimony presented before the Ways and Means Committee at the hearings held last year on renewal of the Trade Agreements Act, such export would be impossible even if American manufacturers were able to overcome the British low wage differential and enter competitive bids. I quote from the testimony cited:

> Since its creation in 1947, the Central Electrical Authority of Great Britain has limited the procurement of power and transmission equipment to domestic (i.e. British) suppliers because, as its official report to a parliamentary committee of inquiry states: "It would be unwise for the electricity supply industry (of England) to be dependent upon foreign manufacturers for spares and maintenance."

Mr. Speaker, I submit that if it is unwise for England to be dependent on American or other foreign suppliers for spares and maintenance, it is unwise for the United States to be dependent on British suppliers for spares and maintenance of power and transmission equipment.

Britain's own policy and enactments demonstrate that when the President of Britain's Board of Trade speaks so glibly of interdependence and freedom of trade upon which the two Governments have agreed, his statement, like many British products, was made exclusively for export.

I am not aware of our Government having ever formally acceded to the doctrine of interdependence with any nation, although I know that some lip-service has been given to that concept in the executive branch.

In any event we are not dependent on Great Britain for hydraulic turbines, generators, or heavy transformers, although we might well be if we continue to rely largely on foreign sources for such equipment.

There are, as stated previously, five companies in the United States that manufacture hydraulic turbines, three of them located in areas that presently have a labor surplus, frequently referred to as distressed areas.

There are five companies manufacturing hydraulic turbine generators; synchronous condensers above 10,000 kilovolt-amperes, two of them located in labor surplus areas.

There are six companies manufacturing power transformers above 10,000 kilovolt-amperes, five of them in labor surplus areas, and only three companies manufacturing power circuit breakers of 1 million kilovolt-amperes interrupting capacity and above, two of them located in labor surplus areas. Governmental agencies have purchased 81 circuit breakers from foreign countries.

Should the foreign manufacturers elect to bid on all Federal Government jobs, they could, if present policies are continued, take over the bulk of production of all heavy power-producing equipment purchased by the agencies of the Federal Government—

The industry brief filed with the Director of the OCDM tersely states:

Since 1953, 70 percent of the hydraulic turbine generator business in the United States has been placed by governmental agencies, Federal and State, and the industry estimates that 60 percent of hydraulic turbine business is affected by policies of the Federal Government.

In brief, the Federal Government has become the principal buyer of heavy power-producing and transmission equipment, all highly vulnerable to disaster or sabotage.

It can buy foreign at the risk of many months delay in the event of breakdowns requiring repairs or replacement, or it can buy American with necessary parts and repair skills readily available.

It can buy foreign at the risk of increasing unemployment and the loss of specialists and technicians through shutdown of our own strategic industries, or it can buy American and assure our continued security in this highly important field.

Let us not be overwhelmed by the protestations of foreign agency leaders that we are breaching ideas of interdependence and freedom of trade when we endeavor to safeguard our own national security.

The Nebraska Farmer Magazine Has Reported History of State From Lincoln's Day Until Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. DONALD F. McGINLEY

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 11, 1959

Mr. McGINLEY. Mr. Speaker, one of the most memorable and lovable characteristics of Abraham Lincoln was his sedate, but sharp, sense of humor. There is a story behind the naming of Nebraska's capital city—Lincoln—which I think would have amused Mr. Lincoln, had he been living at the time.

The Platte River, in its east to west course, cuts the State of Nebraska into approximate halves, north and south. Early Territorial politics—1854–67—were colored with a sectional rivalry over location of the Territorial capital site. The first acting Governor, Thomas B. Cuming, chose Omaha, north of the Platte, as the Territorial capital rather than another historic Missouri River town, Bellevue, south of the Platte.

The location controversy continued and became hotter as Nebraska became a State on March 1, 1867. One of the acts of the first State legislature in 1867 was to make a final capital site determination.

The South Platte members, many of whom were Democrats, were in the majority in the first State legislature and were determined to relocate the capital city. They had chosen the small inland village of Lancaster on Salt Creek, because of the expected wealth of the salt reserves in that area.

Forced to strategy, the North Platte group, who hoped to retain the capital of Omaha, offered an amendment to rename the village of Lancaster as "Lincoln." By this maneuver, the northern members hoped to make the relocation measure distasteful to the South Platte Democratic members and thus break up the political strength of the South Platte majority.

However, the South Platte members accepted the amendment and on July 29, 1867, the little village of Lancaster, on Salt Creek, was officially designated as the State capital and renamed as the city of Lincoln.

Thus did the controversy over this minor issue cease, as it were, by accident, and symbolized the later acceptance of Abraham Lincoln by all parts of the Nation as a good and great man who saved the Union of the United States of America.

It is then, Mr. Speaker, further proof that men of vision make history both by their direct efforts and by the force of their being.

On this anniversary of the birth of a man of principle and foresight, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues another birthday. This birthday is of an institution born in the mind of a man of many Lincoln-like attributes.

This year marks the 100th anniversary of the Nebraska Farmer, a farm magazine that reported the history of the State from Lincoln's day until now.

Its founder was Robert W. Furnas. He was a farmer, fruitgrower, horticulturist, soldier, politician, and newspaperman.

When that first edition was published, the Territory was vast in size, with most of the people living along the eastern boundary of the Territory. There were 24 counties represented in the Sixth Territorial legislature in 1859. Nebraska City was the largest town, with a population of 1,922. Omaha's population was 1,883.

Furnas continued to publish the magazine until going to war in 1862. He returned to his publication and was elected the second Governor of the State in 1872.

This was the heritage of the Nebraska Farmer and it reflected as almost a creed: ruggedness, adaptability, honesty.

Its pages were dedicated to the farmer of Nebraska. It was interested in his economic welfare, his opportunity for education, his right and privilege of good government.

And the Nebraska Farmer has never lost that personality.

Another man was to rise over the horizon of Nebraska history and shine with the strength and brightness of a Nebraska summer day upon the people and the land. He was Sam McKelvie, born on a homestead in the State he loved.

He guided the Nebraska Farmer for half a century, was to become Governor of the State at the age of 37 and bring into focus the greatness of agriculture and to especially enshrine the sandhills of Nebraska as the greatest cattle land in America.

As the farmers of Nebraska struggled against adversity so did this publication. The anniversary issue relates an era in the history of the Nebraska Farmer which could have spelled its doom or—as was the outcome—nurtured the publication on the sparse diet of adversity and the strengthening qualities of austerity.

A period of depression hit business in Nebraska in 1921. In 1923, Sam McKelvie was broke. It was a despondent Sam who boarded a train for Omaha to try to tap one of the fading hopes of obtaining the $50,000 needed to keep the business going.

Walter Head, president of the Omaha National Bank, listened to this man's plea and heard the publisher expound his belief that the Nebraska Farmer could come back.

The banker and friend of Sam wrote out the check and said:

Sam, Nebraska needs a good farm paper. Let's keep the Nebraska Farmer going.

Sam's name was the only security ever offered to protect that loan.

There are many more stories of the growth of the Nebraska Farmer under the guidance of Sam McKelvie. Too many to relate here.

The Nebraska Farmer is like a jewel of many facets. Its organization is a family in a real sense. The employees own stock in the company and its almost negligible turnover in employees is testimony of the loyalty and devotion of its people. Sam's will provided for the employees to own the business.

Like Sam McKelvie, its present president and publisher, Glenn Buck, came up from the ranks. He started over 30 years ago as an advertising salesman.

The Nebraska Farmer story is in the finest traditions of Americana. It was and is interested in progress but not plunging; government but not political power; education but not preachments.

It is the true chronicle of Nebraska history.

The American Association for the Advancement of Science, the Association of American Colleges, the Council for Financial Aid to Education, and the National Planning Association Have Called for Increased Private Support of Education

OF

HON. FRANK THOMPSON, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

Wednesday, February 11, 1959

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, at various times in recent years many leading nationwide organizations have called for increased private giving to education. Among these highly respected and substantial groups are the American Association for the Advancement of Science, the Association of American Colleges, the Council for Financial Aid to Education, and the National Planning Association.

Recently, I introduced a bill, H.R. 2440, to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide funds for educational purposes by providing increased incentives for private giving through the allowance of a tax credit for charitable contributions to institutions of higher education.

Most corporations and individuals conspicuously fail to contribute to education the sums permitted under the Internal Revenue Code. In fact, it is the failure of the present tax laws to realize the large sums necessary for education which the Congress intended when it wrote these acts which led to the development of H.R. 2440 and other measures similar to it which are designed to correct the present situation.

Dr. Paul E. Klopsteg, distinguished president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, wrote me on January 28, 1959, that my bill, H.R. 2440, "could become one of the most important pieces of legislation in the interest of preserving the integrity and independence of our colleges and universities that has ever been passed." Clearly, if our colleges and universities are not adequately assisted in obtaining the funds without which their continued existence will be impossible, then the integrity and independence of these institutions will be ended. Both increased Federal aid and private giving is of absolute importance if our colleges and universities are to serve our growing needs as our country expands.

H.R. 2440 would allow a taxpayer a credit against income tax for charitable contributions made to institutions of higher education. In the case of an individual taxpayer, the limit on this credit would be the same as the present limit on the deduction for charitable contributions. H.R. 2440 would not give him a tax benefit with respect to more contributions than he may now include for deduction purposes alone; he may elect to treat a charitable contribution—if it is to an educational institution—as a credit rather than as a deduction, but the total of credit plus deduction is no greater than the present allowable total of deductions.

In the case of a corporate taxpayer, the limit on this credit would be increased from 5 percent to 10 percent of taxable income—where the percentage-of-taxable-income method of computing the limit is used—and this credit would be in addition to the deduction presently allowed for charitable contributions generally; a corporation may elect to treat charitable contributions to educational institutions as credits rather than as deductions—up to 10 percent—without cutting into the amount of such contributions—along with other types of charitable contributions—which may be allowed as deductions. Of course, the same contribution cannot be counted as a credit and a deduction.

Under H.R. 2440 the taxpayer would be allowed a 2-year carryover on the credit just as he is presently allowed a 2-year carryover for deduction purposes. The Secretary of the Treasury would be directed to prescribe regulations governing the time and manner of making the election to treat a contribution as a credit rather than a deduction and imposing conditions to insure the effective correlation of the new credit section with the existing deduction provisions.

I include here a letter I have received from Dr. Paul E. Klopsteg, president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, and the text of my bill, H.R. 2440:

AMERICAN ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF SCIENCE,
Glenview, Ill., February 3, 1959.

Hon. FRANK THOMPSON Jr.,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. THOMPSON: Thank you very much for your letter of January 30.

* * * * *

As you may know, I have been either directly active in or associated with higher education throughout my career. Having been on the staff of a large State university and a large private university, and on the board of trustees of a small liberal arts college, I am familiar with the problems, so many of which could be solved with more money that the institution can truly call its own.

I have literally lived with the question of how the flow of undesignated funds from many donors could be stimulated, over a period of more than 5 years. For more years than that, I had been aware of the inevitable pressure that would come upon the colleges and universities as a result of the rapid increase in the number of young people of college age, and that pressure is now upon them. To avoid operating deficits, they must either limit their enrollments, or obtain more operating funds.

Some private institutions are already limiting enrollments, which is bound to throw increasing loads on the State and municipally supported institutions, largely to their detriment. What is needed is clearly the additional "own" money to prevent deficits as enrollments increase. The source must be one of two possible ones: either Government, or private. As you know better than I, the pressure on Government for more and more subsidy for higher education is increasing each year, and understandably so. Private individuals have reached a ceiling in their charitable giving, as expressed in percent of adjusted gross income of taxpayers. As shown in the study sponsored by AAAS, this percentage has remained close to 4.2 for a number of years, this being the average for those itemizing their gifts. The question is how to break through the ceiling. I believe it can be done, and I believe H.R. 2440 can be the instrument for doing so.

When I published the general plan for equalizing cost of giving in Science, I had requests for 1,800 reprints, out of an original circulation of about 45,000 copies. It indicated exceptional interest in the problem and possible solutions. Great interest was also expressed by many college and university presidents with whom I spoke about it, and the usual comment was, "This is exactly what is needed. You must keep on pushing it. Of course one individual isn't in position to push such a matter very far or very fast. It was not until AAAS, an organization without vested interest in the results, but of course interested in better education and research in colleges and universities, took enough interest to have the study made that things began to move off dead center. And H.R. 2440 expresses succinctly how the job needs to be done.

As I see it, either we have no concern for the future, since "Uncle Sugar" is always available to help, or we do something to make this help unnecessary. If we have strong convictions, from experience, that much of the strength of an institution comes from self-reliance, something must be done to spark and foster self-reliance in the administration of the institutions. Up to now I haven't seen a better method than that proposed in H.R. 2440, nor has anyone within my knowledge come up with anything better. When someone tells me that it isn't the answer to the problem, that it won't work, that the Congress won't pass it, I have one reply: "Then you have tossed yourself a challenge to improve on it, because a way must be found to channel more private funds into the institutions."

I believe that most of the pros and cons are covered in my article in Science for November 16, 1956. If you would like to use any part of it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at a time you consider to be appropriate, I am sure that there will be every cooperation from AAAS to facilitate this.

During the next few months I shall be making a number of public addresses in which I shall discuss the subject broadly, and of course will refer to H.R. 2440 in the terms I used in my letter of January 28, quoted in yours of the 30th.

All other bills which I have seen, intended to aid higher education or research, seem to me to skate around the edges of the problem, and don't get at the heart of it. Yours does get to the root of the problem, and provides means for a solution which will automatically remain a solution with increasing enrollments; for it potentially breaks through the barrier (4.2 percent of adjusted gross income) and, provided taxpayers are properly informed, will substantially increase the percentage of increasing incomes.

You refer to the desirability of cosponsorship, which seems to me most important. Were I in Washington before March, I would be glad to help further in finding other Members who might also introduce the bill. I hope there are tried methods by which this can come about.

You may count on whatever help I can give, both personally and through organizations such as AAAS.

Sincerely yours.

PAUL E. KLOPSTEG,
President.

A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide funds for educational purposes by providing increased incentives for private giving through the allowance of a tax credit for charitable contributions to institutions of higher education

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to credits against tax) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 39. Credit for charitable contributions to institutions of higher education.

"(a) ALLOWANCE OF CREDIT.—At the election of the taxpayer there shall be allowed as a credit against the tax imposed by this chapter the amount determined under this section.

"(b) INDIVIDUALS.—In the case of a taxpayer other than a corporation, the amount allowable as a credit under this section shall be whichever of the following is the lesser:

"(1) the amount determined by multiplying—

"(A) the amount of charitable contributions to institutions of higher education, by

"(B) the maximum rate of tax imposed for the taxable year by section 1(a), or

"(2)(A) in the case of any individual who has elected to take the standard deduction provided by section 141 or to pay the optional tax imposed by section 3, 5 percent of the taxpayer's adjusted gross income, computed without regard to any net operating loss carryback to the taxable year under section 172, or

"(B) in the case of any other such taxpayer, 15 percent of his adjusted gross income, computed without regard to any net operating loss carryback to the taxable year under section 172.

"(c) CORPORATIONS.—

"(1) GENERAL RULE.—In the case of a corporation, the amount allowable as a credit under this section shall be whichever of the following is the lesser:

"(A) the amount determined by multiplying—

"(i) the amount of charitable contributions to institutions of higher education, by

"(ii) the percentage which equals the sum of the normal tax rate and the surtax rate prescribed by section 11 for the taxable year, or

"(B) 10 percent of the taxpayer's taxable income, computed without regard to—

"(i) section 170,

"(ii) part VIII of subchapter B (except section 248),

"(iii) any net operating loss carryback to the taxable year under section 172, and

"(iv) section 922 (special deduction for Western Hemisphere trade corporations).

"(2) CORPORATIONS ON ACCRUAL BASIS.—In the case of a corporation reporting its taxable income on the accrual basis, if—

"(A) the board of directors authorizes a charitable contribution to an institution of higher education during any taxable year, and

"(B) payment of such contribution is made after the close of such taxable year and on or before the fifteenth day of the third month following the close of such taxable year, then the taxpayer may elect to treat such contribution as paid during such taxable year.

"(3) CARRYOVER OF CORPORATE CONTRIBUTIONS.—Any contribution made by a corporation in the taxable year which, but for the limitation of paragraph (1)(B), would be taken into account in computing the credit under this section, shall (at the election of the taxpayer made for the taxable year) be taken into account in computing the credit under this section in each of the two succeeding taxable years, but only to the extent of the lesser of the two following amounts:

"(A) the excess of the amount of charitable contributions to institutions of higher education which may be taken into account in computing the credit under this section under the limitation in paragraph (1)(B) over the amount of the charitable contributions to institutions of higher education made in such year; and

"(B) in the case of the first succeeding taxable year, the amount of such excess contribution, and in the case of the second succeeding taxable year, the portion of such excess contribution not taken into account in the first succeeding taxable year.

"(d) INSTITUTION OF HIGHER EDUCATION DEFINED.—For purposes of this section, the term 'institution of higher education' has the meaning given to such term by section 103 of the National Defense Education Act of 1958.

"(e) SPECIAL RULES.—

"(1) AMOUNTS TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT.—The determination of whether or not a charitable contribution to an institution of higher education may be taken into account under this section, and the amount thereof, shall be made under section 170; except that in the case of an individual any such determination shall be made without regard to any election to take the standard deduction provided by section 141, or to pay the optional tax provided by section 3.

"(2) CORRELATION WITH SECTION 170.—No amount taken into account under this section shall be allowable as a deduction under section 170. Any amount taken into account under this section shall be taken into account in computing the limitations provided in section 170(b)(1) (but not those provided in section 170(b)(2)). For purposes of provisions of law relating to amounts allowable as a deduction under section 170, any amount taken into account for purposes of this section shall be treated as an amount allowable under section 170; and any reference in any provision of law to a specific provision of section 170 shall, where appropriate, be treated as including a reference to the corresponding provision of section 39. An amount shall be treated as taken into account for purposes of this section only to the extent that, but for such amount, the amount allowable as a credit under this section for any taxable year would be decreased.

"(3) CREDIT NOT TO RESULT IN REFUNDS.—The credit allowed by this section shall not exceed the tax imposed by this chapter, reduced by the sum of the credits allowed by this part (other than this section and section 31).

"(4) ELECTIONS.—Any election provided by this section may be made only at such time, in such manner, and subject to such conditions designed to insure the effective correlation of this section with section 170, as the Secretary or his delegate shall by regulations prescribe."

(b) The table of sections for part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of such Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"SEC. 39. Credit for charitable contributions to institutions of higher education."

SEC. 2. A Plea for U.S. Diplomatic Relations With the Vatican

OF
HON. VICTOR L. ANFUSO
OF NEW YORK
Wednesday, February 11, 1959

Mr. ANFUSO. Mr. Speaker, one of the most forceful and compelling forces in the struggle against communism and one of the strongest influences for peace in the world today is the Vatican. We are living in a most difficult age, a challenging age which calls for wise leadership and effective action if freedom is to survive. We must leave no stone unturned in meeting this challenge. By our refusal to establish diplomatic relations with the Vatican, however, we are ignoring a very important center of information and intelligence. In so doing, we are harming ourselves and the cause of freedom to a very considerable extent.

The late President Franklin D. Roosevelt realized the importance of maintaining diplomatic relations with the Vatican when he sent Ambassador Myron Taylor there as his emissary. The results of Mr. Taylor's mission were highly satisfactory to the interests of our Government and our people, because it enabled us to obtain certain political and economic intelligence which we would not have had otherwise.

Today the free world is in a life-and-death struggle with the evil forces of communism. If communism should emerge triumphant, it will make little difference whether we are Catholics, Protestants, or Jews—all believers, regardless of creed, will be doomed. Under such circumstances, it stands to reason that we should all be united in our efforts against those who seek to destroy us. In that case, it is unthinkable that any reasonable man would raise objection to the United States being represented by a diplomatic mission at the Vatican.

It is a very strange situation to me when I see full-fledged U.S. diplomatic missions in the Soviet Union and in the satellite countries of Poland, Rumania, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and Bulgaria, but no such representation at the Holy See. At the time of the Hungarian revolt in 1956 we condemned the Communist regime of that country and we protested against the brutalities of the Soviet troops in Hungary, but we did not withdraw our diplomatic missions from Budapest or from Moscow. When people in this country asked why this was not done, we were told by responsible Government officials that we would lose important listening posts behind the Iron Curtain.

While that is very true, we are ignoring an important listening post at the Vatican which could be no less valuable to us. There our mission could obtain vital information from all parts of the world, including from countries behind the Iron Curtain, which flows daily into the Vatican in large volume. My experience as an intelligence officer with OSS during World War II had taught me that the Holy See is au courant with everything that is going on in the world, and sometimes was even more informed than we were.

Such antiquated reasons that having a U.S. envoy at the Vatican would be showing special favoritism toward one particular religion or that the Pope would rule the White House are too ridiculous for our day and age. We are interested in preserving the security of our Nation and of the free world; we are interested in maintaining peace in the world and genuine understanding among the nations. It is, therefore, most logical to stand together in a common cause with all those forces who think as we do, who seek the same goals, who are fighting the same enemy. In other words, as I see it, it would constitute a step in the direction of greater unity of the free world which believes in the supremacy of the Almighty God as against godless communism which seeks the enslavement of the whole world.

About 3 years ago, at Christmas, 1955, the late Pope Pius XII held audiences with members of the diplomatic corps assigned to the Vatican. He discussed with them the possibility of reaching an accord between the East and the West on nuclear disarmament, but he noted at the time that it was impossible for the Vatican to undertake international mediation "when two of the greatest powers are not represented at the Holy See." The Pontiff was referring to the United States and Soviet Russia, neither of whom maintain diplomatic relations with the Vatican.

Mr. Speaker, we are in the unenviable position of being classified with Communist Russia as the two great powers in the world today lacking diplomatic representation at the Vatican. What a strange position for us to be in at a crucial time such as this, when we claim to be the moral leader of the free world. It is a fact that the Vatican maintains diplomatic relations with some 50 countries throughout the world. Among them are such Protestant countries as Great Britain, the Netherlands, West Germany, and others, who find it advantageous to have official representatives attached to the Holy See.

Our failure to be represented at the Vatican leaves us in the same category with Soviet Russia—as well as with Communist China, which has no representation there—which is not only a paradoxical and embarrassing situation for us, but it also creates considerable doubt in the minds of our friends and allies who are inclined to regard our attitude as immature action unbefitting a great nation.

This is a situation which needs to be corrected. In the past, the maintenance for separation of church and state was advanced as a major argument against recognition of the Vatican. Such an indictment in connection with Vatican representation is wholly fantastic. All of us are deeply aware of the constitutional and historic role of religion in American life. I dare say that the American people would not brook a distortion of that role any more than it would approve religious bigotry and intolerance. Consequently, the establishment of diplomatic relations with the Vatican would be entirely in accord with our Constitution, our history and our traditions. It is motivated solely by the desire for the promotion of world peace and understanding.

Fortunately, the successor to Pope Pius XII, the present Pontiff, Pope John XXIII, is pursuing the same attitude toward the attainment of world peace, and the same desires for achieving understanding among the nations of the world. At a time when from many corners of the earth we hear the voices of doom and destruction, the voice of Pope John is one of calmness and comfort. We must help strengthen it, so that it does not remain a voice crying in the wilderness.

Whether we like it or not, we are at war with Communist Russia on all fronts. They are bent on destroying the free world, and particularly the faith of the free world in a Supreme Being. I regard this as a most propitious time to establish relations with the Holy See, in view of Pope John's elevation to the papal throne and his strong appeal for unity in the ranks of Christendom.

As a member of the House Committee on Science and Astronautics, I am particularly concerned about the challenge being made to the invincible powers of God. I would think that religious men of all faiths would want to work together to prevent the atheists not only from destroying our bodies, but also our souls. It so happens that the Vatican is today the only existing world religious center having diplomatic relations with other nations—the only nations not represented are the United States, Soviet Russia, and Red China. If other faiths had a similar world organization, I would be the first to advocate diplomatic representation in such a body.

For these reasons, I am now introducing a resolution which calls for the immediate establishment of diplomatic relations with the Vatican through the appointment of an envoy as a gesture of our friendship and our desire to help promote world peace and greater understanding. In sending a diplomatic mission to the Vatican, the United States would demonstrate to the world that it has the highest esteem for the Catholic Church and the broad principles of religious freedom for which it stands. The Vatican is most certainly in a position to serve as a force for unity and strength of the free world. Let us seek its wise counsel, its moral strength, its worldwide support.

Railroad Workers' Benefits

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOEL T. BROYHILL
OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 11, 1959

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, a committee of this distinguished House is currently considering a measure vital to the interests of the railroad workers of America. It concerns increased retirement and unemployment benefits to bring them to an equality with retired career civil service employees and those under the social security system who have attained the age of retirement or have suffered economic setbacks through the loss of jobs.

It is my sincere hope—actually my expectation—that this important bill will soon be reported favorably and that the Congress will discharge its responsibility imposed by the Railroad Retirement Act to remove the injustice currently prevalent respecting the railroad workers. I know that this disadvantage was not premeditated. It was merely an oversight on the part of the Senate and House, which in increasing retirement and unemployment benefits to other classes of workers, neglected those railroad employees who are so necessary to a healthy national economy and a strong national defense. It is axiomatic that too often the wheels of justice grind slowly.

My purpose is not to be repetitious. It is rather to impress on this distinguished body the necessity of correcting at this session of the Congress the omission we have made with respect to the railroaders. With that thought in mind and with the permission of the House I shall here include my remarks made before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee during hearings of a number of bills, including one which I introduced, designed to bring these workers to a par with other workers enjoying additional benefits under the civil service and social security systems.

My testimony before that committee follows:

This distinguished committee has before it today important proposals affecting hundreds of retired workers of the Nation's railroads. Across the Potomac, in the congressional district I have the honor to represent, is located one of the largest railroad yards in the world. I personally know many men and women employed in Potomac yards. I know their problems and I know these problems are shared by their fellow workers in all parts of the United States.

Today they are wagging the cow's tail. Discharging our responsibilities respecting Federal and social security employees we have increased their benefits to bring them more into line with the cost of living. But to date we have neglected the railroad workers, who are also our responsibility. We have assumed this responsibility through the enactment of the Railroad Retirement Act and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. Without action by the Congress, retired and unemployed railroad employees must continue to drag behind those in the Government service and those covered under the social security system.

The railroad workers are not fat cats. They are people who are in an income bracket comparable to many other groups who devote most of the fruits of their labor to current expenses. They are dependent on adequate retirement and unemployment insurance to meet these situations. If there are savings, they are indeed meager. Little opportunity is offered to set aside funds for old age and emergencies.

Now, I am appreciative of the economic difficulties of the eastern railroads. Competition has reduced their earning power. They have been compelled to curtail certain types of services. But such difficulties are inherent in our system of free enterprise. Business has its ups and downs. That is to be expected.

In my own business—the building industry—we are sometimes faced with the necessity of reducing original prices to sell homes. But that is not the fault of our construction workers and we certainly do not make them the victims of our failure to properly evaluate the housing market. It is my hope that the economic plight of the eastern railroads will improve and that if necessary the Federal Government will lend some sort of helping hand. Rail transportation is essential to our national welfare. We must do what we can to make it economically healthy.

The necessity of liberalization of the congressional acts affecting our railroad workers is further emphasized by the long-range actuarial deficit now existing in these programs. We must restore them to a sound actuarial footing.

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to follow your footsteps in presenting a companion bill to yours in order to accomplish the aforementioned purposes. The same measure was the subject of a number of bills introduced in the 85th Congress. It was passed by the Senate last August, but was not called up for floor action in this House in time to receive proper consideration before adjournment.

The bill contains a number of benefit improvements under both the Railroad Retirement Act and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. But, to my mind, the primary purpose which will be accomplished under the bill will be to put both of these systems on firmer financial bases.

The railroad retirement system has been operating at a deficit for the past several years. This situation must be corrected without delay if we are to maintain a retirement system in which the railroad workers of this Nation can place their confidence. Under the bill, it is proposed to increase the tax rate and raise the maximum wage base sufficiently to finance the benefit increases contained in the bill, as well as to help liquidate the present actuarial deficiency in the railroad retirement fund.

Taxes would be increased from a current rate of 6¼ percent on railroad employers and employees to 6¾ percent beginning with the current year and to 7¼ percent commencing in 1962. Thereafter the tax rate increases would match those taking place under the social security old-age and survivors insurance program.

The wage base maximum would be increased from $350 to $400 a month. This would put the railroad retirement system on a par with the social security system, which, under amendments enacted last year, covers earnings up to $4,800 a year.

The financial basis of the railroad unemployment insurance system would be strengthened to provide funds for the additional benefits proposed in the bill and to take care of the current deficiency which exists also in this fund. This would be accomplished by increasing the tax base from $350 to $400 a month and changing the tax rate to provide for a range from a minimum of 1½ percent to a maximum of 3½ percent, depending upon the current balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account. Minimum annual earnings needed to qualify for unemployment benefits would be raised from $400 to $500 a year.

The benefit increases proposed under the Railroad Retirement Act include a general 10-percent increase in monthly pension and retirement payments. When the 85th Congress came to a close it had granted pay or retirement increases for practically every group whose rates of compensation are established by law, with one major exception—the retired railroad worker. Civil service retirees were granted a 10-percent increase, those under social security 7 percent. It is no more than simple justice that the retired railroad worker, who has borne the brunt of increased living costs to the same degree as his retired neighbors, be given equal treatment.

Other major changes proposed in the Railroad Retirement Act are:

1. Lowering the retirement age for women employees with 10 to 30 years' service and wives of retirees to age 62 with a reduction in annuities. This would allow the same privilege of receiving a reduced annuity now available to women under social security. The same privilege would be offered to male workers at age 62 with 30 years of service.

2. Raising the maximum compensation used in computing benefits from $350 to $400 a month for services rendered after this year.

3. Allowing those retired on account of disability to earn up to $1,200 a year in casual or intermittent employment without loss of benefits.

4. Allowing survivors living in foreign countries to earn up to $1,200 a year, the same as survivors in this country. Under present law survivors living outside the United States, principally in Canada, are allowed no benefits for any month in which they work 6 days.

Under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act benefits increases would range from 50 cents to $1.70 a day depending upon rates. The maximum benefit would be $10.20 a day as compared to the present $8.50.

The bill would also extend the benefit year, or the periods during which unemployment benefits may be paid to an employee. These extensions apply principally to workers with considerable railroad service. Those with over 15 years would be extended another 130 days of benefits, those with 10 to 15 years another 65 days.

I sincerely hope that this measure will receive the thorough consideration of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at its earliest convenience. I am sure that after having done so, the committee will issue a favorable report upon it, so that the urgent necessities for strengthening the finances of both of these systems and bringing their benefits in line with present living costs will be met.

Television Booster Stations

OF
HON. WALT HORAN
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 11, 1959

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, under privilege to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, I would like to include a news report by Mr. Frank W. Vaille, an able reporter for the Associated Press for the West, which appeared in the Wenatchee Daily World, Wenatchee, Wash., recently. This article concerns the problems we are having in attempting to protect the rights of people in remote areas, particularly in the mountains, where deep canyons prohibit the reception of direct radio TV impulses:

HORAN, MAGNUSON SEEK TV SOLUTION

Two Washington Congressmen are soliciting views of other western Members on a proposed bill to solve the knotty problem of television booster stations.

The bipartisan move has been undertaken by Representatives DON MAGNUSON, Democrat, and WALT HORAN, Republican, in the wake of continued opposition by the Federal Communications Commission to booster station operations.

The Commission Tuesday extended until June 30 its deadline for operators of VHF (very high frequency) boosters to convert to UHF (ultra high frequency) translators. Boosters and translators are TV systems that serve small isolated areas.

The Magnuson-Horan proposal would create within the Commission a community television bureau to study technical and financial problems faced by small communities in obtaining TV service.

All applications for UHF translators or any other facilities which may be authorized for operation in the future would be referred to the bureau for study and recommendation.

As used in the bill, the term "small community" is defined to be one with fewer than 25,000 inhabitants.

The bill takes no position as to whether the Commission should or should not license the VHF boosters it now frowns upon. It does say, however, that should the Commission decide to license such operations, it will waive for stations in existence prior to 1959 the present requirement that construction licenses be obtained before construction is started.

One theory behind the new approach is that the present controversy between the Commission and operators of booster stations, mainly in the West, result in part from a lack of understanding by both sides as to the problems faced by the other.

Through creation of the bureau, it is felt, both sides will obtain a better understanding of the problems and come to an acceptable decision.

I would also like to include the following article which appeared in the Wenatchee Daily World newspaper describing just how much it would cost the people in my State to convert from VHF boosters to UHF translators:

COMPLETE UHF CHANGE WOULD COST $11 MILLION

PATEROS.—The Washington State Television Reflector Association estimated today that it would cost $11 million to convert all the reflectors and home sets in the State to UHF.

Francis Adams, president, said this cost included converting community transmitting antennas from VHF to UHF and converting individual sets and home antennas.

Adams said the association was urging citizens to write their Congressman in protest against the costly changeover being demanded by the Federal Communications Commission.

"Let Congressmen know we can't afford it," he urged.

Along with these news reports, I would like to include a brief résumé of the problem which now faces those of us in Congress, the Federal Communications Commission as well as those I want to continue to have the privilege and benefits of television.

One of the primary purposes of the Federal Communications Commission is to provide good, as well as economical, television reception for the people of America. In my congressional district, however, hundreds of TV screens, operated by means of VHF booster stations, were dimmed recently by an FCC decision.

As I have indicated, the topographical terrain in my State is wide and varied—from the flat, rolling plains of the wheat country to the rugged mountains in the entire northern and western portions.

When television first came into being years ago, almost everyone became interested. Nearly every family acquired a television set. Three television stations began operations in Spokane and have been providing good TV ever since.

But, some of our people, living in the valleys and canyons or in small isolated communities, found that their sets simply could not get the picture. As a result, they began looking for ways to bring the signal into their homes.

The first solution was found in community antenna television operations. A private organization simply brought the TV signal into the sets of their subscribers via the cable. The picture was satisfactory and the cost, in localities where there were enough patrons, was not too prohibitive. But, in the small, isolated communities—maybe 20 or 30 families—the CATV system was ineffective simply because there were not enough subscribers to make it economical and practical for the companies.

Thus, other solutions were sought.

I believe the next method employed was the UHF translators. These facilities picked up a signal and retransmitted it on the ultra high frequency band. There were two basic objections to the UHF translators, however. The cost made it impossible to put them to practical use in the small communities. Besides this, they had never been tested in the rugged mountainous areas.

Finally, another method was found in the VHF boosters. These boosters were similar to the translator operations except they operated on a different band of the television spectrum. The boosters were relatively inexpensive and they provided a good picture even in the rugged hills. Folks in my district cooperated in erecting their booster stations. They pooled their money, their work, and their ingenuity and put up their towers. Then they watched television.

The Federal Communications Commission, however, announced that these boosters could not be licensed because they were causing interference and they could not find a way of regulating their operations. They recommended that UHF translators be substituted. The people protested this action and as a result, the FCC allowed the boosters to remain in operation until a complete investigation was accomplished. This survey was made although I do not believe it was complete. UHF translators were not put to practical test in the mountains; no consideration was given to the economic impact on the small, rural, or isolated communities and it was never proven that all VHF boosters caused interference. As a result of their investigation, the FCC declared the boosters to be illegal operations and ruled that they be discontinued. Ninety days were allowed for the booster districts to file an intention of conversion to UHF translators or to shut down. To many people, this was a cruel blow. Many protests were received, once again, from both the television viewers and from the Members of Congress. The FCC then extended their 3-month conversion period to 6 months.

I wish to make it clear that the FCC is faced with a terrific task in trying to solve this problem. But, the problem is not solved by any means. This situation does not exist only in my district, but in many sections of the country. Recently, I, along with several colleagues in the House and Senate, introduced a resolution which states that it is the sense of Congress that the FCC should authorize the operation of VHF booster facilities where it is a matter of public convenience and necessity and where such operation does not actually cause objectionable interference. I am hopeful that the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee will see fit to call for an on-the-spot investigation to be made into this situation to determine if they actually cause interference and, also, if UHF translators will work.

Perhaps this problem could be solved if all the facts were considered. In my opinion, this problem could and should have been prevented. In order that future, similar situations do not arise, I have introduced a bill which would establish a Community Television Bureau in the Federal Communications Commission. This Bureau would study the technical and financial problems involved in bringing television service to the residents of small communities and rural and isolated areas. They would also consult with and advise small communities on such problems. I feel that this would help to establish a good relationship between the viewers and the Federal Communications Commission and would enable them to settle their problems on a mutual basis.

I do hope that my colleagues will lend their full support to these measures in an effort to provide all of the people of our country with satisfactory television.

Presidential Commission on the Blind

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 11, 1959

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing a bill to provide for the establishment of a temporary Presidential Commission to study the potentialities, problems, and needs of blind persons in the United States in relation to the various federally supported services and programs designed to assist them. The need for a comprehensive, authoritative, and objective study of this type has become increasingly apparent during the past several years. The rapid growth and development of service programs as a result of legislation enacted during and since World War II; changing concepts in rehabilitation, education of the handicapped, social insurance, and social welfare in general; changing public attitudes toward the blind; the steadily increasing population of blind persons—all of these factors emphasize the necessity for a high-level study of programs and services for blind persons in order to objectively determine the adequacy of existing services and to recommend improvement in the light of present and future needs.

My bill would provide for such a study of services and programs supported to any extent by Federal funds with the exception of medical research. As my colleagues know, I have been an advocate of increasing Federal support for medical research as the best hope for eliminating the killing and disabling diseases of mankind; and I will continue to be a strong advocate of effective medical research. However, our concern in this bill is for those persons who must make their way in life without sight—the several thousand premature babies of a few years ago—now of grade-school age—who lost their sight because of excessive oxygen in incubators before the cause was discovered and eliminated, the men and women who are blinded each year in industrial and other accidents, and those who lost and continue to lose their sight through diseases whose cure and cause are not yet known. We are interested in learning how we can better assist such people to become full participants in the economic and social life of the Nation.

My bill calls for a Study Commission consisting of nine members to be appointed by the President from among prominent persons in public and private life and the pertinent professions. It authorizes the employment of a full-time staff and permits the utilization of specialists from voluntary agencies for short periods of time without compensation except for expenses. The duration of the study would be 2½ years, and a total appropriation of $450,000 would be authorized to carry it out. This amount would cover a per diem allowance of $50 and travel expenses for members of the Commission, salaries and travel expenses of the staff, printing of the final report and staff background documents, office supplies, and the like, for the entire 2½-year period.

The Commission is charged with studying existing Federal laws which provide services or benefits to blind persons; with studying and evaluating the standards of these services; and with formulating and recommending standards where none exist, in addition to any other recommendations it may make for improvement of services. Thus, programs and benefits for blind persons administered by several Federal agencies would be covered as would State programs in which the Federal Government participates financially. Only those voluntary agencies which participate in Federal programs through the purchase of products, such as workshops for the blind, or through the purchase of services would be included.

I know that the study provided for in this bill will result in improving services to blind people and make it possible for many more of them to take their rightful places in the productive life of our Nation.

Washington Impressed With Achievements of Julius Madey, a Clark, N.J., Boy Who Made Good

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FLORENCE P. DWYER
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, March 2, 1959

Mrs. DWYER. Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great deal lately about the need for improving our educational system in the face of Soviet gains in scientific and engineering education.

We recognize, I believe, that in general we have not insisted upon the highest standards of excellence and achievement of which our young people are capable. We have failed in many instances to recognize talented boys and girls early enough to guide them into areas where their natural abilities and interests could best be developed.

In recent months, however, an unprecedented degree of public awareness of our educational deficiencies has been growing. In response to this awareness, Congress last year passed the National Defense Education Act, a landmark in our educational history. And we are already beginning to reap the harvest of this farsighted legislation.

Similar developments are occurring at the State and local level throughout the country. Our people realize that we need good teachers, adequately paid, and good schools, adequately equipped, if we are to give our children the opportunity to make the most of their God-given abilities.

It is in this context of our increasing determination to improve our system of education, Mr. Speaker, that I call the attention of our colleagues to an example of the kind of talented and responsible young man our American system can produce at its best. I do so not in any spirit of complacency about past accomplishments, but in the hope that this one young man may serve as a model for the kind of excellence we should be producing more of.

Beyond this, however, I believe that Julius Madey, of Clark, N.J., deserves recognition on his own merits.

Julius Madey is 18 years old. He graduated from Johnson Regional High School last year, and plans to enter Rutgers University next year to begin a 5-year course in medical electronics.

Despite his youth, he has made a remarkable record for himself—so remarkable, in fact, that he has just been awarded the 1958 Edison Radio Amateur Award for public service, a cherished honor he richly deserved.

Consider, for instance, that at his early age, Julius Madey has already been an important factor in the success of Operation Deepfreeze and of our International Geophysical Year research teams in the Antarctic; he has provided an essential channel of communication with American personnel at Arctic weather stations, at military bases in the Pacific and DEW line support bases in Alaska; and he has been a one-man good will mission to people throughout Europe.

The top national Edison Award was not the first recognition accorded young Madey. Previously, he had received a special citation from the Edison Award Committee as well as an Edison commendation certificate, and a public service award from the U.S. Navy. He also won student science fair honors several years ago for inventing an ultrasonic drill, and has excelled in oratorical and other academic activities.

Julius Madey received his award—a trophy and $500—at ceremonies held in Washington's Sheraton-Carlton Hotel on Thursday evening, February 26, 1959. It was one of the most impressive such ceremonies I have ever been privileged to witness.

More than 150 people were present for the dinner, including some of the top Government, military, and private communications officials and four Federal Communications Commissioners. Mr. L. Berkley Davis, chairman of the award committee, made the presentation on behalf of the General Electric Co., sponsors of the award. Mr. J. S. Parker, vice president of General Electric for employee and public relations, was master of ceremonies.

The principal speaker for the occasion was the Reverend Daniel Linehan, S.J., head of the geophysics department at Boston College and one of the best known geophysicists in the world. It seems that Father Linehan and Julius Madey were already well acquainted. When Father Linehan was in the Antarctic in connection with the International Geophysical Year, his plane crashed. It was through young Madey's radio station—K2KGJ, which he and his brother, John, 16, operate from their home in Clark—that Father Linehan was able to assure his family in the United States that he was uninjured.

The story of Julius Madey came from all these men and others. It is a story of tireless and selfless service to people. Despite a full high school schedule, he has manned his station up to 90 hours a week, transmitting thousands of messages annually, both important official calls and personal messages between the men on the fringes of civilization and their families at home.

One of the most moving testimonials that evening was a tape-recorded message made in the wastes of the Antarctic by a group of American servicemen and scientists for the express purpose of telling Julius on this great occasion how much his work and help has meant to them.

During the 1958 Christmas season, for example, he relayed for these isolated service personnel orders for more than $2,000 worth of flowers to be sent to their families in the United States.

Once, through his station, a young mother announced the birth of her child directly from her hospital bed to her husband near the South Pole.

Among the evidence submitted to the award committee was a personal letter of appreciation to Julius Madey from Rear Adm. George Dufek, Commander, U.S. Naval Support Force, Antarctica.

For hours at a time, Julius has been the sole contact between civilization and the men still pushing ahead the frontiers of scientific knowledge in some of the most desolate parts of the world.

But his service has been appreciated. The Edison Award judges—FCC Commissioner Rosel Hyde, E. Roland Harriman, chairman of the board of the American National Red Cross, and G. L. Dosland, president of the American Radio Relay League—chose him from among nearly 200,000 licensed radio amateurs to receive this coveted award.

In every sense of the word, Julius Madey was the star of the evening. He acknowledged his award in a 15-minute speech, which he delivered without notes, and which was a model of its kind. He was relaxed and gracious and genuinely modest. He held the entire room spellbound as he told his story and thanked all those who in the past have helped make his accomplishments possible.

Washington, Mr. Speaker, has seen many stars glitter for a while and quickly fade away. But this boy is the real thing. He is a credit to his family—who have obviously meant so much in his young life—to his schools and his community. He is an outstanding example to the youth of America—and to us, the adults—of the potential riches of talent and of personal service that exist in the youth of America, awaiting only the opportunity to grow and develop and be used for the welfare of our country and our people.

Clark Township and Union County would have been especially proud of Julius Madey that Thursday evening.

I certainly was.

Agricultural Production Payments

OF
HON. W. R. POAGE
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, February 11, 1959

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I received a very courteous letter from the president of the Ellis County Farm Bureau in Texas. Attached to this letter was a pamphlet attacking the direct or compensatory payment approach as a basis for a farm program.

Since there is obviously much misunderstanding as to this program as well as to the alternatives that are available and especially since I have introduced a direct payment plan for cotton, I have felt that I should attempt, as best I can, to explain the proposal and to point out some of the answers which will suggest themselves to the charges in the pamphlet.

I have written a rather comprehensive letter on this subject to Mr. Joe B. Shirley. The letter, which is self-explanatory, follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., February 11, 1959.

Mr. JOE B. SHIRLEY,
President, Ellis County Farm Bureau,
Waxahachie, Tex.

DEAR MR. SHIRLEY: Your letter of the 6th, together with the attached statement or circular condemning production payments as "a long step toward socializing agriculture" was just received. I deeply appreciate the fine, fair attitude which you and the other members of your local bureau expressed. I recognize that the production payment approach, like all other agricultural programs with which I am acquainted, has imperfections and weaknesses, but for a good many years I have been trying to compare the strength and weakness of various programs and I think that it must be on a comparative basis that we must make our decisions. If I am right on this, we must then answer these questions: (1) What programs are available? and (2) Which program offers us the most?

Basically there are but three approaches to the farm problem:

First, there is the philosophy of laissez-faire—no controls and no supports. This is what the President and Mr. Benson both strive to achieve, although they would not reach their goal immediately. This means that we would abandon all controls over agriculture and all efforts to support agricultural prices and farm income. It has a very strong appeal for most people and I think that I would support such a course were the farmer not the only element in our economy who is called upon to operate without any stabilization of his income.

If it were possible for the farmer to buy in a completely free market, uninfluenced by governmental regulations, minimum wages, price floors, Government profit assuring contracts, etc., then I think that I would be compelled to agree that the farmer should have no more protection than is accorded to labor, industry, and commerce, but we do not live in that kind of a dream world. The farmer buys in a market of administered prices—that is, prices that are determined in a large degree by governmental actions. Certainly the minimum wage laws directly affect the price of what a farmer pays for a tractor. Certainly the policy of guaranteeing remunerative contracts to the producers of missiles, atomic weapons, etc., adds to the farmer's taxes. Certainly the railroad retirement system adds to the freight bill on everything that the farmer buys, as well as everything that he sells, and he pays the freight both ways. The average income of people on farms is today only $1,027, while the average income of people not living on the farms is $2,040. In other words, the average person on the farm is making just one-half as much as the person not on the farm and one-third of all of the income of people on the farms comes from nonfarm sources.

To deliberately adopt a policy that would still further decrease this pitifully small farm income, while holding nonfarm income to its present levels, is so contrary to my feeling of right and wrong that I cannot seriously consider going back to the freedoms of 1932.

The second basic approach to the farm problem is that of the Agricultural Adjustment and Soil Conservation Act of 1937 (fundamentally the present system). It consists basically of an attempt to balance supplies with demand; first, by controlling the acres of crops produced, and, second, by removing any remaining surplus into Government warehouses through a nonrecourse loan. In the case of cotton and wheat the loan establishes the market price. This is our present system. It has, of course, undergone a great many changes as to the exact degree of controls and the level of Government assistance (the loan). Its distinguishing mark, however, remains the same—the use of a nonrecourse loan to secure for the grower the desired level of support.

Mr. Benson, the President, and Mr. Shuman have all urged that this supplemental governmental support should be reduced, and it has been reduced very materially during the present Eisenhower administration, The amounts paid farmers for their cotton, corn, and wheat is far less than it was. The reduction in the rate of Government loan has not, however, achieved any of the promised savings to the taxpayers.

It has not reduced Government costs. Prior to January 1, 1953, the loan support program of our six basic commodities had cost the U.S. Government nothing for the entire 20 years previous. On the contrary, the Commodity Credit Corporation had accumulated a small profit of $13 million as a result of its support of these commodities. Since 1952, and through 1958, the losses of the Commodity Credit Corporation have amounted to approximately $2,500 million in its support operations involving the six basic commodities.

This reduction in the support prices has not reduced surpluses as it was claimed that it would. On the day Mr. Benson became Secretary of Agriculture the stocks and commodity loans of the Commodity Credit Corporation amounted to $2,452 million. On January 1 of this year the stocks and loans of Commodity Credit Corporation totaled $8,710 million and the President's message to Congress said that by July 1 they will exceed $9 billion. In other words, flexible supports, always flexing downward, have not only aggravated the farmers' problems; they have been terribly expensive to the taxpayer.

I am well aware of the fact that the American Farm Bureau Federation has urged that we cut our supports entirely loose from the parity concept and, instead, let them drop year by year to a point 10 percent below the level of prices for the preceding 3 years. For any commodity, the price of which is actually supported, this means progressive reduction until we reach a point as low or lower than the support price itself. It could only require a few years to make every support price which fixes the market price totally ineffective. In his message to Congress the President supports this approach but asks that it be speeded up.

He asks authority to lower supports 25 percent below the market price "in recent years." In the case of every basic commodity this would mean that in 1 year he would eliminate all effective supports and would drop the support price to a figure below the present market price. We don't have much need for support prices when we can get more on the market.

Obviously, if it were possible to bring the supply of farm commodities to a sufficiently low level, it would be possible in most cases of commodities, except cotton, to raise the price to almost any desired figure, but as a practical matter farmers do not have the resources to accept the drastic cuts that would be necessary. With its far greater resources the oil industry has used this device very successfully. It is called "proration" in our oil laws.

I stated that at this time it would not be practical to reduce the production of cotton to a point where we could force the price to a remunerative level, because to do so would result in a greatly increased use of synthetic fibers. Our mills would simply use less cotton. This, of course, is not true in the case of wheat, where the public is not going to turn to cornmeal, even though the price of wheat were doubled. It is for this reason that I have felt that we stood in special need of a better system of maintaining cotton income, but I think it is clear that our present method of maintaining all farm prices is ineffectual. On this point I agree with the President and with Mr. Benson, although I think that their active sabotage of the program has come a long way toward proving the case that they wanted to prove.

Third. We now come to what seems to me to be the only alternative—that is, direct compensatory payments to adjust the difference between farm income obtained in the open competitive market and the level of income which has been predetermined to be the nearest attainable approach to a fair income.

This is not, as Mr. Benson and Mr. Shuman have tried to indicate, some new plan, nor was the inclusion of such proposal in the plan suggested by former Secretary Brannan anything new or unique. At that time this method had been used in the case of sugar for something like 15 years before Mr. Brannan suggested that it be expanded, and it was only about 5 years after Mr. Brannan made this suggestion that the present Secretary of Agriculture proposed that this method should be used to support the price of wool. It is doubtless a pure coincidence that wool and sugar are major crops in the State of Utah—but I am sure that Secretary Benson would not knowingly advocate a program which be considered to be either wicked or ineffective for the farmers of his home State.

The sugar program, which has been in effect for 22 years, uses production quotas to prevent the overall quantity of sugar from becoming too great and direct Government payments to make up the difference between the world price and 98 percent of parity. It has resulted in a very stable market for sugar, very acceptable returns to the producers, and reasonable prices to consumers. The wool program, the extension of which our own Texas sheep and goat people vigorously supported this year after having opposed the original bill, does not involve any production controls because there is no foreseeable danger of growing more wool than we want, but it has resulted in returns to wool growers in excess of 100 percent of parity and has enabled woolen fibers to sell at price levels competitive with foreign wool and with synthetic substitutes. It was presented to the Congress by the present Secretary of Agriculture, who seems to feel that it would be quite wicked to use a similar program for cotton.

I recognize that there are a great many difficult details involved in working out a comprehensive program for all crops. I think that anyone can point out defects and difficulties in the administration of any such program. I have not tried, or at least I have not been successful in producing, an overall payment program that I want to present as worthy of public support, but I have worked out the details of a compensatory payment program for cotton which I am happy to defend. I have proposed that we go ahead with cotton because it cannot use some of the other programs as effectively as can other commodities. This is because of the competitive situation to which I have already made reference.

That there may be no misunderstanding, the bill I have introduced on cotton, H.R. 3684, does not undertake to increase the amount of money that we are now authorized to spend. I would like to see every commodity bring the farmer a full 100 percent of parity. Until we can do that, I don't think we have met our full obligation, but I also recognize that it is important to protect our taxpayers. This bill only proposes to support the price of cotton at 82 percent of parity—approximately the support level of the past year. The best calculations I can make, this can be achieved without any increase whatever in our expenditures, but it would mean that all of the money spent in the way of subsidies would go directly to the producer—the American producer—the farmer.

As it is now, we are paying out vast sums in direct subsidies—more than one-half billion dollars during the first year of the present cotton support program, but that one-half billion dollars did not go to the farmers. Most of it went to pay storage and carrying charges. I don't know why our taxpayers should be burdened with this storage. The President says that the present program is going to result in storage charges of more than a billion dollars a year and undoubtedly if we continue the existing program, those costs will increase and not decrease. The direct payment program would eliminate all storage charges except on commodities that we have already accumulated. That would be a tremendous saving to start with.

Another matter of importance is that these vast expenditures are not providing competitively priced cotton for American mills. Our cotton is not competitive with synthetics in the mills of Carolina, but we are subsidizing cheap cotton into the mills of Italy, Germany, and Japan. What is there about a subsidy to these foreign mills that makes it sound and just, while a subsidy paid directly to American farmers is, in the opinion of the writer of the sheet you enclosed wicked and immoral?

I am not going to undertake to discuss the whole problem of supports for all agricultural commodities, but I do want to attempt to discuss the criticisms contained in the sheet you sent me as they relate to the cotton program which I have proposed in H.R. 3684 and which I am sponsoring.

The crux of the support provided by this bill is found in the provisions requiring the Secretary to make equalization payments to the first buyer of cotton from a "cooperator." This means the first purchaser of cotton from the farmer, and the payment required is the difference between the average market price for the preceding calendar week and 82 percent of parity. The bill contains provisions to protect the Government from payments to any buyer who has not passed the payment on to the producer and provides a limitation of $5,000 on the payments made to any one producer in any 1 year. This means that the largest producer will still receive payments on about 200 bales of cotton and that everyone who produces less than that amount would receive payments on all of his cotton.

The bill provides that we will maintain a minimum national acreage allotment of 16 million acres, which will be increased if the demand for cotton increases. So long as the present existing surplus exists, the allotment will be decreased by the equivalent of 1 million bales, this for the purpose of eliminating the surplus Mr. Benson has built up. As a matter of protection against losing anything good that we have, the bill will retain an emergency loan provision at not more than 3 percent less than the estimated average world price. Obviously, no one would take advantage of such a loan except as a means of financing holding operations. The bill does make provision for continuing the existing loan level if for any reason funds are not made available for carrying out the provisions of the act. I believe you will immediately see that many of the objections raised in the circular are not applicable to this bill.

The first of the so-called basic objections raised by the author of the circular is that direct payments "would stimulate production, depress market prices, and make farmers dependent on congressional appropriations for all their net income." This bill does not encourage excessive production—in fact it retains all of the production limitations that we have at the present time and in spite of repeated statements by Mr. Benson, Mr. Shuman, and others to the contrary, the assurance of a high price for cotton has never resulted in overproduction. On the contrary, our largest crops have been grown when prices were low and when it was known in advance that they were going to be low. The largest cotton crop this Nation has ever had was produced in 1937, with a support price of 52 percent of parity. According to the logic of this circular, we should have imported cotton in 1937. There have been many years since that time when there have been much higher prices and when there was no control on the production of cotton, but we have never approached the production of those low price years. The reason is that when a farmer who is growing cotton or any other cash crop in a one-crop country (and that is where most of our basics are grown) finds that he is faced with a lower price, he tries to make up in volume what he expects to lose in price. I believe that wheat farmers, tobacco farmers, peanut farmers, and others will react exactly like cotton farmers react and will try to maintain their family's living standards through increased production when they see lower prices coming. In my opinion, this assumption that a fair price for farm products will automatically result in overproduction is the fatal defect in the Bensonian philosophy. If Mr. Benson and Mr. Shuman are correct in this assumption, how do we account for the tremendous increase in surpluses that have been produced by our farmers in the last 6 years, during which time farm prices have been constantly declining? Of course, the reference to depressed market prices is entirely dependent upon the assumption that supports would result in overproduction.

The complaint that it would make farmers depend upon congressional appropriations has no more validity when applied to a direct payment program than it has to the present program. Our present loan support program is entirely dependent upon congressional appropriations. So is any other program that depends upon the Government. A direct payment program, costing the same amount of money as the loan program, is no more dependent upon congressional appropriations than the existing program. In either case, Congress must appropriate money to keep the program going, and it is an insult to the intelligence of the American farmers to suggest that they do not know that the present program is dependent upon congressional appropriations. How do we get the money to pay our present export subsidies; how do we get the money to pay the losses of Commodity Credit Corporation, if it is not from congressional appropriations; and what would happen to the present program if congressional appropriations stopped?

Point 2 in the circular criticizes the Talmadge plan because it is limited to the six basic commodities, but point 3 condemns the expansion of a program to cover all commodities as being tremendously expensive. I have not introduced a compensatory payment bill for anything except cotton, but I think that some of the figures that are used to condemn a general compensatory program are quite misleading. Of course, the cost depends upon the level of support one achieves, but I think we might get some idea about what the cost will be by considering the fact that the total gross farmers received from marketing of all farm products in 1958, including livestock and milk, amounted to somewhere between $25 billion and $32 billion (there is a difference in the figures of the Department and the Census Bureau). Let us take the larger estimate. The average price of all farm products was approximately 82 percent of parity. If we guaranteed the average of all farm income at 82 percent of parity, as provided in my bill, for cotton, this should have involved no cost at all in 1958 except to bring up some of the lowest priced items. This, of course, is a far cry from the $8 billion to $16 billion suggested by the circular. As a matter of fact, $16 billion is just about exactly one-half of the total gross value of all farm products. Since it would only take an increase of 20 percent from the value of all farm products to bring the average to 100 percent of parity, it seems to me that somebody has been figuring with a very dull pencil. Of course, I know that last year's price level is not stable. Mr. Benson says it will go up, but I rather expect it to go down, and on the six basic commodities the shift from our present loan-supported prices would naturally tend to reduce the world price and make the spread somewhat greater, but I think you can readily see that these figures seem to be for propaganda purposes only.

The fourth objection is that this program would result in cheap food. As far as I can see, cheap food is highly desired. It seems to me that if we are going to spend tax money on an agricultural program that it makes more sense to let that tax money result in lower prices to the consumers rather than using their money to force up the very prices those same citizens must pay. I don't think that we can long expect to have the support of the consumers of the big cities for a farm program that is based upon and must inevitably result in forcing their prices to higher levels. While I am firmly convinced that our consumers are buying the greatest bargain of history in the food they consume, I think that Secretary Benson has done a magnificent job of convincing them that they are being robbed, and, as I see it, the chances of losing congressional support for a farm program are far greater if we continue to rely on forcing up consumer prices than if we offer our consumers a program in which they will at least feel that they have some selfish interest.

Of course, the last statement on page 3, "Because it would encourage inefficiency, its ultimate effect would be high priced food to consumers," is a gratuitous and unsubstantiated conclusion that nobody will attempt to establish on the basis of fact. Have the wool and the sugar programs resulted in a decrease in the efficiency of Utah farmers?

Point 5 is the one that is discussed at greatest length by the author of the pamphlet and is doubtless the basis of much of the real opposition to this proposal. The author of the pamphlet states that "Production payments would lead to a ceiling on opportunity in agriculture and a leveling of producer income." He bases this conclusion on the assumption that any direct payment bill would have a limit on the size of the payments, and he assumes that any such limit would be bad. I think he is correct in assuming that Congress is going to place a limit on the size of payments whether they are made through direct payments or whether they are made through a continuation of the present program. I think the American people are about fed up with seeing one wheat grower draw $330,268 and one cotton farmer draw $1,167,502, and this is particularly true when these large producers are so frequently heard to proclaim that if the Government would leave them alone they could produce and sell cotton for 20 cents and wheat for $1. I think it is true that some of these large producers, Mr. Benson's "efficient farmers," can produce and sell commodities substantially lower than the average sized farmer can. Therefore, it seems to me to be logical that we should extend our help to those who need the help rather than to those who say they do not need it. But in the final analysis a limitation on the amount of payments is no essential part of a direct payment program and should stand or fall on its own merits.

The sixth objection, "Any temporary advantages that might accrue to individual farmers as a result of a payment program would be short lived," seems to be open to the same criticism that applies to the last part of the first point—that is, exactly the same suggesions can be made in regard to the present program. Certainly our present cotton allotments have value to the extent that they result in increasing the income of the holder of the allotment. These advantages can be transferred by sale of the land under the present law just as truly as under a direct payment. As a matter of fact, they have been incorporated into the capitalization of farm values. This is particularly true of tobacco allotments. I can see no way where it can be fairly argued that direct payments would change this threat unless it is admitted that the direct payments would be more advantageous to the farmer and therefore more valuable. If that is true—and I think it is—it seems to me to be a good argument for using the direct payments.

The seventh and last criticism of course relates only to those programs that involve payments on the domestic portion of production. The bill I have introduced applies to all cotton grown regardless of where it is sold. I don't think it makes a great deal of difference to the producer where his cotton finally goes. What he wants to know is what he is going to get for it. I might, however, point out that spokesmen for the American Farm Bureau Federation have repeatedly urged the payment of a direct subsidy on all cotton that is exported. Certainly this involves a much more serious basis for criticism as dumping than would the payment of subsidies at home, and it does not put the money where I think it should go—that is, into the pockets of the farmers.

I have gone into a considerable amount of detail, discussing the effect of this program and the objections that the pamphlet you enclosed has made because I know that you are seriously and sincerely interested as cotton producers, and I believe that you should hear both sides of this argument. I may have overlooked some important points. If I have, I will be glad for you to suggest them to me. On the other hand, if I have been able to answer any of the points raised by the opponents of this bill, I hope that the Ellis County Farm Bureau will avail itself of the much advertised democracy of the Farm Bureau system and express your local views in favor of the program that will be of the greatest benefit to Ellis County cotton producers. If you don't agree that that is a direct payment program, ask yourself what system will better serve your needs. If you find a better program, support it and let me know what it is. I want to support it too. And finally, carefully note that the unsigned author of the pamphlet did not suggest anything better. It, therefore, seems to me that as far as this article is concerned, all you have to choose from is the production payment plan, or a continuation of the present program with low supports, reducing farm income, high priced, and consequently noncompetitive, cotton, reducing the market for cotton at home and a direct subsidy system for the benefit of foreign purchasers.

Thanking you, and with best wishes, I am,

Yours sincerely,

W. R. POAGE,
Congressman.

SENATE

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1959

The Senate met at 10:30 a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Master of all good workmen, we come this day to honor one through whose deeds and lips in an anguished day Thou didst speak—a universal man warmed with all laughter, tempered with all tears—whose sad and care-lined face mirrored the fearful struggle he led for the preservation of the Union as one and indivisible.

On this anniversary of his lowly birth we would that—

"Our children shall behold his fame.
The kindly, earnest, brave, foreseeing man
Sagacious, patient, dreading praise, not blame."

In these days that test and try men's souls anew we would turn to Thee with the dauntless faith which Thy servant Abraham Lincoln proclaimed his own, as he said, "I recognize the sublime truth announced in the Holy Scripture and proved by all history that those nations are blessed whose God is the Lord. I believe that the will of God prevails. Without Him all human reliance is vain. Without the assistance of that Divine Being I cannot succeed—with that assistance I cannot fail."

We come to Thee, his God and ours, with the sound of a great amen in our hearts to that creed by which he lived and we live as we lift our prayer to Thee.

In the Redeemer's name. Amen.

ATTENDANCE OF A SENATOR

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, a Senator from the State of Oregon, appeared in his seat today.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, February 9, 1959, was dispensed with.

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

INCREASED RESOURCES OF INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND AND INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT — MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 77)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which, with an accompanying special report of the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

(For President's message see House proceedings for today.)

Mr. ROBERTSON subsequently said: Mr. President, earlier in the day the Senate received a message from the President recommending that the Congress increase its subscription to the stock of the International Bank for Rehabilitation and the International Monetary Fund.

A question has arisen as to the proper reference of that message. In 1947, when the then senior Senator from Michigan, Mr. Vandenberg, was both President pro tempore of the Senate and chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, he requested that legislation of this character be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, where such legislation has been handled for the past 12 years, particularly by the Subcommittee on International Finance, of which the former chairman of the full committee [Mr. FULBRIGHT] was chairman.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] has brought to the attention of the present chairman of that committee the wording of the Reorganization Act of 1946 which clearly gives jurisdiction to the Committee on Foreign Relations of legislation affecting international finance.

Therefore, the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency this morning indicated to our distinguished majority leader that he would have no objection to referring the message of the President to the Committee on Foreign Relations. As a matter of fact, the reference of such a message to the committee would be quite appropriate, because it handles authorizations for foreign aid and also handles work relating to the International Bank and Monetary Fund, as a part of our international program.

As in executive session,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, notified the Senate that, pursuant to the provisions of section 5, Public Law 115, 78th Congress, and House Resolution 165, 86th Congress, the Speaker had appointed Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey and Mr. CURTIN, of Pennsylvania, as members of the Committee on the Disposition of Executive Papers, on the part of the House.

The message announced that the House had agreed to a resolution (H. Res. 164) electing members of the following joint committees of Congress, on the part of the House:

Joint Committee on Printing: Mr. BURLESON, of Texas; Mr. HAYS, of Ohio; and Mr. SCHENCK, of Ohio.

Joint Committee of Congress on the Library: Mr. BURLESON, of Texas; Mr.

JONES, of Missouri; Mr. SMITH, of Mississippi; Mr. SCHENCK, of Ohio; and Mr. CORBETT, of Pennsylvania.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 961) fixing the representation of the majority and minority membership of the Joint Economic Committee, and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

PROGRAM FOR THE DAY

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I announce that shortly Members of the Senate will proceed to the House of Representatives for a joint session, according to the previous plan.

Let me say to all Senators that they will have ample opportunity to make insertions in the RECORD and transact routine business when the Senate returns to its Chamber. It is expected that the able Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] will address the Senate after it returns from the joint session. The authorities of the House have asked us to be present at 10:40 o'clock a.m. I hope to suggest the absence of a quorum in order that Members may be called to the Chamber and leave for the Hall of the House of Representatives before 10:40.

Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] plans to make an extended statement when the Senate returns to its Chamber after the joint session. Therefore, at this time, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and announce that as soon as a quorum is obtained, the Senate will proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

JOINT SESSION OF THE TWO HOUSES TO CELEBRATE THE ABRAHAM LINCOLN SESQUICENTENNIAL

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, pursuant to House Concurrent Resolution 57, previously agreed to, I move that the Senate proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives for the joint session.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 10 o'clock and 46 minutes a.m.) the Senate, preceded by its Secretary (Felton M. Johnston), its Sergeant at Arms (Joseph C. Duke), the Vice President, and the President pro tempore, proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

Upon the conclusion of the ceremonies in the House of Representatives, the joint session was dissolved; and, at 12:07 p.m., the Senate returned to its Chamber, and was called to order by the President pro tempore.

RETURN OF SENATOR NEUBERGER

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas obtained the floor.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I am sure that all other Members of the Senate join me in expressing a very warm welcome and assurance of our sincere pleasure over the fact that my colleague [Mr. NEUBERGER] has returned to the Senate in such apparent good health. I think he knows that he has our prayers and our best wishes for a complete recovery from the illness from which he has been suffering. It is very good to have him back with us.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the statement made by the senior Senator from Oregon. I had intended to make such a statement until he asked me to yield to him.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, we are very happy to see the junior Senator from Oregon back in his seat, and especially to see that he looks so well. Notwithstanding all the news to the contrary, apparently he is 100 percent recovered. That is good news.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, I wish to join the senior Senator from Oregon and my other colleagues in extending a hearty welcome to the returning junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER].

I am particularly happy to join in this welcoming of our able and distinguished colleague because I take a personal pride in his career.

Some 26 years ago, when I was one of the editors of the Nation, a weekly magazine of opinion in New York, I gave DICK NEUBERGER his first opportunity to have an article published in a national magazine. He had just returned from Europe where catastrophic events were taking place in Germany with the rise of Hitler to power. He had observed what was going on at firsthand. I felt that his account was so interesting and important that I asked him to write it, which he did, and this article was then published. This was, as I have said, his first magazine article in a publication of national circulation.

It is a matter of common knowledge that long before he came to the Senate, DICK NEUBERGER had become a distinguished literary figure, uniquely prolific, with the widest range of publications, which included the most diverse magazines and newspapers in our country. From this journalistic career, in which he achieved nationwide repute, he moved into the U.S. Senate without ever abandoning his literary labors, the fruits of which continue to grace our national publications. In two most important fields, therefore—journalism and public service—he has been an important molder of public opinion.

During World War II DICK NEUBERGER was in the Army, assigned to Alaska, and played an important part in connection with the construction of the Alaska Highway. Characteristically, his interest in Alaska has enabled him to serve our long-time Territory and now State in many ways. He led the way to secure Alaska's partial inclusion in Federal aid highway legislation, from which Alaska had been excluded totally during the first 40 years of the Federal Aid Highway Act.

Along with Representative EDITH GREEN, his colleague in the House, he was instrumental in securing legislation to end the contract system for Alaska's mentally ill which will make possible the care of these unfortunates in Alaska where they can be visited by their relatives.

I could go on almost indefinitely in telling of the many ways in which DICK NEUBERGER's service has been of an inestimable value to Alaska and of course to the Nation. It was a happy coincidence that he was presiding in the Senate on the night of June 30th, last, when the Alaska statehood bill finally passed the Senate—an act for which he had labored so devotedly.

We are all very glad that his health has been restored. I hope he will continue to face this body for years to come. And I would like to add my good wishes to Maurine Neuberger who has been so devoted and able a helpmeet to DICK in both public and private life. Those of us who have known and admired them naturally think of DICK and Maurine as a team. Both have contributed unforgettably to America.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, I wish to join with Senators who have expressed appreciation for the return of our distinguished colleague, the junior Senator from Oregon. It was my pleasure to be closely associated with him as a member of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee. He is not only a distinguished Member of this body but a very able one. He is a courageous legislator and has demonstrated this quality on many occasions. He is a kindly man and my association with him has been most pleasant. I am delighted that he is looking so well. I thank God for his return.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I believe I speak for each Senator on this side and on the other side of the aisle when I say that all of us are pleased and, I may say, delighted that our colleague, DICK NEUBERGER, has today returned to the Senate.

DICK NEUBERGER is a good man; he is a kindly man; he is a considerate man; he is a man with strong convictions; and he is one who believes in the Golden Rule—"Do unto others as you would have them do unto you." He is a walking example of one who has the courage to fight back, and who has won. Also, Mr. President, he is an example of the fact that in the days, months, and years that have passed we have had countless demonstrations of the wisdom of the action of the Congress in time and time again increasing the appropriations for basic research in connection with deadly disease.

I wish to welcome back to this Chamber the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] and tell him how very much it pleases all of us to see him looking so fit and so fine.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I should like to join the distinguished majority leader in welcoming back the distinguished junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], whom we have missed so much this year. We are very happy to know that he is well on the road to full and complete recovery.

I hope that one of the results of his illness will be that greater attention and greater emphasis will be placed on appropriations in the field of medical research, because too many of our Members have felt the effects, not only as of now, but in years gone by, of such diseases. Perhaps with this warning and with this example, we may be able to devote ourselves more to the pressing needs of our time as they affect our people in a medical sense.

I am very happy to join the majority leader in welcoming back Senator NEUBERGER.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield now to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President I would not want to miss this opportunity to add my word of welcome to the distinguished junior Senator from Oregon. During the past 2 years he was my seatmate in the Senate. That fact has given me an opportunity to come to know him well. I have sorely missed him during the past months.

Ten years ago, Mr. President, I was stricken with an illness similar to that which befell the junior Senator from Oregon. As my recovery seems to be complete, so I am confident that his recovery will be complete.

I can assure him how happy I am to see him looking so well, and what pleasure I take in welcoming him back to the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield now to the junior Senator from Texas.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I desire to associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished majority leader of the Senate in welcoming back our beloved colleague, DICK NEUBERGER, of Oregon.

He represents not only the people of his home State; he represents the people of the Nation. I know there are at least 2½ million outside of his home State who look to him with affection. They are the Federal workers, the civil service workers, the unclassified workers, the post office workers—the entire number of civil service and post office workers who have benefited by his arduous efforts for their benefit.

It has been my privilege to serve with Senator NEUBERGER on the Post Office and Civil Service Committee for nearly 2 years. There has been no one who has exercised greater leadership than he in driving forward in an attempt to see that our Federal officials and servants, who contribute so greatly to the work of the Federal Government, get greater recompense and rewards for the labor they put forth. I know they have been praying for his complete recovery.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the acting minority leader, the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, on behalf of the minority, I desire to join my colleagues in extending a welcome to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER]. Coming from an adjoining State, I am well aware of the high esteem in which he is held by his constituents. I know they have encouraged him to return with a firm determination to continue his service in the Senate.

We extend to him our best wishes for a complete recovery. We hope he may display vigor and enjoy good health in future service to his State and to his Nation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield now to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I am happy to joint with other colleagues in expressing great gratification that Senator NEUBERGER is back with us. I had the pleasure of knowing Senator and Mrs. Neuberger long before he came to the U.S. Senate. He is a good man. He imparts to the Senate a sense of fairness and kindliness. He is always ready and happy to advise and listen to reason with any of us. I think Senator NEUBERGER is one of the most effective and best Members of the Senate.

If I may be permitted to say so, we have also missed Mrs. Neuberger—Maurine. There is no more gracious or charming lady in the Nation's Capital than the lovely wife of Senator NEUBERGER. We are glad to have them both back.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield now to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr President, I desire to join in the words of joy which have been expressed by my colleagues relating to the return of Senator NEUBERGER to the Senate. I do so first because I know, through his presence, that he has regained his health and is well on the way to full recovery.

Primarily, our joy should come from the fact that he has regained his health and, as a citizen, will be able to enjoy that which is dearest to us all. Secondly, I rejoice because I know that we shall have the benefit of his keen mind in analyzing problems that will come before us.

It is not necessary that we agree in the quest for truth and for proper judgment. It is essential that there be analysis and discussion. Our colleague, RICHARD NEUBERGER, has always contributed richly to the making of law, so that the acceptance of the proper course in the service of our country has become simpler.

RICHARD, I am very glad you are back, for you and for Mrs. Neuberger, and for the citizens of your State.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield now to my colleague from Oregon.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I do not know whether I am adequate to the task of replying to the generous things which have been said about me by the majority leader and others of my colleagues here today.

I wish to say first to the majority leader and to my friend the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH] that I have been inspired by their own heroic recoveries from serious illnesses. I was just starting my service as a Member of the Senate when the majority leader suffered the heart attack from which he has recovered so valiantly and so effectively. I knew of the illness similar to mine which had been suffered a decade ago by Senator CHURCH. I was fortified by his very gallant and reassuring recovery. But, Mr. President, there was another factor that moved me deeply, and that was the knowledge of the great Senators, greater than any of us here, I am sure, who had succumbed to cancer in recent years—Senators like the great Senator McNary, from my State; Senator Vandenberg, who was mentioned a few minutes ago by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON]; Senator Taft; Senator McMahon; and Senator Neely, who used to sit in the row where my seat is, if I am not mistaken.

I could not help thinking that if it were possible for a Senator to stand here and say to his colleagues, "If it were not for the marvelous discoveries made in medical research, I would not be alive and here today; and who in this body would know when, tomorrow morning or this afternoon, he might be in the same plight?" Perhaps we could emphasize these medical discoveries to some small degree by contrast with the way we emphasize research, for example, into weapons and armaments.

The phrase was used here today of triumphing over cancer. No man or woman alone triumphs over cancer; but valiant, persistent, wise, and trained men and women working in laboratories have been able to triumph over a certain phase of the series of diseases we know as cancer. Other phases are still awaiting discoveries which are yet to come. Fortunately for me, and I think for my good friend FRANK CHURCH, what we suffered came within the realm where medical research has already made fabulous discoveries. What some of our colleagues in the past suffered did not come within that scope; therefore, they are not here so that we can benefit from their wisdom.

I certainly intend to dedicate myself to the cause which the majority leader mentioned, the great cause of widening knowledge in the field of medical research.

I am particularly aware of the fact that cobalt radiation therapy, which has been responsible for my own progress, was discovered in large measure by two great Canadian doctors, so I hope there will never be a boundary line of geography or borders, or of breed or birth, when it comes to medical discoveries which can help all mankind.

I wish to say in conclusion, Mr. President, that the experience I have undergone—and I am certain the majority leader and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH] emerged with the same personal feelings—has given me a new insight and a new perspective on the events which take place in our world, and on the events which take place in my own little private realm around me. I think whatever personal bitterness, jealousy or acrimony I may ever have had—and I am certain I am subject to these human frailties—will be far less now than ever before. To a person who is grateful to be alive and to be with his wife, family and friends, the trivial matter of personal ambition and personal pride become very unimportant.

I am grateful for the friendship of my colleagues, I am grateful for their wisdom, I am grateful for their patience, and I am particularly grateful for their personal solicitude during the long ordeal which Mrs. Neuberger and I have undergone. I refer to Mrs. Neuberger because she suffered every millimeter of the way with me.

I thought of all my colleagues often. I hoped the day would come when I could return. When my illness was first diagnosed I thought I would never again be here, and certainly did not think I would be able to stand here 16 pounds heavier than when I was in the hospital.

I am particularly grateful to my own doctors and to the long, long decades of medical research behind them.

I wish to thank the majority leader again for his generous comments, and all of my colleagues in the Senate for their equally kind remarks.

By the PRESIDENT pro tempore:

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Idaho; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

"HOUSE JOINT MEMORIAL 1

"Joint memorial to the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled

"We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Idaho, respectfully represents that—

"Whereas the Minidoka Wildlife Refuge, located in the counties of Minidoka, Cassia, and Power, in the State of Idaho, has placed an unnecessary restraint on the use of the recreational facilities presently existing in the backwaters of Minidoka Dam on the Snake River; and

"Whereas the demand for use of these recreational facilities have increased immensely in the past few years; and

"Whereas the rules and regulations of the Federal Fish and Wildlife Service pertaining to said refuge prohibit the use of said refuge for proper and necessary recreational purposes, consisting primarily of sport fishing and boating; and

"Whereas proper management of the refuge could be such that fishing and boating could be enjoyed without harm to waterfowl or impairing the use of the refuge as a resting area for waterfowl; and

"Whereas proper recreational development of the refuge could best be served by abolishing the Minidoka Wildlife Refuge and transferring management of the said refuge to the Department of Fish and Game of the State of Idaho: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives, State of Idaho (the Senate concurring), That we most respectfully urge upon the Congress of the United States of America that the Minidoka Wildlife Refuge be abolished, and that the management of said refuge be transferred to the Department of Fish and Game of the State of Idaho; be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Idaho be authorized, and he is hereby directed, to immediately forward certified copies of this memorial to the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America, the Secretary of the Interior, and to the Senators and the Representatives in Congress from this State.

"Secretary of State."

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION 2

"Joint resolution relative to statehood for Hawaii

"Whereas the Territory of Hawaii has for many years sought to become a State of the United States with full privileges of statehood and first-class citizenship for its peoples; and

"Whereas this recognition was recently granted to Alaska, and both political parties have recognized that every consideration of fairness demands that the people of Hawaii receive the same status in our Nation; and

"Whereas Hawaii has long since fulfilled all the requirements for statehood, and no valid reason remains for postponing its entry into the brotherhood of the United States; and

"Whereas the people of California feel especially sympathetic to this proposal of statehood for the islands, because of the volume of travel and commerce between the west coast and Hawaii which has so increased in recent years: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the Congress and the President of the United States are respectfully memorialized to enact at this session of Congress such laws as are necessary for the admission of the Territory of Hawaii to statehood in the United States; and be it further

"Joint memorial to the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled

"We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Idaho, do respectfully represent, that—

"Whereas the existence of a large farm surplus of certain commodities is burdensome to our national economy; and

"Whereas the necessity to provide revenue for public assistance to needy persons is also burdensome to our national economy; and

"Whereas many of the recipients of public assistance and members of low-income groups have need for certain of the very commodities which are now surplus and cannot be disposed of in the common market without disrupting our farm economy; and

"Whereas the food-stamp plan which was in operation prior to World War II worked satisfactorily both in relieving the surplus problem and in aiding in providing subsistence for needy persons; and

"Whereas the present plan, now in operation, is very unsatisfactory to the smaller communities; and

"Whereas the State of Idaho is a large producer of farm products and the disposal of surplus agricultural products is a matter of great concern to the people of the State of Idaho: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives, State of Idaho (the Senate concurring), That we most respectfully urge upon the Congress of the United States of America that a food-stamp plan, similar to the one used prior to World War II, and one that is workable and fair to all concerned, be enacted into law as soon as possible; be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Idaho be authorized and he is hereby directed to immediately forward certified copies of this memorial to the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America, the Secretary of Agriculture, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State.

"Secretary of State."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Idaho, identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION OF TEXAS LEGISLATURE

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I present a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Texas on January 28, and ask that it be referred to the appropriate committee of the Senate. The concurrent resolution expresses the opposition of the Texas Legislature to further increases in the gasoline taxes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The concurrent resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, under the rule, the concurrent resolution will be printed in the RECORD.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 9

Whereas the President has recommended that Congress increase the Federal tax on gasoline by 1½ cents per gallon; and

Whereas the Federal Government is annually diverting more than $1½ billion of Federal highway user taxes into nonhighway channels; and

Whereas it has been estimated that the addition of the 1½ cents to the present 3-cent Federal tax on gasoline would result in Texans sending $137 million more in highway user taxes per year to Washington than would be returned to the State for highway purposes under the present aid formula: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Texas (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress be respectfully requested to oppose further Federal invasion of this gasoline tax which should be reserved for the use of the States, and that the use of such present highway user taxes be restricted to highway purposes only; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be mailed to each member of the Texas delegation in Congress.

BEN RAMSEY,
President of the Senate.
WAGGONER CARR,
Speaker of the House.

CONGRESSIONAL RECOGNITION OF NATIONAL RAILROAD MUSEUM, GREEN BAY, WIS.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I submit for appropriate reference a concurrent resolution to grant congressional recognition to the National Railroad Museum at Green Bay, Wis.

The approval of the concurrent resolution would help to make the dream of a National Railroad Museum for Green Bay a reality.

The museum, presenting a panoramic picture of the history of American railroading will, of course, be of great significance for the railroad industry.

The purpose of the museum, of course, is to tell the dramatic story of the tremendous contribution of the railroad to the development of our great country. Among other things, it will:

Portray the development of the railroad industry and its contribution to our progress;

Provide exhibits, including rare locomotives—that is, steam, woodburners, electric, diesel—to give the public an authentic picture of the development;

Serve as an educational institution; displaying printed material, photographs, models, and other information;

Present a chronology of the lives of inventors, investors, managers, and workers who made outstanding contributions to the progress of the railroad industry;

Of course, there will be many more significant features of the museum.

I want to emphasize that the museum will not require Federal appropriations. Initially, the exhibits will be financed by public subscription. Once established, the program is designed to make the museum self-sufficient. For example, there will be a modest admission fee; supplemented possibly by sales of souvenirs.

These minimum costs to the public, of course, will be more than amply repaid by the educational and historical value of the exhibits in the museum.

The museum was the brain child of Maj. Gen. Carl R. Gray. During World War II, General Gray served with distinction as Director of the Military Railway Service. Following his retirement, he had planned to dedicate the rest of his life to organizing a national railroad museum. Unfortunately, he met an untimely death in 1955. In respect to his outstanding contributions in this field, this project will be dedicated to his memory.

This great historical, educational, and cultural museum would benefit not only the people of Wisconsin, but of the entire Nation.

Granting congressional approval to this concurrent resolution would give justified recognition to this fine project. I respectfully urge that it be favorably acted upon as early as possible.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 10) was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Whereas the American railroad has been of incalculable importance to the growth and development of our Nation in time of peace and a major factor in her defense in time of war; and

Whereas there has been established at Green Bay, Wis., the National Railroad Museum whose purpose is to afford recognition in perpetuity to the role of the American railroad in our Nation's early history by preserving the railroad rolling stock and other memorabilia of the age of steam; and

Whereas the city of Green Bay has donated a site for the buildings and exhibits to be erected as part of the National Railroad Museum, and the State Historical Society of Wisconsin, an official State agency, has undertaken the responsibility of developing and operating the National Railroad Museum; and

Whereas there has been donated or pledged to the National Railroad Museum early and rare steam locomotives, other rolling stock, printed material, photographs, broadsides and ephemera, including the Carl R. Gray, Jr., collection, thus insuring its place as a center for the preservation of significant physical evidence of American railroading's early history; and

Whereas the National Railroad Museum, as an educational institution of major significance to all Americans in its portrayal of the development of the American railroad and the lives of the inventors, managers, investors, and workers who created the ties of steel that bind our country together, is of national interest: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress hereby recognizes the National Railroad Museum as a memorial to the individuals who built and ran our early American railroads and as a fitting and valuable institution for the collection and preservation of the memorabilia of the age of steam locomotion.

ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE FOR UNDERDEVELOPED COUNTRIES

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Utah [Mr. Moss], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. McGee], the Senator from New York [Mr. Javits], the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. Murray], the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. Mansfield], the Senator from Alaska [Mr. Bartlett], the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Humphrey], the Senator from California [Mr. Engle], the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McCarthy], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Clark], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Neuberger], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Young], the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. Randolph], the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. Byrd], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Douglas], I send to the desk a resolution and ask that it be appropriately referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 78), submitted by Mr. Kefauver for himself and other Senators, was received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas the United States and other nations of the free world, acting independently, have been engaged in carrying out programs of economic assistance to less developed nations; and

Whereas, although a great deal has been accomplished through these programs, much remains to be done if the allegiances of uncommitted nations are to be won to and retained by the free world; and

Whereas the coordination of the efforts of the separate free nations into one sustained, comprehensive, and coherent program would enable them to achieve the desired results more effectively and economically by (1) avoiding costly duplication of effort and thereby working less of a burden on the taxpayers of any one nation, (2) joining the uncommitted nations of the world to the free world, rather than to one member, (3) encouraging greater effort on the part of the free nations to work as a harmonious economic force; and

Whereas such a unified program would answer the challenge of Soviet Russia, which recently announced an increased foreign assistance program as a means of strengthening its political alinements in underdeveloped areas of the world: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate urges the Executive to seek to work out agreements with other nations of the free world looking toward consolidation of the various national programs of economic assistance to the less developed nations into a single unified program, participated in by the United States and other nations of the free world.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, the countries of the Atlantic Community of Peoples are agreed that economic assistance for the technologically underdeveloped countries—

First. Meets the humanitarian ideals of the western world;

Second. Is of practical good to themselves through enhanced trade, and allied friendship on the military front in an emergency; and Third. Is a deterrent to the attempts to move these countries into the Soviet bloc.

Most countries of the free world are now giving economic help of one kind or another to the underdeveloped countries. It is my belief that help could be much more effective if all these countries immediately coordinated their national programs of economic assistance to the underdeveloped countries.

At a working party of Western World magazine, which I attended this past November in Rome, I was more than ever convinced of the need for this cooperation. More than 100 of the leading political and economic thinkers of the free world expressed their urgency for the West to stay in the vanguard of technical and economical progress, and the front lines were very definitely in the underdeveloped countries.

I would like to present some of these views for your information:

Paul Henri-Spaak, Secretary General of NATO, was emphatic in his recommendation that aid to underdeveloped countries by the free world must be considered in relation to the Soviet challenge. He pointed out that the Soviets make no mystery of their efforts toward political and ideological supremacy. He said political dividends are to be expected from concerted Western action. The resources of the West are limited. A choice would have to be made among the people to be helped.

Giuseppe Togni, Italian Minister of Public Works, warned that the free world must not only be zealous but united in its zeal. Former Italian Premier Amintore Fanfani said that an awareness of the advantages derived by the U.S.S.R. from its unity should lead the Western World to a better organization of its strength.

Prof. Arthur Wauters, professor at the University of Brussels and former Belgian Ambassador in Moscow, prepared a special study on this subject which was presented to all members of the working party several weeks before the meeting. The special theme discussed was—How could and should the West meet the economic challenge of the U.S.S.R. in the various parts of the world? And what inferences have to be drawn from this with regard to the collaboration between the Western countries and with regard to the relations between the West and the underdeveloped countries?

He said most emphatically that the Communists have not given up their theory of the collapse of capitalism. They expect to speed up this collapse by driving the West from its positions in the rest of the world and depriving it of its sources of raw materials. The underdeveloped countries are, therefore, the main stakes in the struggle between East and West and Western unity of action is a necessary condition for any counteroffensive.

Andre Philip, French delegate to the GATT pointed out that the backward countries were falling further and further behind, becoming more and more pauperized. He warned that the conditions of aid from the West were not always satisfactory, and that the West both as an investor and as a purchaser must offer greater advantages to the underdeveloped countries. He said the Soviet has shown far greater skill, particularly in opening markets for the sale of products from the backward areas.

The Right Honorable J. K. Vaughn-Morgan, Minister of State—Board of Trade, United Kingdom—cautioned the West to play its cards very skillfully in dealing with the underdeveloped countries. He said the Soviet had played some dirty economic pool with a number of the underdeveloped countries in certain cement and tin deals, and said this made it even more important that the Western World carefully examine the channeling of its economic aid.

Jacques Oudiette, manager of the Banque Nationale pour le Commerce et l'Industrie, Paris, quoted Indian Prime Minister Nehru's rhetorical question if the real Iron Curtain might not be that which separate the industrialized from the underdeveloped areas.

Prof. Robert Bowie, head of Harvard University's International Studies Department, suggested that the West might make joint use of the International Development Association, new project of the World Bank for channeling their aid.

Denis Healey, British Labor Party, Member of Parliament, suggested that these backward areas must be helped not solely for humanitarian purposes or for any desire to provoke gratitude, but simply because the whole world would profit by their development.

Dr. Sante Astaldi, vice president of the Associazione Nazionale Costruttori Edili—building and public works—asked for rapid action, and Louis Kawan, secretary of the Belgian Committee for the Study of Trade with the East, suggested the creation of organizations at national or regional levels, empowered to direct investments in which private capital could participate.

Ernest Friedlaender, West German columnist, proposed a long-term plan which could be carried out by the OEEC countries in cooperation with the United States and Canada. Etienne Hirsch, Commissioner General of the French plan, agreed that a program of aid to underdeveloped areas required at the very least a plan and precise aims among the industrial countries.

Here, Mr. President, you have a cross section of distinguished political, journalistic, and scholarly opinion all pointing not only to the need for Western aid to underdeveloped countries, but that it be channeled more effectively through a concerted free world effort. And, Mr. President, this should be done now, not next year, or the year after. The Soviet is in there pitching, their rate of production is moving along at a fast clip.

They are courting the underdeveloped countries with economic aid of one kind or another, as are the individual countries of the free world. But with increased aid to offer as the months move on, and a "oneness" of channeling, the Soviet may gain an edge on the free world, if we do not get together on this.

I am therefore proposing to you a resolution which I believe is urgent that the Senate of the United States adopt immediately:

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may lie on the desk until Monday for other cosponsors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I also wish to add that our colleague, the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], serving on the Economic Committee at the last NATO Parliamentarians Association meeting, submitted a challenging report on the necessity of a unified effort by the NATO nations in their mutual aid program, particularly so far as helping underdeveloped nations is concerned.

The resolution merely asks that the President of the United States and the Secretary of State use their best offices toward trying to work out with any other free nation willing to participate, a unified effort for giving aid to the underdeveloped nations, in order that we may avoid duplication, and that we should not only meet the Russian challenge, but for our own good try to have a more stable economic basis in that connection.

APPORTIONMENT OF AID TO STATES IN WILDLIFE-RESTORATION PROJECTS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill designed to assure fair distribution of funds for wildlife restoration and management projects under the Pittman-Robertson Act. I ask unanimous consent that the bill, together with a brief statement, prepared by me, relating to this matter, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1021) to amend the act providing aid for the States in wildlife-restoration projects with respect to the apportionment of such aid, introduced by Mr. WILEY, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 4 of the Act entitled "An Act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in wildlife restoration projects, and for other purposes", approved September 2, 1937, as amended (16 U.S.C. 669c), is amended by striking out "one-half in the ratio which the number of paid hunting-license holders of each State in the preceding fiscal year, as certified to said Secretary by the State fish and game departments, bears to the total number of paid hunting-license holders of all the States", and inserting in lieu thereof "one-half in the ratio which the number of paid hunting licenses issued by each State in the preceding fiscal year, as certified to said Secretary by the State fish and game departments, bears to the total number of paid hunting licenses issued by all the States, and in the determination of the number of hunting licenses issued, more than one license issued by a State to the same individual for hunting small game (including birds) shall be counted as only one license and more than one license issued by a State to the same individual for hunting large game shall be counted as only one license".

The statement presented by Mr. WILEY is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

The maintenance, protection, and improvement of wildlife projects is a real challenge that must be met—if we are to preserve our outdoor heritage.

To assist in State development of wildlife projects, the program under the Pittman-Robertson Act provides that States match Federal funds (obtained by collection of an excise tax on firearms and ammunition) on a 25 percent basis, to carry on acquisition, maintenance, and restoration of wildlife projects. After deducting administrative costs and certain statutory aids to Territories, the money is reapportioned to the States.

For over 20 years, funds have been allocated to the States according to a formula generally based on records of number of licenses issued. Recently, the Department of Interior proposed to change the formula and allocate funds on the basis of licenseholders. If this occurred, I believe there would be unfair distribution of funds which, incidentally, would result in tremendous loss for our Badger State.

Wisconsin, as well as other States, has a variety of big and small game birds and animals. To help maintain an adequate supply, separate programs are necessary. If the new formula were adopted, it would fail to recognize this factor, and, as a result, a number of the fine projects now maintained in our Wisconsin conservation projects, and other States, would suffer.

We realize, of course, that there is a need for a common-sense approach to this situation. We don't want to start a license war by the States—that is, encourage States to issue a great number of unnecessary licenses, just to be eligible for more Federal funds.

To deal more effectively with the situation, the following—and, I think reasonable—approach, would provide, under the Pittman-Robertson Act, that the funds—

(1) Be allocated according to record of licenses issued; provided, however, that—

(2) Not more than one big game and one small game license in a series be included in computing a State's eligibility for funds.

If the change being considered by the Department of Interior were put into effect—that is, simply using the number of licenseholders instead of the record of licenses issued it would have the following undesirable results:

(1) An unfair distribution of funds—severely reducing funds for Wisconsin and other States, since the money would be distributed without regard for the costs of maintaining separate programs—e.g., for big and small game.

(2) Require a costly survey—estimated at $15,000–$25,000 for a survey of licenseholders.

During the 85th Congress, I introduced similar legislation and urged that action by the Department of Interior be held up until Congress, the conservation interests, fish and game commissioners, and others, could evaluate the effects on the program by the proposed change.

A series of conferences were held. A consensus of the findings is in preparation. To attempt to head off the Department's jumping the gun by making the proposed change without benefit of the findings, I am dropping the bill in the hopper.

I respectfully urge early and favorable consideration by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of this legislation. Meanwhile, I shall again contact the Department of Interior to urge that action on the proposed changes be held in abeyance until Congress has had a chance to take a new look at the program.

ADVISABILITY OF ESTABLISHING AS NATIONAL MONUMENTS THE NANCY HANKS MEMORIAL AND LINCOLN STATE PARK, IND.

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, it is my privilege to have been born and reared in that portion of southwestern Indiana which has become known as Lincoln country.

It is in this section of our beloved Hoosier State that the great Emancipator, Abraham Lincoln, spent his formative years.

In Spencer County, Ind., lies the original 160 acres of the Thomas Lincoln farm which contains the grave of Nancy Hanks Lincoln.

There, also, is the site of Lincoln's Ohio River ferry operation.

In this section, the State of Indiana has established the Nancy Hanks Lincoln Memorial and the Lincoln State Park.

While these facilities offer a measure of tribute in memory of President Lincoln, who lived one-fourth of his life in that area, they are far from adequate.

Therefore, Mr. President, on this 150th anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill providing for a study of the feasibility of establishing a national park or shrine in his honor in Spencer County, Ind., a move which has the endorsement of Lincoln scholars throughout Indiana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1024) to provide that the Secretary of the Interior shall investigate and report to the Congress as to the advisability of establishing as national monuments the Nancy Hanks Memorial and the Lincoln State Park in Spencer County, Ind., introduced by Mr. HARTKE, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

COVERAGE OF PHYSICIANS UNDER TITLE II OF SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide for the coverage of physicians under the insurance system established by title 2 of the Social Security Act.

We all know of doctors who devote their lives to caring for the health and security of others, but make little provision for their own welfare.

We know of doctors who, at the close of a career of service and self-sacrifice, find themselves without adequate security for their final years. And we know of doctors who, because of the strains and tensions of their work, are stricken in the prime of life, without opportunity to provide sufficiently for their wives and children.

The great majority of doctors want social security coverage. Wherever they have been given an opportunity to indicate their opinion on this question, they have voted overwhelmingly in favor of being included. I feel it is only their preoccupation with their heavy duties and responsibilities that prevented them from demanding long ago the same kind of protection that all other groups enjoy.

I am aware that in the past some medical organizations, purporting to speak for all doctors, have opposed this extension of coverage. But a study of the reasons for this opposition reveals that these organizations are opposed not primarily to social security for doctors, but to social security for anyone. They oppose the basic principle of this program.

The Nation long ago decided in favor of social security. The overwhelming majority of doctors have also decided in its favor. Therefore, I urge the Senate to close the last gap in our social security system by extending coverage to the doctors of this country. This will be accomplished by passage of the bill that I introduce today.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1025) to provide for the coverage of physicians by the insurance system established by title II of the Social Security Act, introduced by Mr. DODD, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

REHABILITATION OF LA FERIA WATER CONTROL AND IMPROVEMENT DISTRICT, TEXAS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference, a bill authorizing the rehabilitation and betterment of the La Feria Water Control and Improvement District in Cameron County, Tex. The district is part of the lower Rio Grande rehabilitation project.

In the spring of 1957, the Commissioner of Reclamation found this project economically justified. The water users of the district are now ready to enter into a repayment contract with the Government, by which the cost of these improvements can be repaid in a 35-year period.

By approving this bill, Congress will be authorizing the lining of canals and laterals, the cleaning of unlined canals, the placing of new laterals and drains, the repair of pumping installations, and the provision of a new storage basin. La Feria District serves about 27,000 acres of irrigable land in the Rio Grande Valley west of Brownsville.

Mr. President, I call attention to the extremely favorable benefit-cost ratio of these improvements. The Department of Interior estimates that ratio at 5 to 1. And I repeat that the total cost of $5,750,000 is to be repaid by the users.

My good friend JOE KILGORE has introduced an identical bill in the House of Representatives. I commend this legislation to my colleagues, Mr. President, as eminently sound and justified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1026) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, rehabilitate, operate, and maintain the lower Rio Grande rehabilitation project, Texas, La Feria division, introduced by Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

PROPOSED INCREASE OF PERMITTED ANNUAL EARNINGS UNDER VETERANS' COMPENSATION AND PENSION LAWS

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to increase the maximum annual earnings limit permitted under title 38 of the United States Code, otherwise known as the veterans' compensation and pension laws. In effect, this bill would increase by $600 the amount of money a single disabled veteran could earn, and by $1,300 the amount a married disabled veteran could earn, without forfeiting their pension rights.

It has been 6 years since an adjustment was made in the amount of outside income a disabled veteran can earn and still receive his pension. Since that time both the cost of living and the general wage level have risen considerably. In fact, the cost of living has skyrocketed to its highest point in history. It is obvious that the present annual maximum earnings ceiling for disabled veterans is antiquated and unrealistic, and should be raised.

I should like to point out that enactment of this measure will not cost the Government any money. Its passage is a matter of simple justice for disabled veterans and their families.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1031) to amend sections 522 and 545 of title 38 of the United States Code to increase the income limitations applicable to the payment of pension for non-service-connected disability or death to $2,000 and $4,000, introduced by Mr. Moss, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

DEVELOPMENT OF STATE PARK SYSTEM IN PUBLIC LAND STATES

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill which has for its purpose the further development of the State park system in the public lands States. The measure I have prepared would amend Public Law 387, 83d Congress—found in Sixty-eighth Statutes at Large, page 173—the Recreation Act—in two respects:

First. It would remove the 640-acre limitation on the transfer of Federal lands to the States when the lands are to be used for State park purposes; and Second. It would provide that such conveyances for park purposes would be without monetary consideration.

The recreation law already provides that lands for historic monuments may be conveyed without cost to the State, and my bill would place State park lands in the same status.

At the present time the Bureau of Land Management is administering over 176 million acres in 26 States in continental United States, and 298 million acres in our new State of Alaska. The Bureau has no program to preserve historical sites, scenic areas or unique features on the lands which it is administering. It seems no more than right that if the States are willing to take over these areas and manage, protect, and develop them, the Federal Government should make them available. Many of our great recreational, and scenic and historic features are being damaged and destroyed. We must do something about them, or within a few years they will lose their value.

Mr. President, the need for legislation such as I propose is highlighted by the situation in my own State. Utah, which is one of the largest States in the Nation, has a total of 52,701,440 acres. Some 74 percent of it is federally owned. Federal holdings include two national parks, eight national monuments and seven national forests. However, some of the State's finest scenic, geologic, archeological, and historic sites are on the 24,679,361 acres administered by the Bureau of Land Management, and there is no recreation program for them. The Utah State Park and Recreation Commission has included 1,646,174 acres of Bureau of Land Management land in its projected State park program. While the Bureau of Land Management is cooperating in assisting in the purchase and transference of some BLM acreage to Utah for State park use, the acreage limitations must be removed, as my bill would do, if many desirable areas are to be acquired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1032) to amend the act of June 14, 1926, as amended, to provide that lands conveyed under such act for State park purposes shall not be subject to the 640-acre limitation contained in such act, and to provide that conveyances for such purposes shall be without consideration, introduced by Mr. Moss, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS FOR TEXAS TEACHERS

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill which will allow the members of Texas teachers retirement systems to decide whether they want to have social security added on top of the protection they enjoy under their own retirement systems. The bill I have introduced would add Texas to the list of States that have the option to extend coverage under the so-called split provision. Under this procedure present teachers under the retirement system could make their individual decision as to whether they wished coverage or not. Coverage, however, would be on a compulsory basis for teachers who subsequently came under the retirement system. The decision as to whether this option could be exercised would still be left up to the State and the coverage could be effectuated on a school district by school district basis.

In the last 2 years over 700,000 State and local employees under retirement systems in other States have gained social security coverage under the split provision. I believe that the State of Texas and its subdivisions should have this option and my bill, if enacted, will make this possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1036) to amend title II of the Social Security Act to include Texas among the States which are permitted to divide their retirement systems into two parts so as to obtain social security coverage, under State agreement, for only those State and local employees who desire such coverage, introduced by Mr. YARBOROUGH, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

DESIGNATION OF WEEK OF WHITSUNDAY OF EACH YEAR AS "HERNANDO DE SOTO WEEK"

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, for myself and my junior colleague the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] I send to the desk, and ask that it be appropriately referred, a joint resolution to provide for the designation of the week of Whitsunday of each year as "Hernando de Soto Week".

Each year a "De Soto Pageant," featuring an authentic duplication of the landing of De Soto, is staged at the De Soto National Memorial on the shore of Tampa Bay, 5 miles west of Bradenton, Fla. The memorial was established in 1949 by the National Park Service of the U.S. Department of the Interior in tribute to Hernando de Soto and his fellow Spanish explorers.

We feel it is fitting and proper that the people of the United States observe the anniversary of the De Soto expedition, which was the first European penetration into the interior of what is now southern United States, and in order to encourage them to do so, we introduce this joint resolution which would authorize the President to designate the week beginning with Whitsunday of each year, beginning with the year 1959, as "Hernando de Soto Week" and to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies.

The story of De Soto's exploration is indeed fascinating, and in order that Senators may read this story, I ask to have printed in the RECORD, at this point, as a part of my remarks, excerpts from a publication of the National Park Service describing this adventure in some detail, and the text of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the excerpts will be printed in the RECORD, at this point.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 48) to provide for the designation of the week of Whitsunday of each year as "Hernando de Soto Week," introduced by Mr. HOLLAND (for himself and Mr. SMATHERS), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The excerpts presented by Mr. HOLLAND and the resolution are as follows:

Whereas on Whitsunday, 1539, Don Hernando de Soto cast anchor off the west coast of Florida and on May 30, 1539, landed on the shore of Tampa Bay five miles west of Bradenton, Florida, with a large flotilla and an army of some seven hundred volunteers; and

Whereas the De Soto expedition was the first European penetration into what is now the Southern United States, crossing four thousand miles of wilderness in the area which now comprises the States of Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas; and

Whereas on August 5, 1949, a national memorial was established at Shaw's Point, Bradenton, Florida, commemorating De Soto's landing and exploration: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to designate the week beginning with Whitsunday of each year, beginning with the year 1959, as "Hernando de Soto Week" and to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies.

The De Soto Expedition, a typical instance of organized Spanish exploration, was the first European penetration into what is now Southern United States. Crossing 4,000 miles of wilderness, the explorers earned for Spain a broad knowledge of the interior lands and peoples and recorded priceless information on native American life of the 1500's.

THE CONQUISTADORES (THE CONQUERORS)

Columbus had given Spain an early claim to the New World and its wealth, and her warrior nobles penetrated the new-found continents with amazing rapidity. Hardy and courageous men, loyal to King and Church, they had built some 200 permanent towns in the Americas long before Raleigh landed in Carolina.

While Cortés was still having difficulty with the Aztecs, Spanish explorers were moving out from the West Indies. In 1513, Ponce de León discovered Florida; by 1519, the gulf coast was charted; by 1525, navigators had probed Atlantic shores from Cape Horn to Newfoundland. In 1526, Ayllón set ashore a short-lived colony, believed to have been at or near South Carolina's Pee Dee River. Two years later Narváez landed on Florida's west coast. His sole survivors were the resourceful Cabeza de Vaca and a trio of companions. Still the vast North American interior lay mysterious and untouched, rumored to be "the richest land of any which until then had been discovered."

HERNANDO DE SOTO

Don Hernando De Soto, Knight of Santiago, "a gentleman by all four descents" (i.e., by all four grandparents), was a typical conquistador. Born in Spain about 1500, he achieved wealth and a brilliant career in Nicaragua and Peru. Charles V appointed him Governor of Cuba and Adelantado (Leader) to "conquer, pacify, and populate" the northern continent.

On April 7, 1538, trumpets sounded and cannon thundered as the flotilla left San Lúcar, Spain, with about 700 volunteers abroad. The winds were favorable, and De Soto's bride was at his side.

LANDING IN FLORIDA

In Havana, on May 18, 1539, De Soto bade farewell to his Doña Isabel and set sail for Florida. On May 30, the army landed on the west coast, apparently at Tampa Bay. A few ruined pearls lay in the dust at the deserted Indian village where they camped, and the Spaniards believed themselves at the threshhold of fortune. So Narváez had thought, when he chanced upon a single golden ornament.

Spanish scouts found the lost Juan Ortiz, who had come to Florida with Narváez and had been saved by a native princess from death at the stake. For 10 years Ortiz had been a slave of the Indians, and, while he had seen no riches, he had heard wonderful reports of the interior land. De Soto assigned 100 men to guard the camp and sent the ships back to Cuba for supplies. The march through 4,000 miles of unknown land began on July 15, 1539.

INTO THE WILDERNESS

De Soto led 600 or more disciplined veterans who averaged—and sometimes doubled—a steady 10 miles a day on the march. Counting the Indian carriers drafted as they went along, the expedition must often have numbered up to 1,000 people. About 200 horses mounted the lancers. There were about 300 crossbowmen and harquebusiers, a dozen priests, a physician, and workmen to build boats and bridges or repair weapons and rivet the slave chains.

As they pushed northward, heat and hunger plagued them; hidden natives rained arrows upon them. De Soto followed the practice of seizing village chieftains and forcing them to supply food, carriers, and guides. Once beyond Ocale (in what is now Florida), Indians gathered to rescue their chief, but the Spaniards moved first, driving the warriors into nearby lakes.

In the spring of 1540, they marched toward the Savannah River, where the comely chieftainess of Cofitachequi, an Indian village, bestowed her pearl necklace upon Don Hernando. Another 200 pounds of pearls were dug from the burial mounds. But the Adelantado pushed onward. If no richer land were found, they could always return.

Some were lame and sick by the time they reached a region called Xuala in what is now western South Carolina, but here they saw "more indications of gold mines than in all the country they had traversed." Up into what is now North Carolina, then across the Smokies into Tennessee they went. Mulberries, nuts, maize, and turkeys the natives gave willingly, as the army pressed southward toward Coosa, in central Alabama, still searching for treasure.

THE TRAGEDY OF MABILA

Powerful Tascalusa, lord of the Mobile Indians, hid his anger when the Spaniards seized him, and agreed to furnish 400 carriers as soon as they reached the town of Mabila. But warriors—not carriers—surrounded De Soto in Mabila. The Spaniards fought free in a fierce day-long battle, burned the Indian town, and slaughtered 3,000 Indians. De Soto suffered crippling losses in this battle; 20 men killed, including a brother-in-law and a nephew; a number of horses killed; most of the expedition's supplies and property destroyed; and the wounded comprised all the men of most worth and honor in the army.

De Soto had planned to meet supply ships on the coast and send the pearls of Cofitachequi to Havana. But the pearls were lost at Mabila. Some of his disillusioned men, naked under their rusty mail, planned to sail with the ships. To prevent this, De Soto again turned his face from the coast.

A RIVER LARGER THAN THE DANUBE

The expedition almost ended in the spring of 1541, when the Chickasaw Indians made a surprise dawn attack on the northern Mississippi camp. Fortunately, the Indians mistook stampeding horses for cavalry and withdrew; yet a dozen Spaniards lost their lives, and 50 horses were killed. Clothing, saddles, and weapons were burned. Shaking with cold, the men covered themselves with grass mats, while they fashioned new saddles and lances.

On May 8, 1541, De Soto saw the great river, so wide that "If a man stood still on the other side, it could not be discerned whether he were a man or no." Beyond the Mississippi lay the rumored wealth of Pacaha Province, so the artisans built barges and the army crossed for the march into Arkansas to the mouth of the St. Francis. Finding no gold, they turned west, then south, to winter on the west bank of the Ouachita River, near what is now Camden, Ark. Here, the interpreter Juan Ortiz died, a great loss.

THE DEATH OF DE SOTO

Even De Soto was discouraged. He went back to the Mississippi, planning to settle at a seaport and refit for a westward advance, but the scouts found no news of the sea. To terrorize the populous country and keep the Indians from uniting against him, De Soto ordered the destruction of the Anilco village in what is now Louisiana. The fighting was left to his lieutenants, for De Soto, called by his men "one of the best lances who have passed to the New World," was burning with fever. A few days later, on May 21, 1542, Hernando de Soto died.

Not all mourned his passing, for he was a stern man. Yet, skill and courage demanded respect, and his concern for his men won devotion. Secretly, they buried their knight within the village walls, telling the Indians that the "Child of the Sun" had ascended to his father. When the natives saw the loosened earth and whispered, the Spaniards dug up the body, weighted it in an oaken casket, and sank it in the dark bosom of the Father of Waters, as the Indians called the Mississippi.

RETURN TO CIVILIZATION

Luis De Moscoso, De Soto's appointed successor, after a futile try to reach Mexico through what is now Texas, led the tired band again to the Mississippi, where they spent the winter building seven little ships. Before the fleet sailed downstream on July 2, 1543, most of the remaining 50 horses, which had been used in battle, were slaughtered for meat.

Running a gauntlet of arrows, the ships found the gulf 19 days later. On September 10 some 300 Spaniards and 100 Indians reached Mexico Pánuco River. There, haggard and worn, they found a warm welcome.

That fall, a ship took the news of De Soto's death to Doña Isabel.

FLORIDA AND THE SPANISH EMPIRE

Heartbreak and hardship failed to destroy the golden myth of Florida. Moscoso and his tattered comrades, safe once more, painted glowing pictures of the north country. Around the Caribbean, however, Spain had precious metals, and docile natives, so North American furs and forests held little attraction. Florida was merely a dangerous coast on the treasure fleet route. After the martyrdom of Fray Luis Cancer by the Indians, and the unsuccessful colonies of Luna and Villafañe, the Crown prohibited Florida projects.

Then, in 1564, the French Colony at Fort Caroline, on Florida's St. John River, threatened the treasure fleets. The founding of St. Augustine was Spain's inevitable answer.

LINCOLNESQUE PRINCIPLE TO MEET SPACE AGE CHALLENGES

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, today we observe the Lincoln Sesquicentennial—the 150th anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln.

As we pay homage to our 16th President—emancipator, humanitarian, statesman, and humble soul—we find that to a large degree his principles and forward-looking philosophy have stood the true tests of time; they are as workable today as in the mid-19th century.

As the world stands on the threshold of a new era in a jet-missile-nuclear-space age, we cannot now—of all times—be chained, as Lincoln expressed it, to outworn, outmoded dogmas, ideas, and principles of the past Rather, we must be realistically dedicated to the needs of the present and the future, to the "unfinished tasks remaining before us."

Although the hands of the clock of time—150 years after his birth—point to new challenges, we, like Lincoln, face complex problems in many fields. These include recognition of human rights, improvement of economic status of people, maintaining respect for law, promotion of peace, and others.

The observance of the 150th anniversary of Lincoln's birth, by a joint session, is, indeed, a fitting tribute to that great American. The record written indelibly in our pages of history by the Great Emancipator has lived long beyond his untimely death. Indeed, these Halls of Congress, as well as the Nation itself, will—as long as they exist—be influenced by his spirit.

Too, I believe it is particularly fitting that, among others who will pay homage to Lincoln, Carl Sandburg—poet, philosopher, writer—has been invited to address the joint session of Congress.

Mr. Sandburg, winner of the Pulitzer Prize and other numerous awards, represents in his way—as did Lincoln in his day—the image of the thinker.

In the space age, we find all around us the physical symbols of scientific, technological, military, industrial, and other mechanical and materialistic achievements. The marks of materialistic achievement are, indeed, real blessings for which we should be prayerfully grateful.

In our progress, however, let us not forget that it is the thinker, the poet, the sage who helps us find our way in what sometimes seems to be a wilderness, who more clearly defines real and human values, and who aids in better understanding human relationships—the foundation upon which peace, good will, tolerance, and an atmosphere of freedom can best be established.

Particularly in his interpretation of the life of Lincoln, Carl Sandburg has made an important contribution to American thought. I request unanimous consent to have a recent statement on what I feel is the adequacy of Lincoln's principles for meeting the space age challenges printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

Seven score and 10 years ago, the great, humble Abraham Lincoln's birth heralded for our beloved Nation a new concept of humanitarian statesmanship. In his lifetime, Lincoln attained a philosophy of thought and action that has remained timeless.

As a fine illustration of this outlook, I quote the following: "The dogmas of the quiet past are inadequate to the stormy present. * * * As our case is new, so must we think anew, and act anew."

Today, we stand at a new frontier of outer space. In coping with the complex problems involved, we face the need of thinking anew, of broadening our concepts, of reaching out creatively through science and technology to unveil the mysteries of outer space.

In our observance of Lincoln's Birthday, the magnitude of space-age problems should not, however, obscure the need for emulating the humanitarian attributes of the Great Emancipator. For today, we too face the challenge of emancipating mankind—from ignorance, fear, poverty, malnutrition, illiteracy.

In the mid-19th century, Lincoln fought to preserve a divided Nation.

In the mid-20th century, we strive to preserve peace in a divided world—part slave to communism, part free. The souls of mankind can never rest quietly until the more than 1 billion people bound with the chains of Communist enslavement gain freedom.

Across the Nation, sesquicentennial (1809–1959) celebrations of Lincoln's Birthday will have their greatest meaning if we, like Lincoln, become rededicated to the "unfinished tasks remaining before us."

What are these tasks?

The most significant, I believe, include maintaining world peace, achieving economic stability and halting inflation, and, above all, preserving our free way of life—of, by, and for our people. The attainment of these goals will help to keep alive the hope in the hearts of men everywhere. To assure that freedom, as well as peace and respect for human dignity "shall not perish from the earth"; but that, for all mankind, these will one day be a reality—not just a dream.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I wish to quote from Carl Sandburg's volume, "The Prairie Years," which gives a very interesting sidelight on the thinking of Lincoln. I had occasion to use these quotations the other day in addressing a group. I can suggest no better reading on this day than the following quotations:

Mrs. Rankin was a friend of the preacher, Peter Cartwright, who ran for Congress against Lincoln; in her house Cartwright was called Uncle Peter. And she had heard that Cartwright claimed Lincoln was no Christian. Yet Lincoln was also a friend of the family. At her house he had borrowed books; there they had reached out kindly hands when he was groping and trying to pierce the silence into which Ann Rutledge had faded. So one evening Mrs. Rankin told him she knew the Cartwright charges against him were false; and yet—there was the question of what his religion really was.

The raising of the question made Lincoln restless: he stood up, crossed the room, rested an elbow on the fireplace mantel, and ran his hand through his hair. He said slowly that he could not discuss the character and religion of Jesus Christ in stump speeches, "That is no place for it."

He mentioned shadows and questionings that came to him at New Salem. "There came into my life sad events and a loss that you were close to; and you knew a great deal about how hard they were for me, for you were, at the time, a mutual friend. Those days of trouble found me tossed amid a sea of questionings. They piled big around me. Through all I groped my way until I found a stronger and higher grasp of thought, one that reached beyond this life with a clearness and satisfaction I had never known before. The Scriptures unfolded before me with a deeper and more logical appeal, through these new experiences, than anything else I could find to turn to, or ever before had found in them. I do not claim that all my doubts were removed then, or since that time have been swept away. They are not.

"Probably it is to be my lot to go on in a twilight, feeling and reasoning my way through life, as questioning, doubting Thomas did. But in my poor, maimed, withered way, I bear with me as I go on a seeking spirit of desire for a faith that was with him of the olden time, who, in his need, as I in mine, exclaimed, 'Help thou my unbelief'."

He had by now slowed down from his first restless feeling; he left the fireplace and took his chair again. "I do not see that I am more astray—though perhaps in a different direction—than many others whose points of view differ widely from each other in the sectarian denominations. They all claim to be Christians, and interpret their several creeds as infallible ones. I doubt the possibility, or propriety, of settling the religion of Jesus Christ in the models of man-made creeds and dogmas.

"It was a spirit in the life that He laid stress on and taught if I read aright. I know I see it to be so with me. The fundamental truths reported in the four Gospels as from the lips of Jesus Christ, and that I first heard from the lips of my mother, are settled and fixed moral precepts with me. I have concluded to dismiss from my mind the debatable wrangels that once perplexed me with distractions that stirred up, but never absolutely settled anything. I have tossed them aside with the doubtful differences which divide denominations. I have ceased to follow such discussions or be interested in them. I cannot without mental reservations assent to long and complicated creeds and catechisms.

"If the church would ask simply for assent to the Savior's statement of the substance of the law: 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and thy neighbor as thyself,'—that church would I gladly unite with."

That was the way Mrs. Rankin remembered Lincoln talking about his religion that evening. She was sure that if she didn't remember all his words exactly as he spoke them she did get his thought clear, because he spoke his words in a slow manner and meant his words to be so clear that his thoughts would be remembered afterward.

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE

Mr. DIRKSEN and Mr. ROBERTSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield first to the minority leader, and then to the Senator from Virginia. If agreeable to the Senate, I should like to suggest the absence of a quorum. Senators will have all day to insert matters in the RECORD and transact routine business.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks a brief statement on Ukrainian independence.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is a source of satisfaction to be able on this anniversary occasion to say something in behalf of the Ukrainian people both abroad and at home.

In their native land they have demonstrated a robustness of spirit and a fidelity to freedom under tribulation and persecution which marks them as a great people in whom the spiritual and moral values stand out like a blazing light.

In the city of Chicago there are an estimated 45,000 Ukrainians or more and it has been my privilege to know them and their leaders and the high principle which activates them. They are solid, rugged, law abiding and epitomize the feelings of the 40 million in their ancestral land who must carry on under the Red banner until relief from this intolerable condition is afforded.

One great attribute which constantly stands out in my mind is the way in which they shoulder their own burdens without looking to governmental agencies for assistance. One need but journey to Chicago and note the schools they have built for their children out of their own resources and how proud they are of this achievement to note the rugged individualism which is a hallmark of their efforts.

Still another outstanding attribute is the constancy of their faith and their devotion to the church. Here they find inspiration and assurance. It fortifies the spirit to overcome all obstacles and to cheerfully meet every burden.

Another experience that stands out in my mind is the Ukrainian outdoor picnic which I was privileged to attend several years ago when nearly 25,000 of their people gathered in a park in Chicago for an anniversary celebration. As I looked into their intent faces, I wondered what I could say that would strike home. I thought of blue skies over endless yellow wheat fields in their ancestral home and how appropriate the blue and yellow flag really was. It made an appropriate theme on which to spin some observations, and I noticed how deeply this reminder struck, for there were tears on many faces that afternoon. These were not tears that were particularly responsive to any words of mine but rather to the remembrances of their own people who were still denied the benefits of freedom. We can be thankful for this leaven in our own population because the durability of their devotion to freedom's cause will be a constant reminder to us of how priceless this boon of liberty really is.

They deserve the fullest encouragement as they carry on in this spirt until that day when an equal degree of liberty and independence shall be restored to the Ukrainian people in the Soviet Union.

INTEGRATION IN SCHOOLS

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Conformity by Coercion," written by David Lawrence, and published in the U.S. News & World Report of July 6, 1956. The editorial is even more pertinent today than it was when it was published 2½ years ago. It is in full conformity with the views of that great statesman, Abraham Lincoln, whose anniversary we are today celebrating.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONFORMITY BY COERCION?

(By David Lawrence)

I

It is necessary to come to grips with the issue of enforced integration in the Nation's schools. It is a legal issue, a moral issue, a sociological issue, and a political issue.

Yet all these diverse approaches only accentuate the real question—conformity or nonconformity in organized society. It is an issue that for generations has confronted mankind.

The perennial conflict fundamentally is between theoretical equality and actual equality.

Government usually is concerned with theoretical equality. But too often, in the passion for uniformity, obstacles arise to the practical application of the law. Sooner or later revision is found necessary. An adjustment to realistic conditions becomes inevitable.

Obedience to law is a precept with which few will disagree, but disrespect for a law written by agents of the people in contradiction to the real will of the people leads to disobedience, disregard, or repeal.

Conformity itself is a dangerous dogma when dependent solely on coercion. It is a device by which freedom often has been destroyed and totalitarianism substituted. Conformity of thought imposed by law is the tool of despots.

Conformity means that everybody must think alike, act alike, and obey the edicts of a central authority.

Our Constitution was built upon the fundamental principle that government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed.

Realizing that our Republic was founded by groups with conflicting interests, often widely separated by big distances, our forefathers conceived the idea of separate States. Each State was to be sovereign—endowed with the right to govern itself within its own area. Only in the case of infringement upon other States was the national authority to be invoked.

The Founding Fathers, to be sure, realized that they could not apply a rule of conformity over the people of a vast territory. So they delegated to the several States the right to deal with their own sociological problems. This is why education, for example, has always been a local problem. It is also one of the reasons why the maintenance of law and order has been primarily a State and city responsibility.

Conformity cannot be successfully compelled where the customs and morals of the people are in conflict with statutory law. It has often been truly said that government cannot legislate morals.

Perhaps the best demonstration of this in recent years was the experience of the Nation with the 18th amendment. For decades there had been attempts to solve the prohibition problem. Many States had passed dry laws. Congress tried to regulate the liquor traffic across State lines. The Federal courts, while upholding the interstate aspects, were careful to refrain from imposing upon each individual State an obligation to conform to a moral code which specified that people must not drink intoxicating liquors.

When the 18th amendment, however, was ratified in 1920 as a part of the Constitution, the entire Nation was asked to conform to a formula which forbade the manufacture and sale of intoxicating beverages anywhere in the United States. This meant that the will of a State was superseded entirely by national law.

What was the result? The effort to produce conformity failed. This was because the evils which came in the wake of the 18th amendment proved to be far greater than the evils which the amendment sought to correct. Disobedience of law became widespread.

Bootlegging, which began to thrive immediately after the amendment was adopted, brought in its wake vice and crime and organized gangs. Some of these gangs which had their origin at that time have not been entirely eradicated from our communities to this day.

It will be recalled that, while the 18th amendment was a part of the Constitution for nearly 14 years, it took less than 10 months during the year 1933 to get it repealed by the States after Congress submitted it to them.

This did not happen because public thinking on the use of intoxicating beverages had actually undergone any substantial change. Many people continue to think that the sale of intoxicating beverages was harmful to the community and that the manufacture of such products should be prohibited. Several States still have prohibition laws, varying according to local conditions. But the Nation voted for repeal because of a general condition—the American people found that, despite vigorous efforts to enforce the law, the illicit manufacture and distribution of liquor had intensified.

Historical experience should have taught us that there is a distinct difference between the theory of equal rights and the conditions sometimes provoked by the application of laws which go counter to public sentiment in a community.

But, while we profess to believe in the right of a community to govern itself, do we always apply the doctrine in practice? We have tried in America to give city and State communities the right to govern themselves. Yet we interpose a Federal authority sometimes and virtually disregard local self-government. Thus we impair a great principle—the right of self-government.

We have, for example, said in effect that, because the people in the northern, eastern, and western parts of the United States constitute a numerical majority their will must prevail over the people in southern communities.

What we are attempting to do today in America is to compel the minority in the South to conform to the supposed will of the majority in the North. Do we aim thereby to wipe out State autonomy altogether?

There are basic rules to which both minorities and majorities will give their support. Thus, individual rights of association—the practice of religion, the right to educate children in accordance with local custom or tradition, and the right of the minority, even though living in the same community with the majority, to pursue its own racial or religious customs—have all been recognized as just principles in organized society.

The theory of equal rights means that there can be no denial of any public rights to citizens. Thus, the right to vote is a public right. The right to hold office is a public right. The right to own property is a public right. The right to obtain an education in a city or county school is a public right.

There are, to be sure, certain public utilities, such as conveyances, and certain public facilities where rules of limitation should not be imposed by the majority which would put the minority at a physical disadvantage.

But this is a far cry from requiring that each community must compel conformity in the educational process.

If education were entirely an impersonal affair and there were no social life at all in the schools, we would be dealing with a different problem.

But majority as well as minority groups have an equal right to freedom of association or nonassociation. Voluntarism is the key.

If one individual, for example, does the same work as another, he is entitled to equal pay, irrespective of race or creed or color. In some occupations where majorities object to working alongside of minorities, a problem of adjustment presents itself which in many instances can be solved by patience and some physical rearrangement of locker rooms and personal facilities so as to remove barriers to employment.

But attempts to impose conformity by coercion, whether in the legal or economic or social sphere, usually produce conditions not unlike those which followed the attempt to enforce the 18th amendment.

We already hear zealous extremists advocating that troops be sent to enforce the Constitution and compel the South to integrate its public schools.

It is not a problem that will ever be settled by bayonets. Nor will it be settled by exhorting people to forget prejudices bred in them.

II. AN ERA OF FRICTION

We have recently seen evidences of anger and violence in the North and South. We have also witnessed the use of retaliatory measures in communities in the South where the most amicable relations previously had prevailed between the races in the South. Voluntarism had made progress. Talk of coercion now retards progress.

It is an illusion to suppose that, under the threat of law enforcement, these difficulties are going to lessen with the passage of time. For social customs and social life do not function by any rule of conformity. They are bound to continue in the diversity that human nature has provided.

There will inevitably be passive resistance to laws of enforced integration. The public-school systems of the South may even disintegrate so that education in that region may lag behind the rest of the country. It would be a tragic price to pay. But men of determination have been known to pay almost any price for what they consider to be the preservation of their inalienable rights. Prejudice cannot be legislated out of existence by law.

A compromise formula—segregation through equal but separate facilities of education—was first sanctioned in a Northern State. It was upheld by the Supreme Court of the State of Massachusetts in 1849.

For 30 years after the War Between the States, the Supreme Court of the United States wrestled with legal issues growing out of racial conflict and in 1896 ruled that systems of equal facilities even though separate were constitutional. This permitted minorities to live alongside majorities in harmony.

Now, however, 60 years later, the Supreme Court of the United States, having reversed itself, is attempting to impose conformity. It should be noted that the Court in its decision in 1954, did not say the separate educational facilities previously provided had been unequal—indeed, they have at times been even superior for the Negro. The Court took the position that although the facilities were equal they could not be permitted to be separate. Reliance was placed on sociological reasons—not legal precedents. The basic argument accepted was that a psychological impact of an adverse nature had occurred—that Negro children felt themselves inferior wherever segregation was legalized. It was the act of discrimination itself which the Court held to be illegal.

Now, as a consequence, however, a counter-conflict on the sociological front has arisen. White parents in the South are arguing that the impact of integration will prove harmful to their children. Will the Court now give equal weight to this plea, or tell the white parents to send their children to private schools, which so many citizens cannot afford?

III. SOCIAL RELATIONSHIPS

So we are back again in the realm of the sociological—how can we get majorities and minorities to live harmoniously in the same community?

But it will be asked whether the right to attend a public school does not include the right to attend any public school. The right of assignment of pupils is a local—not a national—function. Even today, the most ardent exponent of equal rights would not deny that it is within the power of the State to set up schools in which there is segregation by reason of sex—all girls in one school and all boys in another school, irrespective of color.

If, for sociological reasons, it is deemed desirable to separate the sexes in the schools, there would be no constitutional barrier against this even though one State chooses to adopt the plan and another State does not. For we usually recognize as absolute the right of each State community to regulate its social life provided there is no denial to anyone of the right to public education itself. The States can, moreover, if they wish, subsidize private schools—provided they do not discriminate as between individuals in allocating funds.

The question before the country today is whether communities are free to adjust their school systems to meet their own local conditions and local sentiment. Those States which desire to integrate their schools ought to have the sovereign right to do so and those which desire to operate mixed schools in some counties and separate their schools in other counties, either by color, or by sex, or by intelligence tests, should have the same sovereign right.

It is argued, on the other hand, that, since the public schools are tax supported and because tax receipts come from all citizens, all public schools must be opened to all citizens. But the same point—equality of participation—could be made with respect to admission to church organizations, private clubs, and private schools. They, too, are supported by all taxpayers because an exemption from State and Federal income taxes is given them as non-profit-making institutions.

Theoretically, wherever the Government confers its favors, there rests authority to regulate—to withdraw those favors unless the regulation which imposes conformity is accepted. Today the President's Commission on Interracial Discrimination has adopted this principle as the genesis of its power. The Executive order under which the Commission functions provides that whosoever benefits from any Government contract must conform to its requirements against discrimination in employment if based on race, creed, color, or national origin.

The central issue in the school question, however, is one of social relationships. Rooted in the minds of many people in the South is a fear that personal associations begun in the elementary schools will lead to a state of mind among youth that will bring more intermarriage of races.

If intermarriage became widespread, it seems certain that communities would insist upon some other way of preventing them—either by ostracism or by curtailing economic opportunities in the community to those who deviate from custom.

If there were only a few intermarriages in a given State, they probably would not attract much attention. But once they became numerous, the local communities would frown upon them. Public sentiment sometimes is stronger than law in bringing about a reform or change which the law itself could never impose.

What are the limits of conformity? Conformity in theory is justified, especially when the entire national interest is involved—in times of national peril. Thus, in theory, we are not supposed to recognize any distinctions when it comes to military service. But actually we do discriminate here, too. Even the conscientious objector is allowed to refrain from participation in active combat. Able-bodied women are not compelled to fight in the front lines though women have equal rights of citizenship. Equality has its exceptions.

At most it must be said that the problem is not going to be solved if there is a failure to analyze studiously the viewpoints of the opposing groups. It is a situation that ultimately will have to bow to the enlightened principle that majorities and minorities each have a right to regulate their own lives and their own customs.

Thus, treaties signed at the end of World War I established an obligation upon some of the new governments in central Europe to allocate public funds for educational, religious and charitable purposes to racial, religious, or linguistic minorities within their borders. The League of Nations was given the task of guaranteeing the observance of these minority rights.

The more we examine the formulas that have been developed throughout the world to permit minorities to get along with majorities, the more we will find that adjustments precisely of this nature have been conducive to conditions of harmonious living.

IV. IS THE 14TH AMENDMENT VALID?

We hear the argument, "But it's the law of the land." There is a grave question whether the 14th amendment, under which integration is ordered, was ever legally submitted to the States and legally ratified. The specific point has never been passed upon by the Supreme Court, though the public has taken it for granted for years that the 14th amendment is an integral part of the Constitution.

What are the facts? It is necessary as an initial step for any amendment to the Constitution to be passed by a two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress. Yet, in June 1866, when the 14th amendment was voted upon in Congress, each House had excluded all persons appearing with credentials in the first instance as Senators or Representatives from the 10 Southern States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas. If these Southern States had been permitted to vote in Congress, the amendment would not have passed.

Then, when the amendment was submitted to the legislatures of the several States, it needed to be ratified by 28 States, which was three-fourths of the 37 States then in the Union. Ten States, therefore, were able to block ratification.

But the 14th amendment was never ratified by California, and was rejected at the time by Kentucky, Delaware, and Maryland. It was rejected during the latter part of 1866 and the early part of 1867 also by the legislatures of the 10 Southern States. For the 14th amendment had in it many objectionable clauses. Apart from its provision requiring States to guarantee "equal protection of the laws," the amendment sought to punish former Confederate soldiers by forbidding them to hold office even in their own States unless Congress by a two-thirds vote removed the disability.

It was argued, moreover, in those days that the State governments in the South were not legal governments but were merely rebel States. Yet these States at the time had already received Presidential recognition, and when the same Southern legislatures in 1865 had ratified the 13th amendment—which abolished slavery—their action was accepted as legal by the Secretary of State. For the South had, by its vote, made possible the three-fourths vote of the States necessary for the adoption of the 13th amendment.

Furthermore, in the Reconstruction Act of 1867 Congress arrogantly proclaimed that self-rule would be restored to the States and they would be permitted representation in Congress once more only when they adopted the 14th amendment. It was so stipulated in the law which had been passed over the veto of President Andrew Johnson. He emphasized its injustices and unconstitutional aspects, and denounced it as "a bill of attainder against 9 million people."

Here is what Senator Doolittle, of Wisconsin, a conservative Republican of the North, said about the proposal on the floor of the Senate:

"My friend has said what has been said all around me, what is said every day: the people of the South have rejected the constitutional amendment, and therefore we will march upon them and force them to adopt it at the point of the bayonet, and establish military power over them until they do adopt it."

This was a flagrant case of conformity by coercion. The act of Congress was a direct violation of the letter of the Constitution. For Congress has no power to coerce the States when they pass upon the question of whether or not they will ratify or reject proposed constitutional amendments.

Puppet governments established in the Southern States did finally ratify the 14th amendment in 1868 but only under duress—with registration of voters being supervised by military commanders from the North and with millions of white voters deliberately disenfranchised by the Reconstruction Act because they had fought in the war against the Union. Ohio and New Jersey attempted unsuccessfully that same year to withdraw their acts of ratification before the Secretary of State formally proclaimed the amendment as adopted. Doubt was expressed at the time by the President as to the validity of the alleged ratification.

Can it be said that all this action was in accord with the spirit of American fairplay? Will this record stand up as constitutional—as the "consent of the governed"? Would we say today that the people in any place under military occupation are able freely to exercise their sovereign rights? The Reconstruction Act for many years deprived the Southern States of their powers of governmental autonomy. They recovered these powers only after a long and tragic era of military compulsion.

Should not the Supreme Court today reexamine the validity of the 14th amendment? If an important decision of 1896 can be reopened and reversed by the Supreme Court in 1954, is it not logical to resurvey the doubtful procedure whereby the 14th amendment itself was forced into the Constitution? The present Court has shown itself quite solicitous lately that persons in our midst charged with disloyalty be given the protection of due process. Cases involving Communists have, on the slightest pretext of technicality, been ordered for retrial. Can't we give the same consideration to the States which have demonstrated their loyalty to the Union?

If it were presented anew today, there would not be a two-thirds vote of both Houses of Congress to approve the 14th amendment unless a specific reservation were made on the points now at issue.

The reason is clear. More than a third of the membership of both Houses at present feel that the 14th amendment was itself amended by the Supreme Court in 1954 and that, as long as this new legislative action by the Court stands as the official interpretation, it makes the original language of the 14th amendment inadequate.

V. THE PHILOSOPHICAL APPROACH

What do the philosophers of history say about conformity?

George Santayana in "Dominations and Powers" (1951)—a work sometimes referred to as comparable to Plato's "Republic" or to the "Ethics" of Aristotle—makes this pertinent comment:

"This ideal of a perfect ultimate democracy rests on two assumptions: that human nature in all men is essentially similar, and that consequently mankind could not fully develop its vital liberty without coming to a unanimous vision of the world and a cooperative exercise of the same virtues. I think this is a biological error, and that what is identical in all life is only its germ, from which all plants and animals have developed centrifugally, as circumstances have allowed them to develop. * * *

"The uniformity in American principles, as proclaimed publicly and as genuinely felt by most people, is no index to a natural unity in the vital forces at work among them. The proof appears if we consider a notorious fact: the Constitution of the United States, since the Civil War, establishes the equality of all citizens, irrespective 'of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.' And this is not merely a constitutional sham, like so many of the provisions in paper constitutions in other countries. It expresses an earnest conviction, dearly defended, by a great part of the people.

"Nevertheless whenever a difference of race, color, religion, or breeding is not so overcome in the rush of common work or duty as to pass unnoticed or even unknown, if an attempt is made to ignore it in comradeship, society, marriage, or place of residence, the real difference in the soul is instantly recognized and an irresistible impulse causes the groups to segregate.

"This is set down by democratic doctrinaires to prejudice or snobbery. They do not perceive that contrast of character and taste can be ignored when people are engaged in some instrumental action, to which their moral diversity is irrelevant, but that as soon as the labor is over and the liberal life of play, art, affection, and worship begins, both sides equally require moral comprehension and are equally chilled, bored, and rendered sterile when comprehension is absent.

"That a white man ought to hobnob with a Negro because otherwise he would not be Christian or unselfish involves a flagrant assumption of superiority. The Negro, if he is not a fool, loves his own inspirations and expands in the society of his own people. Vital liberty differentiates. Only vacant freedom leaves all in the same anonymous crowd."

G. K. Chesterton, in his famous work, "Orthodox," wrote in 1908:

"In modern ideal conceptions of society there are some desires that are possibly not attainable, but there are some desires that are not desirable. That all men should live in equally beautiful houses is a dream that may or may not be attained. But that all men should live in the same beautiful house is not a dream at all; it is a nightmare."

Alexis de Tocqueville, of France, a renowned philosopher, who visited America in the 1830's and compared it with the systems of government in vogue from ancient days, expressed himself vehemently on the subject of tyrannical majorities—the effort by law to impose upon the minority certain customs and rules that did not have universal sanction.

Yet De Tocqueville was hopeful about America's future, little realizing the grave conflicts that were to come in later years because of the abuse of the very principles about which he wrote in 1835:

"But in the United States, the majority, which so frequently displays the tastes and the propensities of a despot, is still destitute of the most perfect instrument of tyranny.

"In the American Republics the Central Government has never as yet busied itself except with a small number of objects sufficiently prominent to attract its attention. The secondary affairs of society have never been regulated by its authority, and nothing has hitherto betrayed its desire of even interfering in them.

"The majority has become more and more absolute, but has not increased the prerogatives of the Central Government; those great prerogatives have been confined to a certain sphere and although the despotism of the majority may be galling upon one point, it can not be said to extend to all. However, the predominant party in the Nation may be carried away by its passions, however ardent it may be in the pursuit of its projects, it cannot oblige all the citizens to comply with its desires in the same manner and at the same time throughout the country.

"When the Central Government which represents that majority has issued a decree, it must entrust the execution of its will to agents over whom it frequently has no control and whom it cannot perpetually direct.

"If an oppressive law were passed, liberty would still be protected by the mode of executing that law; the majority cannot descend to the details and what may be called the puerilities of administrative tyranny. It does not even imagine that it can do so, for it has not a full consciousness of its authority."

Perhaps it is in recognition of these very difficulties that Robert Morrison MacIver, whose name means as much to modern sociology as does that of John Dewey to philosophy, gives some pointed advice in his book, "The More Perfect Union." He offers a program for the control of intergroup discrimination. It is definitely sympathetic to integration. Yet he gives this word of caution:

"Discrimination and its evils are likely to be exacerbated by any changes that increase tensions or promote crises in a society, no matter what their source, whether economic, political, ideological, or any other. On the other hand discrimination is likely to be diminished by any changes that make for the general well-being of a society or that provide more constructive outlets for the aggressive tendencies of its groups."

VI. LINCOLN ON SOCIAL EQUALITY

It is sometimes asserted, though mistakenly, that, once the Supreme Court has ruled upon a subject, there is no appeal—not even to public opinion. Lincoln didn't think so. He denounced the Supreme Court for its decision in the Dred Scott case. He was outspoken against social equality.

When Lincoln argued against slavery he pointed to the impairment of personal freedom within the community—the individual had been deprived of his liberty—the right to make his own life. But Lincoln said this did not mean enforced association between the races. Debating in Illinois with Stephen Douglas, in September 1858, Lincoln said:

"I will say then that I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of bringing about in any way the social and political equality of the white and black races—that I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of making voters or jurors of Negroes, nor of qualifying them to hold office, nor to intermarry with white people; and I will say in addition to this that there is a physical difference between the white and black races which, I believe, will forever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality. And inasmuch as they cannot so live, while they do remain together there must be the position of superior and inferior, and I as much as any other man am in favor of having the superior position assigned to the white race."

But it is insisted: "The Supreme Court has spoken." De Tocqueville's eloquent answer may be applied to the issue today. He wrote:

"When I refuse to obey an unjust law, I do not contest the right of the majority to command, but I simply appeal from the sovereignty of the people to the sovereignty of mankind. Some have not feared to assert that a people can never outstep the boundaries of justice and reason in those affairs which are peculiarly its own; and that consequently full power may be given to the majority by which it is represented. But this is the language of a slave.

"A majority taken collectively is only an individual, whose opinions, and frequently whose interests, are opposed to those of another individual, who is styled a minority. If it be admitted that a man possessing absolute power may misuse that power by wronging his adversaries, why should not a majority be liable to the same reproach? Men do not change their characters by uniting with one another; nor does their patience in the presence of obstacles increase with their strength. * * *

"When an individual or a party is wronged in the United States, to whom can he apply for redress? If to public opinion, public opinion constitutes the majority; if to the legislature, it represents the majority and implicitly obeys it; if to the executive power, it is appointed by the majority and serves as a passive tool in its hands. The public force consists of the majority under arms; the jury is the majority invested with the right of hearing judicial cases; and in certain States even the judges are elected by the majority. However iniquitous or absurd the measure of which you complain, you must submit to it as well as you can."

VII. JEFFERSON ON JUDICIAL TYRANNY

Thomas Jefferson warned against the tyranny of judges. He wrote in 1804:

"But the opinion which gives to the judges the right to decide what laws are constitutional, and what not, not only for themselves in their own sphere of action, but for the legislature and executive also, in their spheres, would make the judiciary a despotic branch."

Then, long after Jefferson left the Presidency, he wrote in 1820 and 1821:

"It is a misnomer to call a government republican, in which a branch of the supreme power is independent of the Nation. * * *

"A judiciary independent of a king or executive alone, is a good thing; but independence of the will of the nation is a solecism, at least in a republican government. * * *

"To consider the judges as the ultimate arbiters of all constitutional questions (is) a very dangerous doctrine indeed, and one which would place us under the despotism of an oligarchy. * * * The Constitution has erected no such single tribunal. * * *

"The great object of my fear is the Federal judiciary. That body, like gravity, ever acting, with noiseless foot, and unalarming advance * * * is engulfing insidiously the special governments into the jaws of that which feeds them."

How much this is like the doctrines of Thomas Hobbes. In his famous work, "Leviathan," he wrote in 1651:

"Princes succeed one another; and one judge passeth, another cometh; nay, heaven and earth shall pass; but not one tittle of the law of Nature shall pass, for it is the eternal law of God. Therefore all the sentences of precedent judges that have ever been cannot altogether make a law contrary to natural equity."

A modern writer—Walter Lippmann—in his book, "The Public Philosophy" (1955), says:

"There is a hiatus between the highest wisdom and the actual perplexities with which men must deal. An encyclopedia of all that the prophets and the philosophers have taught will not tell a man clearly and definitely how to make laws, how to govern a State, how to educate his children—how, in fact, to decide the problems that the priest encounters in the confessional, the doctor with his patients, the lawyer with his clients, the judge with the litigants, the man of affairs in his business."

VIII. FACING THE REAL ISSUE

Many people today are urging caution with respect to the integration problem—an approach that has come to be known as "gradualism." Its fallacy lies in the belief that what cannot be resolved now will be resolved by postponement. It assumes that equality is a natural right in the community and that all forms of discrimination can be abolished by the passage of time.

The fetish of conformity, however, has demoralized the life of many nations in the world through the centuries. Where minorities have been suppressed and the right to pursue their own lives and customs has been impaired, there has been discontent and, at times, eruptions of violence.

We see today in the island of Cyprus a bloody war because nobody has yet devised a plan whereby the Turkish minority can live alongside the Greek majority. We see the same tragedy in Algeria—as between the French minority and the native majority.

Self-determination does not mean the delegation of power to a tyrannical majority. It means adjustment of minorities alongside of majorities. In no other way can there be a maintenance of equity for all concerned.

Can we not in America find a way whereby majorities and minorities may get along with one another in peace? The Constitution of the United States provided for separate but not equal States. There was no provision that each State must be equal to the other in voting for President or in choosing members of the House of Representatives. Equality of representation was provided only in the Senate.

Theoretically, all men are created equal. It is a doctrine that could mean that all wealth in the community must be divided equally between all citizens. The Communists believe in such a doctrine. There have been men in America who have argued for the redistribution of wealth. Do any of us honestly believe that harmonious society can ever be achieved by a law that requires all incomes to be equal, or that the possession of property should be equalized between all citizens?

Equality is a theoretical goal. Its application will depend always on the mores of the community. Even in our day some of the loudest voices declaiming against discrimination are men who in their business and social relationships are practicing discriminations of various kinds. It is common knowledge that membership in some of the principal clubs and organizations in many of our large cities and in the fraternities in almost all of our colleges is barred to persons of certain races or religions, as the case may be. It is common knowledge also that employers in the North, for the most part, give preference to applicants of certain ethnic origins or races as against others. There is, therefore, continuously applied a doctrine of discrimination which negates the theory of equality.

One need not agree at all with the reasons given for such discriminations—indeed, one may be offended by their practice. But if we are to rely on theory, there is as much right to discrimination as there is to nondiscrimination. It is really the misguided attempt to override these separate and distinct rights of the individual by public law that causes the conflict of today.

Conformity by coercion is not liberalism. The answer is to be found in voluntarism—freedom's greatest vehicle of progress. It offers us the only solution to the vexatious problems of sociology in our Republic.

RUSSIA AS SEEN BY L. D. WEBSTER

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a distinguished Texan, Mr. L. D. Webster, vice president of public relations and advertising for the Lone Star Steel Co. in Dallas, Tex., recently returned from an extensive tour of the Soviet Union.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD his account of this tour "I Saw Russia," which gives an enlightened view of the Soviet Union as seen through the eyes of a highly respected businessman and an able journalist.

Straightforward and uncolored reporting of this kind can contribute much toward a better understanding between the United States and the Soviet Union.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I SAW RUSSIA

From the pressurized cabin of a DC–7C, pride of the Sabena Seven Seas flagships, I looked 4 miles down on a seemingly never-ending forest and tried to convince myself it was no different. Land looks much the same when viewed from 24,000 feet up. You see a general pattern, but not the height of hills nor the depth of valleys. Only to the trained observer are these things apparent.

Below me was a sweeping expanse of timberland that might have been the hills of east Texas, or the Big Thicket, or any one of a dozen other similar areas I had flown over. But it wasn't any of them and no matter how hard I tried to brush away the thought that there was something peculiarly ominous about this woody country below, I knew it was different. Down there, partially shrouded in a smoky, cloud-flecked haze was the Soviet Union, home of the Communists, Red Russia.

I had vowed that no sense of apprehension would be mine when the time came to go behind the Iron Curtain. At that very instant, I had felt no particular misgivings because it happened quickly. The big airliner had lifted easily from the Brussels airport, and for a time had flown over the North Sea to Denmark. Then the ship veered to the east and shadowed the Baltic Sea while skirting Germany and Poland. With limited visibility straight ahead, we suddenly approached a land mass. Boring straight in, one instant we were over the Baltic; the next second the Iron Curtain had opened and we had skittered through.

On Red soil

As the Baltic quickly faded away, the full impact of the situation hit me. Here I was, after weeks of preparation, beyond the Iron Curtain, over Russia, and in a short time I would set foot on the Red soil of the Moscow airport.

"Why," I asked myself, "was I here?" The question of why had been asked me dozens of times by friends after they learned I was going to Russia.

And now, in spite of the dozens of answers I had so flippantly palmed off on my friends, I found myself asking the same question.

Travel is easy

In the first place, going to Russia is almost too easy. Since 1955, the Government has made the issuance of passports for travel in Russia almost routine. You go to the Federal building, ask the district clerk for an application, fill it out, attach a check for $9, and before you know it, your passport is in hand. In the meantime, you file through your travel agent, applications for visas in the lands you wish to see. In my case, I obtained Russian and Czech visas, merely a matter of filling out an application, handing over $10 or $12, and in about a month your visas come right along and you're all set.

I went to Russia as a member of a group of industrial editors and public relations executives. The tour was sponsored by the International Council of Industrial Editors, and although approval for 30 members had been obtained, we finally wound up with only 21 brave souls who had an answer to the "Why Go to Russia?" bit that was strong enough to produce action instead of wishful thinking.

I went to Russia because I wanted to see for myself what is taking place in this strange land. I've been an avid reader on the subject, and there were many conflicting impressions. One writer brushes the whole thing off as a huge joke. Another is certain the Russkies will someday rule the world. One chides the Muscovites for their atrocious table manners, another sings the praises of their scientists. How could Paul Robeson and his gifted voice fall so completely under the spell of the Red banner, and how could a lean, lanky Texas piano player, Van Cliburn, invade Moscow and, unheralded, sweep the entire nation before him? How much of the stuff in the newspapers and magazines is State Department-inspired, and how much of the copy written behind the Iron Curtain is censored by the Russians?

I saw it

The answers to these questions I wanted to dig out for myself. These answers I wanted to bring back to my friends and say, "Here is the straight dope. I saw it with my own eyes." I wanted to spend a few hours en route at the World's Fair and to see for myself if the American exhibit is as good or as bad as our writers say it is. I wanted to see a real, flesh-and-blood Russian. I wanted to talk to hundreds of them—and I did. I wanted to talk to card-carrying members of the Communist Party. I did. I wanted to see the vaunted Russian education system. I did, from day nursery through grammar and high schools, and finally, the palatial University of Moscow. I wanted to amble over a Russian farm, to inspect a Russian factory, to talk to Russian writers and publishers, to see a Russian church. I did all of these and more.

In the fading light of an Indian summer day, the four engines of the Seven Seas flagship hummed monotonously as the miles sped by. In little more than an hour, the giant bird would glide to a halt at the Moscow airport and I would be at the end of one trail, the beginning of another that would carry me more than 5,000 miles across the land of the Communists, to the four principal cities of the Soviet Union, to small towns, on rivers, by train, by car, and by plane.

In the full realization of the opportunity ahead of me, I resolved that I would spend night and day probing and asking, searching and seeking, listening and looking for the answers to my questions. Is Russia all it's cracked up to be, or is the red paint peeling? As a sort of afterthought, I took it for granted that no one would censor my report to you.

Nobody has.

CHAPTER II. THE FACE OF MOSCOW

As the big four-engined DC7C plowed on toward Moscow I allayed my growing apprehension by recalling my initial visit with a homegrown, dyed-in-the-pink Communist. It had happened at the World's Fair in Brussels, and my first brush with a Red leader was not at all displeasing.

Arriving at the fair, our group was informed that the director general of the huge Russian exhibit would be pleased to have us stop at his office. We went directly to the suite of Mr. Mikhail Choumaiev, who was at once friendly, personable, and warmly appreciative toward our visit to his country.

Making us welcome to the exhibit, he ordered out the vodka and drank to our good health and a pleasant visit to Russia. It fell my lot to respond, and after several toasts, I handed Mr. Choumaiev one of my business cards printed in Russian. This pleased him no little, but his enthusiasm skyrocketed when I gave him a copy of Gov. Price Daniel's letter of introduction, translated and printed in Russian. From that instant on, he was at my side constantly.

The reason for his attentiveness became apparent when, as we posed for a picture, he asked, "When you return to the States would you please send me a copy of this picture? It makes my people in Moscow very happy for me to be photographed with important people." Governor Daniel's letter had turned the trick, even as it was to open many doors later on that otherwise might have remained closed.

As the plane rumbled on into the growing dusk, the first inkling of our nearness to Moscow came when the stewardess gathered up all newspapers and magazines. Then she passed a tray containing hard candies. The seat belt light flashed on, and below, the night-shrouded earth began to twinkle ever so little.

Moscow is gloomy

My first glimpse of the Russian capital was a far cry from the garish extravaganzas of dazzling white lights and multicolor neons that characterize American cities at night. Moscow was more like a sleepy midwestern town at 4 a.m., when only a scattering of street lights continue to burn, when highways and streets are shorn of the lacy ribbons of automobile headlights. Moscow looked gloomy and darkly forbidding. There was a mottled effect given off by yellowish clumps of lights which I later learned were housing projects concentrated around factories. There is no broad sweep, such as an American residential district presents. Russian housing generally doesn't consist of individual homes. Instead, hundreds of families reside in huge workers flats.

As the pilot circled for a landing I could hardly believe that we were over a city variously estimated to have a population of 6 to 8 millions. There just weren't enough lights for that many folk, and as the flagship of the Seven Seas probed the night sky nowhere could I see any set of lights that would mean an airport. Even as the engines were cut and the big bird reluctantly settled for the landing, I could see nothing that resembled a big-city airport. As the wheels touched down, at the edge of the runway could be seen the pale blue marker lights that guided our pilot.

No inspection

Going through the Moscow customs was no problem at all, nor was it to be anywhere. Not a bag was opened for inspection at any time during my trip except at New York's Idlewild. Even there inspection was casual, with the inspector evidencing little more than personal curiosity toward some of the items I brought back.

In Russia, all tourists are met at the airport by a representative of the Intourist organization, official agent of the Government. Intourist looks after hotel rooms, meals, transportation, and furnishes guides and interpreters. The Intourist agent in charge of our group was Tamara, a plump, blue-eyed, not unattractive woman of about 30. She later turned the party over to Irene, flaxen-haired bundle of energy who knew how to snap her little busy fingers and get prompt action. Irene's assistant was Galena, plumpish, methodical mother of a small daughter and wife of an engineer.

Our hotel, the Ukraine, is imposing in the grand manner. It has 25 stories, consisting of a center tower crested by a neon red star, with smaller towers on the 2 front corners. It covers something more than a city block, and has half a dozen dining rooms. The lobby is remarkably plain for marble construction but the lofty dome in the lobby provides a breathtaking mural (they are in practically all Russian buildings of any size) depicting Soviet progress. Here, as almost everywhere else, gaudy brass and glass chandeliers look very elegant but provide miserable light.

Rooms at the Ukraine would drive an American hotel man out of his mind. On each floor is a spacious lounge (never used). My single quarters consisted of the following: entrance foyer with closets, the whole being as large as some American rooms I've occupied; parlor, with radio, television, desk, several chairs, a sofa, and table with cut-glass water pitcher and glasses; bedroom with twin beds, each having two 3-foot-square pillows, organdie spreads, gold velvet drapes, night stands, and dressing table; bathroom with outer closet space, the bath having a king-sized tub with shower but no curtain.

Crazy-quilt floors

The Russians have a peculiar idea about floor construction. They use pieces of hardwood measuring 15 inches by 2 inches. These are laid in all sorts of patterns, with the joints being rough. The floors are virtually unfinished (I actually stuck a splinter in a toe) with no paint, no wax, no polish. Tile floors in the bath were roughly installed, and I got the idea that even though the Ukraine was less than 2 years old, much of the material might easily have been salvaged from war-torn areas.

The Ukraine, despite its castlelike exterior and its newness, looked to be 25 years old. This is true of all Russian construction: The front side is frilled up like a museum, the inside is thrown together in a haphazard fashion with only certain items, such as chandeliers and drapes, being used to carry out the theme of grandeur.

Moscow is a sprawling city that covers about 125 square miles. Its principal streets are unusually wide, and for the most part are cobblestones. Its sidewalks are mosaic patterns accomplished with varicolored marble or granite pieces about 2 inches square. Streets and sidewalks in all of the cities I visited—Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, Kharkov, and Prague—were monotonously the same.

The face of Moscow is tired, dirty, bedraggled, and when too many faces are jammed into too little space, the odor becomes distressingly repulsive. In the streets you see old women carefully sweeping with brooms made of a handful of twigs tied to a long stick, yet if you sidle through an archway into the inevitable courtyard back of the buildings the scene is one of dirt, filth, and complete confusion.

CHAPTER III. PAWNS OF TYRANNY

How does a street in Moscow—or any other Russian city—look in the broad, general view? Well, let's take a typical block in Dallas and by the weirdest application of imagination, try to convert it into a Russian block.

Take Dallas' Main Street, for instance, extending from Akard to Ervay. Here are buildings ranging from two or three stories to skyscrapers. Russian style, this street would be about four times as broad. It would have a set of rattling streetcars, and also buses, quite similar to ours. The street-level doors would open into shops, such as a bakery, a bookstore, a meat market (no refrigeration), a clothing store, a drugstore, etc. These stores would be relatively small, and in the cases of the food shops, probably would have lines of customers extending out the door and onto the sidewalk.

Above all these stores would be the flats of workers. On the sidewalks would be vendors operating from rather crude wooden booths. One would be selling watermelons, another squash, another ice cream, another books, and at the curbside would be a peddler of lottery tickets, the prize being perhaps an automobile, or a motor scooter.

Cars copied

At the corners of our model block would be a state policeman, smartly clad in blue uniform with red trim. He would be wearing typical black Russian boots, and would be handling his black and white nightstick in precise, well-defined instructions to traffic. Occasionally a large black car would speed by. This would be a Zis or a Zim (copied exactly, except for the nameplate, from our Buick or Packard of 6 or 8 years back). More often, trucks would whizz by. These would be exact replicas of a Chevrolet for the lighter models, an International for medium weight, or a Mack for the big jobs.

In Moscow, driving is the wackiest business you ever saw. There are no speed limits and a pedestrian crosses a street at his own risk. I actually saw drivers skimming along at 60 miles an hour make passes at pedestrians who were a little tardy in scampering to the safety of the sidewalk. And there was no warning because it is illegal to honk a horn in Moscow except in extreme emergencies. I heard a horn—just a tap in each case—only twice. It is also illegal to operate a car on the streets of Moscow if it is dirty, so you see drivers wiping and polishing between trips. At night, cars operate with only their parking lights on, and it is common practice to do a lot of coasting. Drivers say it is more economical to whip up a speed of 60 miles an hour, cut the engine, step on the clutch and coast almost to a stop. Then they turn the key, let out the clutch and give 'er the gas to get back up to 60 again so they can coast some more. Automatic transmissions are unknown, and practically all vehicles are Government owned. Few ordinary Russians can afford so much as a motor scooter, let alone a car. Horse-drawn carts and wagons, the horse wearing the high wooden collar above his withers, are fairly common.

What I have just described is a typical city scene. In Moscow, however, there are unusual and outstanding sites. The subway, Metropole, is one. The station I visited was the epitome of cleanliness. Its escalators were the steepest and the fastest I ever saw. On one level, six-car trains operated in both north and south directions and on a 1-minute schedule. On a lower level, in the same station, trains operated east and west. For a few cents you can ride all day on the big M.

Tale of tomb

The Kremlin is a show in itself, because the Kremlin must also include Red Square outside the wall, as well as the Lenin-Stalin mausoleum. Cathedrals, now overhauled as museums, are part of the Kremlin package.

I walked the length of Red Square on a 50°, windy, drizzly day. Four or five blocks from the mausoleum, perhaps for a greater distance into a park, a line of people, four abreast, waited to look at the earthly remains of Lenin and Stalin. Most of these were visitors to Moscow, pilgrims to Mecca, so to speak, whose visit would not have been complete without silently passing the biers of the bearded Lenin and the beribboned Stalin.

The mausoleum is a square, squat block of red and black granite, as austere as it is uninviting. Fresh flowers are always present, and facing each other in the narrow doorway are Russian soldiers, as immobile as the rock house, as expressionless as the gray sky overhead. The honor guard is changed on the hour, a fresh set of young men carrying bayoneted rifles goosestepping into place with stomping feet and swinging arms.

Our guide took us to the head of the line. We moved in, and descended to a basement. The plainness was in sharp contrast to the gaudiness usually evident in Russian decor. The black and wine-red granite gave a somber backdrop to the glass-enclosed bodies. There was Lenin first. He was remarkably well preserved for his 30-odd years on the slab. Dressed in a very plain and severe black suit, his lone decoration was a small red ribbon. A dim, yellow spotlight accentuated the pallor of Lenin's face, but sparkled off the knuckles of his hands, the only evidence I could see that the figure might be wax.

Never so good

As for old Joe, he probably never looked so good in real life. He wore an array of ribbons that extended from well above the breast pocket down to the beltline of his beautifully tailored military jacket. The old boy looked like he had simply stretched out for a nap.

Strolling through the courtyard back of the tomb, I saw the graves of revolutionary heroes. High on the massive wall of the Kremlin were little bronze plaques. Behind these were the urns containing ashes of other lesser Red heroes. In this setting of quiet dignity, I pondered the diabolical scheme perpetrated upon millions of hapless men and women by these two pawns of tyranny—Lenin, the planner, Stalin, the executioner—and wondered what it would take to lure the millions away from their godless shrine.

In a flash it occurred to me, and my capitalistic self muttered: "How I'd like to have the concession of showing a 1959 Thunderbird right across the street from Lenin and company." That, I was certain, "would make the Russians throw rocks at a couple of mummies named Lenin and Stalin."

CHAPTER IV. ISLAND OF FREEDOM

Regardless of the friendly attitude of the Russian people toward American tourists (they like us better than any other visitors because we are more sincere) a country boy can't help feeling that he is hemmed in, constantly under observation, liable to run afoul of the law and find himself thrown into a dungeon beneath the Kremlin and from there shipped off to a Siberian salt mine without the slightest indication ever being given of his ultimate fate. Maybe such things don't happen since the days of Stalin and Beria, but one never knows when the unpredictable Russians will revert to their old ways and once again grease the gates to the big deep freeze. As this is written, the United States is trying vainly to get word about the crew members of a plane forced down in the Soviet. The Commies have advised us that six of the crew died. No word has leaked out regarding the other 11.

During my stay in Moscow, I visited the American Embassy several times, and each time I left, I felt certain I was followed. As you leave the nondescript building, the Russian police standing at the door nod a friendly "Dosveedanya," and may even give you a snappy salute. As your car pulls away, the inevitable shadow moves behind you until your car reaches its destination. This seems to satisfy everybody concerned that you're going somewhere and regardless of your destination, you're followed no more until you once again visit the Embassy.

Moscow's little island of freedom is a ramshackle three-story building in the outskirts of the main business district. A brass nameplate identifies the old brick structure as "the American House."

Jukebox on guard

The American House is simply the dormitory where single employees at the Embassy reside. The second floor is given over to bedrooms. Each man has a room of his own furnished in the simplest fashion with the decorations being dependent upon the occupant's imagination. There is a messhall, and on the third floor, an auditorium with about 150 chairs. On several week nights, an American movie is shown. Bingo is the pastime each Thursday night. Saturday night is dance night. A small bar serving American beer and other drinks is available. Boys residing in the dormitory operate the movie equipment (which is pretty well worn out with new equipment being hard to come by) and the bar. In a corner is a jukebox, and this little item is a sort of watchdog for the fellows who call this pitiful little island of freedom their home.

The jukebox is a Russian detector, and it works in this way: When a Russian tries to crash the party (and they occasionally do) they give themselves away the instant they walk into the room. When anyone from one of the free world's embassies enters the room he immediately goes to the bar for a drink and to get acquainted. A Russian can't stand passing up a jukebox, so he first stops there and plays a few tunes before going to the bar—if he lasts that long. Usually, they're spotted immediately and invited to leave before they ever get around to the drinking point.

Our group visited the American House and it was the only time in Russia we felt unrestrained and free to say what we pleased. We exchanged ideas freely with the American boys living there. We met some swell Britishers, like Sam Hardwicke, of the Royal Air Force, and even some people we couldn't understand, nor did they savvy English, but somehow, when free people get together, there is a common understanding reached even if you have to do it with sign language.

Fair is standout

Perhaps the most notable attraction in Moscow is the National Industrial and Agricultural Fair. It is a local counterpart, although on a much larger scale, of the Russion exhibit at the World's Fair in Brussels. After seeing the latter, and observing the very complete manner in which the Commies clobbered the U.S. exhibit with the sheer weight of quantity, I was not at all surprised by the magnitude of the Moscow fairgrounds.

The showpiece of the Soviet Empire consists of 21 "pavilions," which are not pavilions at all but full-sized exhibition halls quite comparable to the Hall of State or the general exhibits structures at the Texas Fair. The entire grounds are beautifully landscaped, and if the Russians can't do anything else in big-league fashion you have to credit them with the ability to grow flower gardens of breathtaking beauty.

The contents of the 21 buildings offer a cross section of life throughout the Soviet Union. Close to 60,000 exhibits are on hand, including more than 4,000 pieces of machinery ranging from all sorts of mobile vehicles to a completely equipped drilling rig, machine-tool equipment, office machines, medical equipment, livestock, furs, clothes, farm produce—which is kept fresh by daily replacements.

Sputnik Displayed

At the national fair, as in Brussels, the Russkies resort to some pretty fancy showmanship. They make a terriffic display of material objects. They fill in the voids with masterful mockups and scale models. By the time you have seen so many bright and shiny products there is little reason for you to believe they aren't actually making the items or building the projects illustrated by models. Sputnik was there, so why think they didn't have a continuous casting steel mill, shown by models? A shiny 1958 model car was there, so why think it wasn't in production? Well, maybe the stupid oafs from Outer Mongolia went for that stuff, but I looked for myself, and nowhere, but nowhere, in the four principal cities of Russia did I see a car even closely resembling those on display.

Leaving Moscow was like shedding a dirty shirt. When we headed for the railroad station for our first jaunt by rail, it was like washing your hands with a bar of good American soap—and in hot water.

The Red Arrow Express pulls out of Moscow at midnight and arrives in Leningrad at 9 a.m. It is quite the plushiest train I ever rode. Russians will tell you that it is Soviet built, and since I saw no other evidence anywhere in the country that the Russians were capable or willing to build a vehicle like this one, I had to go along with the popular belief that the Red Arrow is in reality Hitler's old personal train obtained in war reparations.

The only diesel engine I saw in Russia—save a miniature in Kharkov—pulled the Red Arrow. It had speed aplenty, and I imagine unusual comfort for a rough roadbed.

Midnight snack

'Mid red velvet drapes, beautifully lacquered woodwork, glistening brass fittings, we settled down as the express pulled out. Then in walked a fat and squatty Russian woman with caviar, sausage and cheese sandwiches, beer or champagne, and rolls. Moscow was lost in the darkness, and ahead was Leningrad.

Daylight found me up, camera unfolded, and shooting everything through an open window. At the start of our trip, the Russian guides told us we were not to take pictures from an airplane or train, or of airports and bridges. They promptly forgot the admonition and we shot anything we wanted to.

Leningrad was important because it was here that we felt the distinct lessening of Communist domination, at least, outwardly. As we moved further from Moscow, this became more and more pronounced. By the time we reached Prague, Czechoslovakia, leading satellite of the Russians, it had practically disappeared. The Commies were in control, no doubt of it, but on the surface there was beginning to appear little sparks of state pride, of individual thinking, of an esprit de corps whose symbol was not the hammer and sickle, nor the portrait of Lenin, but instead, a wisp of freedom that might someday bloom into a canopy of liberty.

CHAPTER V. RUSSIAN EDUCATION BLIND MAN'S BLUFF

Before visiting the Soviet Union, I had read much about the Reds' educational system, and as a result, had gained a certain respect for a program that was reported to be turning out engineers and scientists like an old dominicker hen hatches chicks. In my mind's eye, the Russians had scientists and engineers growing on trees.

I paid particular attention to education in the Soviet, from nursery to college, and I think each phase is worthy of comment.

Ninety percent of Russian women are workers. They are employed in every type of job from mixing concrete to repairing streetcar tracks, from painting to running a machine, from driving a bus to following a plow. I saw them in all of these occupations—and more.

Start early

The Communists take over almost from the instant a child is born. As quickly as possible, a mother gets back to her job. If she works in a bank, or a bakery, or a factory, her employer furnishes a day nursery. These nurseries are well equipped and staffed by qualified people. The mother may choose to take her baby to and from work each day, leaving the child in the nursery. Or she may elect to place the child in another type nursery which permits her to take the youngster home on weekends. There is still another type of nursery school in which the child becomes a full-time resident and student. In this institution, the parents visit the child periodically, and for all good purposes, hand over all responsibility for the child's future to someone else.

I asked a young mother who had her youngster only on weekends if she didn't feel she was shirking a responsibility, if she didn't feel she was losing much of the pleasure attached to having babies of her own.

"No," she replied, "I think my child is being cared for much better than I can care for her. The people in charge of the nursery are experts and are far better qualified to train a child than I am."

By the time Russian kids are 6 or 7 years of age, they usually become members of the Young Pioneers, a pre-Communist outfit which corresponds to the age groups we have in the Cub Scouts and Brownies. Next, there comes membership in the Young Communist League, and after that, membership in the party proper if it is sought and the candidate is politically desirable. By this time, a Russian youngster is in his or her twenties, and oddly enough, not too much importance is attached to becoming a full-fledged member of the party.

No revolution

Many top Russians, while they go along with party principles completely, are not members simply because they do not want to go to the extra trouble and work that membership requires. Party leaders are not concerned with a certain degree of laxity by the people on this score. "Why should we worry now?" one top Commie asked, "We've had them for more than 20 years and if they're not Communists at heart, mere membership won't change their attitude." Most Russians, after 20 or more years of having the party line drummed into their senses at every turn, are Communists at heart, and it is my firm conviction that revolution in Russia is as farfetched as it would be in the United States.

I visited public school No. 57 in Kiev. This city is the capital of the rich Ukraine, often called the breadbasket of Russia. Here, people are friendlier than in Moscow. They seem to be a happier lot, and somewhat removed from the constant pressure of party activities which characterizes Moscow. This atmosphere was predominant in public school No. 57, an old school located in a better section of Kiev.

The school was almost totally destroyed by the Germans, and the administrator, Mrs. Olga Matsinchuk, mother of three daughters, discussed the rebuilding of the school by its teachers with a touch of bitterness toward the Germans creeping into her remarks. She said what the invaders didn't ruin, they stole, so the school had to be rebuilt from the ground up.

Poorly equipped

There was a sort of stiff dignity clearly visible on every hand. As I moved from one classroom to another, the girls curtsied, the boys snapped to attention and bowed stiffly. I saw a physics and chemistry classroom. There was hardly more equipment than bunsen burners and test tubes. In the mechanical shop, there was a worn drill press, a small lathe, several grinding wheels, a few vises, files, and miscellaneous small handtools. By the time I finished my trip through the school, I had a pretty low opinion of Russian education. Later, I met Dr. Rosella Linskie, a former SMU teacher who is still in Russia with a group of American teachers studying in detail the entire Soviet school system.

Dr. Linskie confirmed what I had suspected: The so-called advanced Russian science student is not even the equal of an American high school general science student.

Public school No. 57 had 930 pupils in 10 grades generally coinciding with our elementary and high schools. There were 50 teachers handling 23 classes. All pupils study Russian and mathematics for 10 years. Seventy percent of them study English. The school administrator earns 2,900 rubles per month, or at 4 to 1, about $700 per month, which is unusually high when compared with similar responsibilities in other activities. Teachers are paid by the hour, 8 to 15 rubles per teaching hour, depending upon the subject. Average teacher earnings are from 1,000 to 1,800 rubles or from $250 to $450 per month.

Lenin everywhere

Lenin's pictures and busts were all over the place. Huge green plants lined the halls. On the walls were bronze plaques setting forth the rules of conduct. One room in particular impressed me. This was the headquarters of the Young Pioneers. Here the organization's leaders met to study and to virtually worship before the shrine of a former student, a teenage girl who fought and was killed during the war. In glass cases were some of her clothes, books, and pictures.

Moscow University, when compared on a realistic basis with our big American colleges, was no more impressive than public school No. 57. But for bigness, the grand manner, the flamboyant, it is something to behold. The central tower of the massive structure is almost 800 feet high. Four smaller towers adorn the corners of the building. There are 20 lecture rooms accommodating 600 students each, and our guide made much of the fact that each lecture is tape-recorded and filed in the library. No less than 113 speedy elevators serve the 17,000 students, 6,000 of whom reside in the main building. The dormitory areas are very plain. Each student is assigned a cubicle amounting to 8 square meters. This is something like a room 9 by 9 feet. The room is comfortable, and down the hall is a community kitchen where meals may be prepared. Otherwise a cafeteria is available.

Students are paid 300 rubles ($75) per month in their first year. The second year they receive 350 rubles a month, and from there on, bonuses may allow a student to receive as much as 800 rubles per month.

Busy summer

Since I visited the university during the vacation period, I cannot assume to know very much about the courses. During the summer, however, the school is a beehive of activity with all sorts of special meetings. On the day I was there, the Fourth International Congress on Slavic Languages was in session. Other special sessions included a Congress on Refrigeration, and a Congress on Astronomy.

My low estimate of the entire Russian school system is the result of observation and numerous discussions with Russian and American teachers and students. I got the idea the "Russkies" are playing a sort of blindman's buff, and that back of highly publicized facades of higher learning there are numerous gaps. The Russians, as I learned in many other activities, are past masters at playing hop-skip-and-jump. Education is no exception, witness an incident I experienced in Kiev where I met a young woman medical student. She spoke halting English but she finally got across the idea that on the following Monday she would be leaving school for 2 months to go to a nearby collective farm to help get the harvest in. Her entire class was going to forget the scalpel and pick up the scythe for a time. How many of our young doctors would condone such a practice, and how many of us would want or expect them to?

CHAPTER VI. THE UNBURIED CORPSE

To understand the death sentence imposed upon Christianity in Russia by the Communists, one must realize that the party has been in power something over 40 years. For a person to remember anything at all of the land or its customs prior to the revolution, he would have to be something like 50 years of age. A prerevolution Christian, therefore, would be somewhere near 60. This accounts for the fact that practically all people you see at a church service are elderly.

Religion in Russia, although existing under a reprieve at the moment, is destined to go the way of political freedom in the Soviet. True, the Russians are permitted to worship God, but for the first 20 years or so of a Russian's life, he has little opportunity to be exposed to anything, certainly not religion, except communism—and communism makes a mockery of Christ.

When the present elderly generation passes into the shadows, religion will go with it unless a miracle occurs to give the youth of Russia an opportunity to know about Christianity.

Making no gains

A Russian clergyman told me that religion is not making any gains. Aside from the Government attitude of surface toleration but undercover opposition, the acute housing situation forestalls any effort to increase church accommodations. A materialistic government refuses to recognize spiritual needs while placing all emphasis on the sheltering of physical bodies. As an example, the Baptist Church in Moscow is the country's leading Protestant institution. This is a congregation of 4,000 members.

There are three Sunday services and three during the week. At each service, two preachers deliver two sermons, a 2-hour program during which several hundred stand in the cramped quarters.

The minister, Michael Zhidkov, was partially trained at a Baptist school in London. He said there are a half-million Baptists in Russia using 5,300 churches. He said the Moscow church has operated continuously for 80 years. There is an excellent choir of 100 voices. On the subject of government opposition, Minister Zhidkov admitted that the Soviet Union teaches against religion, and that you cannot be a Baptist and party member, too, as far as the party is concerned. Reverend Zhidkov professed to be a Christian in every sense of the word, yet when asked about his feelings toward communism, he said he was in complete accord with the party. Whether this was true, or he simply said so to prevent rousing the wrath of the Commies, was debatable.

On the bus one day, during a lull in the conversation, I bluntly asked our feminine guide, "Galena, do you believe in God?"

"No," she quickly replied. I drew another negative answer when I asked if her mother had been a Christian. "But my grandmother believes in God," she added. Galena said she had never read the Bible. But I could detect a trace of curiosity in this genial young woman of good education. Finally, she had to come out with it.

"What does your God look like?" Galena asked.

What a question for a layman to ponder when it is asked by an adult of intelligence and honest intent.

I might have satisfied a child for the moment, but not this young woman. While I groped for a proper explanation she hit me with this one: "Where does your God live, up in the sky?"

Answer needed

I thought about Bob Goodrich and McLain Smith and Tom Shipp, and wished that one of those stalwarts could have been there to back me up. I sure needed it—and this girl so desperately needed an answer she could understand and believe.

The situation in Czechoslovakia is not nearly so gloomy. But there, nothing is nearly as dismal as in Russia. A responsible Czech Catholic told me she believed the church was holding its own despite the fact that Communist government was standing the expense of church and cathedral overhaul and paying the salaries of the preachers. But how can a preacher or a priest be really free if the Commies pay him?

Yes, barring a miracle, religion is doomed in the land of the Reds. The oldsters are taking the remaining vestiges with them, and there is no second team of youngsters.

Russia in retrospect

After this series of articles was started, the shortage of manpower became more evident in Premier Khrushchev's modification of the educational system. Full-time schooling will now last only 7 or 8 years, with high school students doing most of their learning at night after working during the day. A scant handful of high school graduates known to be politically desirable will go to college, and there, all but the very elite will be required to hold full-time jobs on the outside. Result: Most Russian boys and girls will go to work when they are 14 or 15 and forget schooling.

Savings gamble

Banking: Russian banks promote a unique savings activity. Depositors agree to pool their 3 percent interest, and at the end of the year, hold a lottery on the pool—possible to earn 100 percent on deposits if you're lucky. A 3-percent bond issue recently matured but was deferred for 20 years with no interest, a bank president told me. Reason: The workers elected to leave the money in the Government so that more new housing could be built. There has never been a bank holdup or robbery in Communist Russia. Reason: Nothing to spend the money for, and if there was, everybody knows what each other makes and any unusual spending would cause a man's neighbors to report him.

Divorce: In Leningrad, posting of divorce intent is 4 years behind. I ran across one family of four. A divorce would be granted if the husband could find living quarters elsewhere. That was 3 years ago. The four still live in two rooms, and he's still looking.

Jobs: A Russian can change jobs simply by filing a 2 weeks' notice. Few do, however, because lack of transportation makes it imperative that a fellow stay put when he has living quarters within walking distance of his job. Practically all production jobs pay a standard wage plus piecewoork incentives. Promotions are based on ability, not seniority. Trade unions demand production, often beyond rated capacity, and management is not too keen for this because it hampers maintenance shifts and increases breakdowns. Doctors are permitted to accept private patients in addition to carrying on their socialized practice.

Few aircraft

The military: Nowhere did I see a military plane in the air. There were 8 or 10 jets on the Moscow parking ramp. Jets, DC–7's, etc., are pulled out on the grass to wooden workbenches where they are serviced without protection from the elements. Countless Russians told me, "Tell your Government not to bomb us. We want no more war, only peace." I saw five halftracks dragging shrouded artillery through Red Square, the only evidence of military might observed in 5,000 miles of travel.

Conclusion: Russia is growing in spite of its unwieldly, ponderous, wasteful and inefficient system. It bears continuous watching while we keep our own house in order. Sputnik? The Germans did it for the Ruskies even as they played important roles in developing the American version. Afraid? Never, and I'm convinced that the time is now for the free world to draw the line against communism—and hold it.

TRIBUTE TO ABRAHAM LINCOLN AND TO HIS MOTHER, NANCY HANKS, WHO WAS BORN IN WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President and Members of the Senate, in listening a few minutes ago to the meaningful tribute by Carl Sandburg to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, I was made aware of the peculiar significance of Lincoln in the State of West Virginia.

Over a span of 14 years I had the privilege of representing the congressional district of West Virginia in which Nancy Hanks, the mother of Abraham Lincoln, was born. Her birthplace near Antioch, in Mineral County, is revered as one of our State's historic landmarks.

I am reminded of a quotation from a column of the late Arthur Brisbane, published on Lincoln's birth anniversary on February 12, 1936, in which he wrote:

Without Nancy Hanks there would have been no Abraham Lincoln. This, his birthday, is a good day to honor him and his mother.

Indeed, Mr. President, it is appropriate to remark that mothers have been the inspiration of American leaders throughout our country's history. Mothers have too often been the unapplauded molders of men. They ask nothing for themselves, and in the making of this comment I am thinking now of the modest marker there on a hillside in West Virginia, where the mother of Lincoln was born.

At the foot of another West Virginia mountain not many miles away lies the town of Hendricks where lived Karl Myers, a poet laureate of my State—then a young man who was crippled and unable to walk. He composed and sent me in 1936, when I was a Member of the House of Representatives, truly touching and moving lines of Abraham Lincoln. His is verse which causes us not to think of the yesterdays, but for a moment to picture Lincoln as if he were a part of the restless times in which we live.

The poem, called "If Abraham Lincoln Could Talk to You," is quoted as follows:

If Abraham Lincoln could talk to you
Over the radiophone tonight,
Could for a moment the veil step through,
Out of the silence and far skies bright,

Gentle and great as of old—what then,
Think you, the theme of his speech would be?
Preachings, perchance, to the sons of man,
Muddled and restless, beyond the sea?

Haply a word on affairs of state,
Out of his storehouse of wisdom rare?
Maby a fling at the low birth rate?
Pleas for the virtues of days that were?

Making orations inspired and grave,
Think you the seconds he'd speed away,
Casting his pearls on the wireless wave
Unto all people and nations? Nay.

Somehow I fancy him standing here,
Knowing the heart of the world is sad,
Spinning a yarn of the yesteryear,
Telling a story to make us glad.

In this expressive poem, the late Karl Myers caught the ever-living spirit of a great American—one who was great not so much because of the brilliance of his mind but because of his gentleness, his depth of understanding, his capacity for service, his humility of heart, and his guidance of those who needed a helping hand.

PROPOSED CLOSING OF ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION'S URANIUM PROCESSING MILL AT MONTICELLO, UTAH

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, frugality in Government has become the current crusade in the Eisenhower administration. The President talks about it constantly in his messages to Congress and at his press conferences. His lieutenants never lose an opportunity to echo his sentiment. The size of the price tag on any commodity the Government buys—whether it is national survival or airport safety—seems more important than what's inside the package.

I am not going to argue the soundness of the administration's economic philosophy here. No one is more interested than I in reducing Government expenditures or in assuring that the American taxpayer gets value received for every dollar spent. But in view of the administration's dollar-counting-above-all-else attitude, I want to call the attention of this body to an impending waste in tax dollars by the executive branch of the Government in my State of Utah which I feel is indefensible.

As you know, Utah has been a center for some years of a booming uranium industry. At the time the Government was seeking every ounce of uranium available, the Atomic Energy Commission went into the uranium milling business. One of the mills it erected was at Monticello, Utah, which is located in San Juan County, in the heart of the uranium fields, and not far from the famous four corners where Utah, Colorado, Arizona, and New Mexico meet.

The mill became a leader in ore processing and assembled a staff well qualified to handle an economic operation. The town of Monticello assumed a heavy bonded indebtedness to provide the necessary facilities for the men, and their families, who came to work in the mill, and others who were attracted into the area because of the uranium boom, believing that a significant portion of the repayment would come from the taxes of new residents.

Suddenly the Atomic Energy Commission has decided to get out of the uranium milling business to turn it over to private industry. I certainly do not disagree with this objective—if private industry can do the job, it certainly should be given the chance.

But—and here is where my quarrel is—the Atomic Enery Commission has now proposed to close the Monticello mill in about 6 months, despite the fact that the Standard Uranium Co., a private concern with a uranium mine near Monticello, wants to buy the plant. Its offer to buy is conditioned upon an agreement with the AEC for purchase of an adequate quantity of the company's ore to justify an economic operation. Of course, the AEC is the only customer who legally may buy. The Commission has been unwilling so far to sell the Monticello mill on these terms, and salvage for the taxpayer as many of the dollars which went into its construction as possible, arguing that previous commitments make it impossible to give the company the necessary uranium oxide contracts.

This is surprising to me, because the AEC is constantly signing new contracts with other mills built recently, or which are now under construction or expanding. Nine new uranium mills, built by private companies which hold Atomic Energy Commission contracts for the delivery of concentrates, went into delivery in 1958. Other new mills are now being built in Nevada, New Mexico, and Wyoming.

This is hard for the people of Monticello to understand. It is even harder for them to follow the line of AEC reasoning which results in the type of story which appeared in the Salt Lake Tribune on February 5. An official of the Lucky Mc Uranium Corp. announced that the Atomic Energy Commission would shortly modify its agreement with the company, and increase from 833 tons to 1,000 tons a day the amount of uranium oxide it is buying from its Lucky Mc mill in Wyoming.

Nor, with the millmen about to lose their jobs, and the city fathers and business concerns deeply concerned about the impact on the city's economy of the loss of a substantial slice of the city's buying power, can the people of Monticello read without wincing, reports such as the one carried in the Salt Lake Tribune on February 4 about the contracts the Government has signed with South Africa to buy uranium concentrates from that area through 1966 or 1967.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point copies of two columns by Robert W. Bernick in the Salt Lake Tribune which relate to the comments I have just made.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WEST MINERS HEAR DARK U–ORE NEWS

(By Robert W. Bernick)

The western miner can quit worrying about whether the U.S. Government has irrevocably obligated itself to buy uranium concentrates from South Africa past March 31, 1962, while starving exploration in this country.

It has.

In fact, the fantastic deal handed the big gold producers in South Africa for their uranium all but beggars description.

And it has laid the groundwork for a huge complex of uranium production based on byproducts recovery from gold mining which with native labor will produce the world's lowest cost fissionable material.

That these fissionable materials will one day come back to haunt not only the domestic mine's struggles for a free market but becomes a lever in international politics seems inevitable.

According to Canada's Northern Miner, the United States guarantees purchase of uranium concentrates from South African sources through contracts which extend through 1966 and 1967.

It is interesting, but hardly unusual on the part of Washington, D.C., these days, that the American government offers foreigners contracts for a longer period than that offered its own tax-paying citizens.

(We are now paying $11.75 a pound for South African uranium concentrates against an average price of $9.66 a pound for uranium produced in Western United States. The price for U.S. producers after March 31, 1962, is $8 a pound. AEC has never told the American people what price it will pay for concentrates from South Africa. But as the existing contracts run through 1967, there's reason to believe the price-cost disparity will increase, rather than decrease.)

The United States and British Governments not only have issued the long term, high priced guarantees to the gold producers for their uranium.

Through loans from these two Governments, the big British and South African controlled gold firms have built some 67 million pounds (sterling) worth of plants (17 separate ones), including a 9 million pounds sulphuric acid plant used in reduction of uranium.

With Monticello uranium mill closing, exploration ended in the domestic fields and the AEC demanding lower costs and lower prices in the United States for reason of "economy," there is but one word for the foreign program of the Commission: Tragedy.

LUCKY MC RECORDS WYOMING U–GAINS

(By Robert W. Bernick)

The Lucky Mc Uranium Corp. Wednesday reported $3,161,482 net profit on sales of $9,115,438 in uranium concentrates from its Gas Hills District, Wyoming, uranium mill for 6 months ended December 31, 1958.

Allen D. Christensen, San Francisco, president, said in an interim report to shareholders:

"We expect to announce shortly a modification of our agreement with the Atomic Energy Commission for sale of uranium oxide through the year 1966, which will require the operation of the Lucky Mc mill at the rate of approximately 1,000 tons daily.

"Our present contract calls for an operating rate of 833 tons a day through March 31, 1962. Successful conclusion of the contract modification will assure continued earnings of the corporation through 1966.

In the interim financial statement, the executive disclosed that in the last quarter 1958, Lucky Mc paid $1,148,000 on bank loans (for construction of the mill, etc.), reducing the outstanding balance to $7,352,000.

The net profit figures are after estimated taxes and operating costs but before depletion. They include application of previous year's loss (start up) of one and six-tenths million dollars.

Mr. Christensen said the "operating results" during the term of the report were "gratifying, with sales and profits exceeding the previous quarter's results, due primarily to a combination of processing higher grade ores and achieving improved metallurgical recoveries."

"Although the tonnage of ores fed to processing decreased 7 percent when compared to the previous quarter, the production of uranium oxide contained in concentrate increased 12 percent with 550,000 pounds of U^{308} shipped."

Because of contract modifications imposed during 1958, he estimated that third quarter production should be off about 25 percent from second quarter rate.

Mr. MOSS. I also ask unanimous consent to have printed a letter I directed to Hon. John A. McCone, Chairman of the Joint Atomic Energy Commission, on this matter, as it gives considerably more information on it, particularly on the impact of the Monticello economy of the closing of the uranium processing mill, and on the very minor adjustments in the AEC buying programs which would be required to accommodate the relatively small Monticello operation.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 2, 1959.

Hon. JOHN A. MCCONE,
Chairman, Atomic Energy Commission,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN MCCONE: I am writing in further reference to the proposed closing of the Commission's uranium processing mill at Monticello, Utah.

I have been informed that the Standard Uranium Co., with headquarters at Monticello, has reaffirmed its offer to purchase the Government-owned mill if the AEC will agree to contract for an adequate quantity of the company's ore to justify the operation economically. Since the Monticello mill is a small one, and contributes only a minor percentage of the uranium concentrate which the Commission buys (2 percent of the total domestic and foreign U^{235} purchased in 1958 and an anticipated 1 percent in 1959) it would require only a slight readjustment in the present purchase programs to keep the Monticello mill in operation. Surely there is enough elasticity in these programs to allow for an adjustment of this type.

It is very difficult to understand all aspects of the administration of the uranium-milling and ore-buying programs. The Commission appears to have taken the position that it is time for the Government to get out of the uranium business, and that private industry should take it over. I do not quarrel with this position—I commend it. But I do quarrel most emphatically with a policy which assures contracts to the many new private uranium processing mills which are being constructed throughout the West while at the same time the Commission contemplates closing a mill now in smooth operation which private industry wants to buy, and the purchase of which would return to the U.S. Treasury thousands of taxpayers' dollars.

In view of the announced closing of the Monticello mill because of decreased need I was somewhat surprised to read a statement made recently by Mr. Allan E. Jones, manager of the AEC Grand Junction office, at a meeting of industry leaders there, and reported in the Daily Sentinel, of Grand Junction, Colo. Mr. Jones declared that the most urgent job before the AEC was to proceed with milling contracts for the final expansions in Wyoming, Texas, the Colorado Front Range, and the Dakota lignites.

I understand that AEC has promised contracts to new mills in these areas because people there have relied on AEC announcements. It seems to me that the people of Monticello, Utah, are entitled to the same consideration. The Monticello mill is a leader in the field of ore processing and has well-qualified personnel to continue economical operations. Standard Uranium has over a million tons of ore in the area ready for milling.

Completely apart from the responsibility the Commission has to keep a well-established mill in operation and to realize the most to the taxpayers for each tax dollar spent, the Federal Government has a responsibility to the citizens of Monticello. With no intimation that their uranium-processing mill was to be closed down, the city has undertaken a heavy bonded indebtedness and incurred other obligations in an effort to expand facilities for the growing population brought into this area by the uranium boom generally and the ore-processing mill specifically. Loss of the mill employees and their families, their purchasing power, and their tax money, will impose an extra financial burden on the remainder of the community. I am also very much concerned about the individual problems of the men who will lose their jobs, and of their wives and families.

I feel very strongly, therefore, that the Commission should give full and sympathetic consideration to the offer from the Standard Uranium Co. to purchase the Monticello uranium-processing mill.

Sincerely,

FRANK E. MOSS.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, Monticello is a small city in a sparsely settled section of Utah, but if the closing of its uranium mill is typical of the brand of economy this administration is practicing, then I believe this body has a right to question the soundness—and the sincerity—of that economy program.

TWELVE KEY DATES IN OREGON HISTORY AS STATE CELEBRATES 100 YEARS OF STATEHOOD

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, on Saturday, Oregon celebrates 100 years of statehood. Centennial observances will take place throughout the State on February 14, 1959. These festivities mark more than a local holiday. They are recognition of the growth and achievement of a people drawn together originally by the invisible line of a political boundary and held together by the common purpose of a better life.

Oregon's history is studded with significant dates—important to the State and to the Nation. Today, I wish to list 12 periods in the chronology of our country in which Oregon played a vital role. Selection of these years was made for me by Thomas Vaughan, scholarly and able executive director of the Oregon Historical Society and editor of our Oregon Historical Quarterly.

This brief timetable—covering nearly 200 years—cannot reveal the great depth of Oregon's contribution to the strengthening of the Union. The dates are merely historical headstones—recording, but not evaluating progress. During the forthcoming centennial year, I intend to speak further in the Senate regarding my State's rich social heritage and its liberal leadership in political reform.

Mr. President, I am proud to serve the people of Oregon as a U.S. Senator. These events—which reveal my native State's development from wilderness to complex agricultural and industrial society—are one essential reason for that pride.

First, 1778, Capt. James Cook sailed along the northwest coast to the Arctic Ocean and entered Nootka Harbor—Vancouver Island. He and his men purchased sea otter furs from Indians which brought great returns in China, and word spread by mouth and by publication of his journals after the expedition's return to England.

Second, 1792, Robert Gray, out of Boston, entered the Columbia River and named it for his ship Columbia; George Vancouver, British commander then off coast to settle the Nootka controversy, received Gray's map of entrance to the river from the Spanish commander, Quadra, and sent Broughton to explore the river. The latter reached a point just east of Troutdale, discovering the mouth of the Willamette.

Third, 1803–06, Louisiana Purchase, 1803, and Lewis and Clark exploring expedition, 1804 to 1806, sent to explore overland for first commercial route to Pacific Ocean by President Thomas Jefferson.

Fourth, 1811–12, establishment of Fort Astoria, Astor's fur-trading post at the mouth of the Columbia, by a sea party arriving on the Tonquin; arrival of overland party under Wilson Price Hunt; dispatches sent from Astoria carried by Robert Stuart over most of Oregon Trail route, including South Pass, 1812.

Fifth, 1834, Nathaniel Wyeth's second expedition to the Oregon country, for the purpose of establishing a trade in furs, salmon, supplies; built Fort Hall, later an important stop on the Oregon Trail. Accompanying Wyeth to Oregon on this trip were Jason Lee and other missionary helpers who established a mission in the Willamette Valley, an important focal point for American interest in settlement.

Sixth, 1843–45, provisional government established by American settlers in Willamette Valley.

Seventh, 1846, treaty between the United States and Great Britain settled northern boundary of Oregon country at 49°, including Columbia River mouth and Puget Sound.

Eighth, 1848–49, bill creating Oregon Territory, passed by Congress in 1848, went into effect in Oregon in 1849 with arrival of Gov. Joseph Lane in March. Gold discovered in California in 1848 was important in stimulating interest in the west coast and in bringing prosperity and medium of exchange to Oregon farmers and merchants, economic independence of the Hudson's Bay Co.

Ninth, 1859, Oregon became 33d State of the Union on eve of Civil War.

Tenth, 1883, with the completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad, by the Columbia water-grade route to Portland, Oreg., and the rest of the Pacific Northwest obtained first direct transcontinental railroad connection.

Eleventh, 1902–12, passage of various parts of "Oregon System" including initiative and referendum, recall, direct election of U.S. Senators, and so forth.

Twelfth, 1937, Bonneville Dam, first step in harnessing of the great Columbia River, completed with unique facilities to provide for valuable migratory salmon.

On February 14, 1959, the State with this rich tradition and history achieves the centennial of its statehood in the American Union.

I should like to add that I am particularly grateful there are present in the Chamber today distinguished Senators from such States as Montana and Idaho which at the time of the creation of the Oregon country were included in parts of this great area known as Oregon.

DEATH OF GEN. WILLIAM J. DONOVAN

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, America has lost one of its most dedicated Americans in the passing of Maj. Gen. William J. Donovan.

I knew General Donovan, and visited in his offices many times. His briefings for Senators and Representatives were always patient and helpful.

His record of service to his country is a proud chapter in our history. He was truly a soldier statesman, a kind man, but firm in his beliefs and decisions.

Most newspapers published thoughtful editorials relative to the life, character, and achievements of General Donovan. I ask unanimous consent that one of these editorials, entitled "General Donovan's Distinguished Career," published in the New York Herald Tribune of February 9, 1959, be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENERAL DONOVAN'S DISTINGUISHED CAREER

"Wild Bill" Donovan gained his nickname by reason of his courage as a major with the Fighting 69th in World War I. It stuck with him all through his life, even when he was a distinguished lawyer, arguing cases before the Supreme Court of the United States. Republican candidate for Governor of New York; commander of the Office of Strategic Services during World War II; Ambassador to Thailand at a critical time in southeast Asia; or performing any of his other almost countless public services under five Presidents. His death in Washington at 76 ends a career whose variety was surpassed only by its usefulness.

Gen. William J. Donovan's contributions to his country can be measured in the fact that he was the only man to have held the Medal of Honor, the Distinguished Service Cross, the Distinguished Service Medal, and the National Security Medal, which may be accounted as the Nation's four highest decorations. Yet deep though his patriotism ran, it never ran narrow. He was one of the first Americans of national stature to sense the growing menace of fascism, and he went to Ethiopia in 1932 and to Spain in 1937 to observe its march at firsthand. In the same way, he became a stalwart in the battle against the advances of international communism; in 1956 he organized one of the most successful campaigns for financial aid to Hungarians who had rebelled against the Soviets.

Probably it was as head of the OSS that most of his countrymen knew General Donovan. Yet this was only the summit of a career that had already seen important services as an Assistant Attorney General, a candidate for high office, a diplomatic observer, and a famous lawyer. In the OSS he organized a secret army which performed vital intelligence, analytical, and espionage functions that contributed mightily to the Allied victory. Much of the OSS story is still untold, but it is not too much to say that General Donovan created America's first worldwide secret intelligence force.

A warm friend as well as a devoted citizen, General Donovan could look back as few men can upon years of aspiration matched by achievement. Winston Churchill, commenting upon a factfinding trip by General Donovan in the Balkans and the Middle East in 1940, summed up the man when he said, "He has carried with him throughout an animating, heartwarming flame." It was a flame that burned brightly throughout his life.

PARTICIPATION IN PUBLIC AFFAIRS

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I am very grateful for the expression of my colleague, the distinguished Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING] by inserting my speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on the subject of "The Business Man in Public Affairs." In thinking of the participation of people generally in public affairs, I should like to ask my colleagues to listen for a few minutes as I recall that during the 1958 campaign I visited a friend who was 97 years of age. He is Charles L. Watkins, who had been an active businessman until 8 or 9 years prior to my having been privileged to visit him last year. He is a semi-invalid. When I talked with Mr. Watkins, he told me that he had never failed to cast his ballot. In other words, he had voted consecutively for 76 years, never missing an election and the use of his franchise of freedom in municipal, county, State, and Federal elections.

I feel that we have a symbol of the finest citizenship in Charles L. Watkins, a man now almost 98, who told me—and I repeat it to my colleagues now: "It has been a privilege to participate in the processes of government."

Yes; I shall always remember that he said: "If the weather is good on primary election day I'll roll myself in this wheelchair to the polling place. If the weather is bad, I'll do what I once did, I'll call the ambulance but I'll be there with my ballot."

We shall never lose our democracy by default as long as we have citizens such as Charles Watkins.

THE DOMESTIC MINERALS INDUSTRY

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, on Saturday, February 7, the distinguished junior Senator from Utah [Mr. MOSS] was the principal speaker at the 62d annual National Western Mining Conference, held in Denver, Colo.

The Senator pointed out the basic fallacy in the administration's program, or, more accurately, lack of program, for the mining industry. This administration program for mining, as is everything else, is an abject obeisance to the concept of a balanced budget. The administration does not take into account the fact that if there are no mines operating, there will be no taxes paid by the mining industry, and hence a balanced budget is a dangerous fallacy with respect to sustaining our country's self-sufficiency in the basic minerals so necessary to our security in both peace and war.

At the same time, the junior Senator from Utah set forth the broad outline of an affirmative plan to sustain our domestic minerals industry and to give it the necessary stability. His program was reported in some detail by the two Denver newspapers, the Post and the Rocky Mountain News.

In view of the fact that legislation putting into effect the program proposed by the Senator from Utah will shortly be introduced, I ask unanimous consent that these reports of the Senator's remarks appear in the body of the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the press reports were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Rocky Mountain News, Feb. 8, 1959]

SENATOR MOSS ASKS PLAN AIDING FALTERING MINING INDUSTRY

A proposal to stabilize the economics of the mining industry by special legislation similar to the Sugar Act, which sets up both domestic and foreign import quotas, is under study in Washington.

U.S. Senator FRANK E. MOSS, Democrat Utah, main speaker at the annual "Sowbelly Dinner" of the National Western Mining Conference at the Shirley-Savoy Hotel, told about the plan Saturday night.

Moss said he has discussed the plan with U.S. Senator JAMES A. MURRAY, Democrat, Montana, chairman of the Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, and added:

"Chairman MURRAY and I are in agreement that there should be, in the interest of national security, in the interest of employment in the metal and mineral mines of this Nation, and in the interest of the mining industry in general," a staff study on the plan.

Moss said Congressmen are concerned that metals lost ground in 1958, and charged the administration is more concerned with income and a balanced budget than it is with helping a sick industry.

"The outlook is discouraging, but the future is not entirely hopeless," he declared.

[From the Denver Post, Feb. 8, 1959]

UTAH SENATOR URGES SUBSIDY FOR U.S. MINES

(By Jim Ritchie)

Senator FRANK E. MOSS (Democrat, of Utah), told the 62d annual National Western Mining Conference in Denver, Saturday night, that the Eisenhower administration is more interested in balancing the budget than helping the distressed mining industry.

Moss spoke to more than 1,300 miners who ate pork and beans at the annual Sowbelly Dinner, which traditionally is the closing event of the 3-day mining meeting.

Gov. Steve McNichols, Mayor Will F. Nicholson, Senator GORDON ALLOTT (Republican, of Colorado), Representatives WAYNE ASPINALL (Democrat), and J. EDGAR CHENOWETH (Republican), both of Colorado, and STEWART L. UDALL (Democrat, of Arizona), were among the dignitaries attending.

URGES OFFICIAL STUDY

Moss told the meeting he will urge Congress to study legislation to grant direct subsidies to the domestic mining industry. "A study of such legislation would be in the national interest," he said.

"The peacetime economy cannot be healthy without a plentiful supply of minerals at a reasonable price," he said.

He attacked a speech Friday in which Elmer Bennett, Under Secretary of the Interior, told the convention that the most important problem facing the Nation was inflation. To prevent inflation the United States must maintain a balanced budget, Bennett contended.

Moss charged that Bennett implied that if the budget was to be kept balanced "then there is little or no aid to be given to the sick mineral industry."

"I fervently agree with the commendable objective of balancing the budget, but I must point out that a sick mining industry, paying little or no income tax to the Federal Government is not in a very good position to help keep Federal revenues up," Moss said.

He recommended a study to determine if it is advisable for Congress to enact legislation patterned after the Sugar Act to assure at all times domestic production of major minerals and metals.

SUGAR ACT CITED

The Sugar Act provides for Government payments to domestic producers as an effort to maintain a sugar industry in the United States.

During 1958, the mining industry lost ground, and the future outlook is "discouraging, but not entirely hopeless," Moss told the miners. He said that last year production of copper was down 10 percent, lead and zinc were off 23 percent, and gold and silver reached the lowest production level since 1946.

"We must dedicate ourselves to a course of action that will wring employment out of unemployment, profits out of red ink, and smiles out of despair in the mining industry," Moss said.

While the miners were staging their stag dinner at the Lincoln Room of the Shirley-Savoy Hotel, their wives held the annual "Sour Belle" dinner at the Brown Palace Hotel.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR GREEN

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, 1 week ago many of his colleagues rose in the Senate to praise the senior Senator from Rhode Island, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, and to express their admiration for his wisdom and strength of character in relinquishing the chairmanship of the Foreign Relations Committee.

On Wednesday, February 11, 1959, the Providence Journal, a Rhode Island newspaper, published a letter to the editor entitled "An Associate Praises Senator GREEN's Resignation."

The author of the letter, Mr. Gordon F. Harrison, chief clerk and counsel of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, has written a stirring and beautiful tribute recounting the selfless, courageous, and continuing service and loyalty the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island has given to his State and to his country.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, at the conclusion of my remarks, the letter which was printed in the Providence Journal.

There being no objection, the letter to the editor was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN ASSOCIATE PRAISES SENATOR GREEN'S RESIGNATION

I have been a friend and associate of Senator GREEN throughout my life—first as a neighbor on John Street, then in the Rhode Island State House, next as his legislative assistant during his first 4 years as a Senator in Washington, and eventually in my present capacity as chief clerk and counsel of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, which began under his chairmanship.

I have had a unique opportunity to evaluate this truly distinguished statesman. On countless past occasions he has, by word and act, proven himself more than worthy of the confidence, esteem, and affection of the people of Rhode Island.

On Friday, January 30, however, he reached a summit. It is in the focus of my long association that the real significance of his resignation as chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations gains perspective. I would like to indulge this brief opportunity to share with you and your readers my impressions of that incident.

It is unnecessary to detail the tremendous workload and awesome responsibilities which beset the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations amid the international complexities of today's world. Indeed, from the very inception of the Senate itself, the committee's influence has placed it in a rank second to none. Membership on the committee is a coveted honor, and almost never has a Senator gained a place thereon early in his legislative career.

Senator GREEN is an exception. Within a year of his coming to Washington, by reason of his broad background of foreign travel, languages, and interests, he was appointed to membership. In the two decades which followed—through war and peace—he devotedly applied himself to every committee assignment. It was only natural that he should entertain the hope of one day being chairman. No one ever deserved the elevation in greater degree. Perhaps no one ever worked harder to obtain it, or desired it more. It is only in that perspective that the quality of his action in resigning can best be appraised.

I remember when, a few months ago, Senator GREEN found it necessary to wear a hearing aid for the first time. He adopted the appendage reluctantly but cheerfully. When, last fall, he underwent eye surgery to remove an impairment to his vision, he realized the added handicap he would bring to his arduous labors as chairman. It was back then that he set the course which, in his wisdom, he knew he would follow.

If I have learned anything from a lifetime of association with Senator GREEN it is that he keeps his own counsel, makes his own decisions, and has the fortitude to stand by them. In so doing he is swayed neither by the banal bleatings of sycophants nor by the spurious dribble of detractors.

Therefore, let there be no mistake about Senator GREEN's motivation for resigning his chairmanship. In the simple, straightforward eloquence of his letter of resignation he made it clear that he based his decision on what "would be best for my country, for the United States Senate, and for the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations itself."

While it is true that the chairmanships of Senate committees sometimes go to older and less vigorous Senators under the time-honored seniority rule—chairmen do not resign! It is one apart from all the rest who can graciously assess the proportion of bodily frailties and the demands of duty and then relinquish the position that he, through long years of dedicated accomplishments, had rightly earned.

To relinquish its powers and prestige, to leave when for 24 hours the leader of the Senate and the entire membership of your committee have entreated you to stay, to step aside when the decision is yours alone—takes rare humility and heroic courage. It is the type of decision that makes a man first seek counsel with his Creator and then make the judgment entirely by himself. Senator GREEN's choice was hard and lonesome. Lesser men would have succumbed to stubborness, vanity or self-deception.

On January 30 an act of undiluted statesmanship took place in the Nation's Capitol. If any in the huge crowd gathered in the corridor outside the louvered doors of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee room came to see the exit of a tired old man, they stayed to see instead the majestic emergence of a mighty patriot. In the warm smile he displayed for the avid photographers, in the gentle candor of his answer to the leaders of the Nation's press there assembled, in the dignity and selflessness of his person—Senator GREEN stood a tall American! Rhode Islanders can be very proud of their senior Senator. On Friday, January 30, he touched the fringe of immortality!

GORDON F. HARRISON,
Chief Clerk and Counsel, Senate Committee on Rules and Administration.

WASHINGTON, D.C.

HISTORY OF THE EXPORT-IMPORT BANK OF WASHINGTON

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, today marks the 25th anniversary of the founding of the Export-Import Bank of Washington and in recognition of that fact I ask unanimous consent to have published at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a press release prepared by the Bank reviewing its history.

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Export-Import Bank of Washington today completed 25 years of operations in support of United States oversea trade.

While providing direct assistance to U.S. exporters in cooperation with private banks and financial institutions, the Bank became the first public agency, either national or international, to arrange credits for large-scale economic development throughout the world.

The Bank was founded February 12, 1934, with a capitalization of $11 million. Today it is authorized to have loans and guarantees outstanding at any one time of $7 billion.

In 25 years the Bank has authorized over $10 billion in some 1,600 individual credits; disbursed over $6.6 billion (an additional $1.6 billion is committed for disbursements); collected $3.3 billion in repayments; earned gross profit of $997.6 million; paid $438 million to the U.S. Treasury as interest and dividends; paid all administrative expenses out of earnings; charged off losses of $2.9 million; retained net profits of $536 million as reserves; and encouraged more than $1 billion in private investment abroad.

The Export-Import Bank made its first credits for economic development abroad in the late 1930's and has continued making these credits, either to private borrowers or to governments, for more than 20 years. Most of the various programs for economic development have followed in general the path pioneered originally by the Export-Import Bank.

In Africa, Asia, Europe, Latin America, and Oceania, the Bank has assisted the development of steel mills; iron, copper, nitrate, manganese, and uranium mining; electric power installations; cement mills; fertilizer plants; chemical plants; innumerable types of industrial plants; large-scale irrigation projects; highways; ports; and public works. The immediate result of these credits has been to provide hundreds of thousands of orders for U.S. industries throughout the country and many millions of hours of employment for American workers. In addition, these projects have resulted in economic growth abroad which has permanently expanded U.S. overseas markets.

Throughout its 25 years the Bank has maintained a flexible lending policy designed to meet changing conditions of world trade incident to a world economic depression, a world war, and a period of reconstruction and development. It has done so within the three basic concepts which Congress has written into its governing statutes: To "aid in financing and to facilitate exports and imports and exchange of commodities" between the United States and other countries; to "supplement and encourage and not compete with private capital"; and to make loans that shall "in the judgment of the Board of Directors offer reasonable assurance of repayment."

In addition to its loans running into billions for economic development projects, the Bank has made hundreds of small loans to assist sales abroad of individual pieces of equipment, has lent approximately $1 billion to finance export sales of U.S. cotton (among other commodities), and has made various types of balance of payments credits to assist other governments in maintaining essential trade relations with the United States.

The Export-Import Bank has actively encouraged new private investment abroad. Since 1952, the earliest year for which complete statistics are available, credits by the Bank have resulted in concurrent loans and participations and equity investment by U.S. private interests in excess of $880 million without guarantee from Eximbank.

A summary of the Bank's lending operations from February 12, 1934, through February 11, 1959, inclusive, follows:

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ILLNESS OF SECRETARY OF STATE DULLES

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, before I proceed to the remarks which I intend to make on the German situation, I wish to say that I am deeply distressed by the news of the illness of the Secretary of State.

The duties of the Secretary of State are just about the most exacting and strenuous in the Government, not excluding the Presidency. The intellectual demands of the job are enormous. The physical demands are appalling. For years, Secretary Dulles has borne up under them without complaint. His stamina and durability have been little short of incredible. However, in the Secretary, as in other men, there is a physical limit. His total personal dedication to the service of the Nation has taken its toll of his health. As one doctor put it, the Secretary is worn out. It is a shame, Mr. President, that the Nation has required so much of one man. And it is to the Nation's detriment, moreover, that he has had to push himself beyond the limit.

We can ill afford to lose his services at any time. We can spare them least at this moment. Secretary Dulles is needed as never before to complete the very delicate negotiations on Berlin and Germany which he had just begun so auspiciously.

Mr. Dulles has capable associates in the Department of State. With all due respect to them, however, the Secretary will be sorely missed in the weeks ahead. The Nation needs his great experience, his balance, his strength, his ability to decide.

I share with the President and the Nation the feeling of distress which the Secretary's illness brings. I know the Senate joins with me in wishing Mr. Dulles a full recovery and a prompt return to his key role in the search for a secure peace.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I endorse everything that has been said by the distinguished Senator from Montana concerning the illness of Secretary of State Dulles and the work which he has been doing. I have often marveled, as I am certain many other persons have, at his stamina. I recall reading in the press recently that during the time Mr. Dulles has been Secretary of State, he has traveled more than 500,000 miles. He has made many long journeys, and often after his return, perhaps within a day or two, he would be off on another long trip.

I first knew Mr. Dulles when he served for a short time in the United States Senate. But I came to know him better when I served with him in the United Nations as a delegate in 1950 and, subsequent to that time, for the ensuing 12 months.

On September 8, 1950, at about 12 o'clock noon, President Truman called Mr. Dulles to the White House. Mr. Dulles at that time was an assistant in the Department of State under the then Secretary of State Acheson. President Truman asked Mr. Dulles on that day if he would be willing to assume the responsibility of formulating the Japanese Peace Treaty, and in getting the two score or more nations which would be parties to the conference to agree to its general terms.

If an assignment can be imagined which was more difficult and more complex than that of bringing together some 40 nations of the world which were greatly concerned about the terms of the Japanese peace treaty, I cannot conceive of it. But Mr. Dulles undertook to do the job. Mr. Dulles told me later that President Truman asked him at the time how long it would take. Mr. Dulles replied that he thought it would take a year. Mr. Truman then said, "I will give you one year in which to finish the job."

At that time I was the chairman of the Subcommittee on Far Eastern Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I became a member of the committee in January 1951. Naturally, I had a close relationship with Mr. Dulles in his work during the entire year 1951. I was in conference frequently with him, because this was a Far Eastern question. The subcommittee and our assistants met with Mr. Dulles at all times of the day, sometimes in the morning, sometimes at lunch, sometimes in the afternoons or evenings. I feel quite certain that during the time the treaty was being formulated, the Subcommittee on Far Eastern Affairs, Mr. Dulles, and his associates had probably 100 different meetings. I have often said it was one of the most remarkable jobs I ever saw any man perform. It was not easy to bring together the British, on one hand, and the Nationalist Chinese, on the other. It was not easy to bring together the southeast Asia nations and the central European nations. But gradually Mr. Dulles wove a plan under which all nations were at least willing to attend a conference.

The conference was held in the San Francisco Opera House. It ended on September 8, 1951. Just before we left the Opera House, I said to Mr. Dulles, "This is the anniversary of the day you undertook to do this work. At what time of the day did President Truman assign it to you?" Mr. Dulles replied that it was at 12 o'clock noon. I looked at my watch, and, making allowance for the difference in time between Washington and California, I said to him, "You have 8 minutes to spare." In other words, the time lacked 8 minutes of being 1 year from the time Mr. Dulles had undertaken to do the work.

Following the conference, former Senator Smith, of New Jersey; Mr. Dulles, acting for Mr. Truman and Secretary of State Acheson; and I visited a number of the Far Eastern countries. We spent several weeks in Japan, working with the different groups there in arriving at understandings, as best we could, and working on the rather difficult problem involving Nationalist China, particularly, and the whole China problem, as well.

It was then that I came to admire Mr. Dulles. I admired his tenacity, his power of intellect, and his skill in negotiating. One of the great services he has performed as Secretary of State has been in the field of negotiating between nations which had differences and problems which were most difficult to solve.

I share the feeling which has been expressed by my good friend, the Senator from Montana, as to the need for Mr. Dulles at present to deal with the particular problem about which the Senator from Montana will speak to us today. I am delighted to know that since Mr. Dulles' physical condition is such that his doctors advise his taking leave and entering a hospital, he has acted on that advice. I hope he will remain away from his work for as much time as will be necessary to result in a complete restoration of his health, which I am confident will take place, because I know something of the physical stamina of the man.

I wish him a speedy recovery and a return to his position as Secretary of State just as soon as he is able to do so. I feel certain that his influence will be felt in the negotiations in the various conferences which will be held in the future. I know that his assistants in the Department of State who have worked with him for so long and so well will be able to carry on. I am sure they will support Mr. Dulles, and that his negotiating ability will be felt in the conferences, and will continue to be helpful even in his absence.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I have been very happy to hear the expressions of good will toward Secretary Dulles which have been spoken today. I wish to join in them.

I have been a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations only 4 years, and have not been so closely associated with the work of Mr. Dulles as has the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], for instance, who has just concluded his very fine statement.

I think few men in public life have given so much of their time during so many years of their lives to the formulation and administration of foreign policy as has Secretary Dulles. I know the Nation is grateful to him for his accomplishments. I know ours is a bipartisan gratefulness, also, as the Senator from Alabama has well expressed.

I do not suppose that all of Mr. Dulles' plans have materialized as he hoped they would. But we must recall that he has been serving as Secretary of State and as adviser to the Secretary of State during one of the most critical periods of history, and many of the most difficult problems the world has faced have come before him for solution. We have seen the solution of some situations which were considered virtually insoluble—for instance, the situation in Trieste. I know all of us are happy to learn that there are prospects of permanent peace and harmony in the Island of Cyprus, where the Turks and the Greeks have come to an agreement.

I believe the whole world owes a considerable debt to Mr. Dulles. I wish to join my colleagues in hoping that Mr. Dulles will have a speedy recovery, following his trip to the hospital, and soon will again be back at work. Even though everything may not have gone as he hoped it would, yet I know of no one who could have achieved a larger percentage of success than he has over these troublesome years.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. CARLSON. I appreciate very much the opportunity to associate myself with the remarks of the acting majority leader [Mr. MANSFIELD], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], in regard to the Secretary of State, Mr. Dulles.

It seems to me that at this time, which seems to be one of our greatest international crises, our Nation and the other nations of the world can ill afford to spare the services of this most able man.

Secretary Dulles has demonstrated not only his ability, but, it seems to me, a peculiar temperament for working in this field. I think he gets that temperament and that background from being a great Christian layman. His interests are in people. I believe that is what we need during this period in the world's history. I think that one of our problems at the present time is to learn how to live with other people. Our generation has not done so well; as a matter of fact, we have fought about three wars in one generation. Somehow, in some way, our young people, the coming generation, must learn how to live with other people. When we learn to do that, I believe we shall be able to accomplish much in bringing about the peace and the economic conditions that all us of are praying and hoping for.

I wish for the Secretary of State a most speedy recovery. We need him. I know he will receive the best of care that doctors and medical skill can provide. So we look forward to his return to service.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a radio commentary by Jack Jurey on February 10, 1959, the evening of the announcement of the leave of absence for the Secretary of State.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This is Jack Jurey with the WTOP comment for tonight.

The newest illness of Secretary of State Dulles should cause us all to join President Eisenhower in extending best wishes to this dedicated official who, however much one may disagree with his policies, has worked so tirelessly on behalf of the United States.

We long ago lost track of the total mileage logged by Mr. Dulles in his peripatetic quest for peace, or the number of stops he has made, or the number of officials to whom he has talked in virtually all quarters of the globe.

But we do know this: that John Foster Dulles since 1953 has expended his energies and health at a reckless rate, at a time of life when most of us would be resigned to settling down with pipe and slippers. Especially since his operation for cancer, he has displayed an uncommon devotion to duty.

This newsman recalls particularly that after his next-to-last illness, a bout with diverticulitus, Mr. Dulles apologized to a news conference for not having seen reporters for a period of several weeks. Such an apology was not only unusual in an administration which sometimes seems to take a lackadaisical attitude toward newsmen, but was expressive of the inner stuff of this unusually gifted man. In many respects he is a far better public servant than some of his critics would have us believe.

Speaking of critics, it seems an appropriate time to mention that many Americans may not comprehend what has happened in the last decade to the office which Mr. Dulles holds.

For well over a century and a half, a Secretary of State was, for the most part a Cabinet official subjected only to comparatively minor strains, for the reason that the United States considered itself (and was, for the most part) a remote island in the vast sea of international troubles. In the occasional period when the Nation was confronted by brutal world realities, it was often the President himself who bore the brunt: Jefferson, Madison, Lincoln, Wilson, Franklin Roosevelt.

The post-World War II years, however, have seen an evolution and elevation of the Secretary of State's duties, to the point where this single man, whether he be George Marshall, Dean Acheson, or Dulles, has day-to-day responsibilities unparalleled in American history.

The reason, of course, is this country's reluctant emergence as a massive world power, with all the trials and tribulations that such a status implies. The world struggle with communism, conducted on multidimensional levels, is enough to strain the strength, patience, and resources of any man, and certainly one who, like Secretary Dulles, must carry with him the burdens of advanced age and the demands of an active Christian conscience.

We are among those who believe that, on occasion, Mr. Dulles has been mistaken. We consider, for example, that in some respects he has failed to demonstrate the resiliency of mind that new circumstances demand, although this criticism does not, for a moment, deny the intellectual qualifications that he brings to his task.

We who criticize, of course, could be wrong: only history will tell. But the fact that we demur on occasion does not diminish our respect for the man himself, one who carries a very heavy load indeed.

Nor does criticism obscure the undeniable fact that in this moment of history, with the Reds pounding on the door of West Berlin, Secretary Dulles is very nearly an indispensable man to his country. It would be a matter of great concern should he not regain his health and not be able to resume his duties at the State Department.

For both personal and national reasons we express the hope that Secretary Dulles will have a quick recuperation and will be able soon again to shoulder the full weight of his office.

And that's tonight's WTOP comment. This is Jack Jurey.

THE COMING CRISIS IN GERMANY

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, let me preface my remarks with this assurance to the Senate: I am not an alarmist. I measure most carefully the words I am about to speak. In that context, I express to the Senate my belief that just ahead lies the most critical period which the United States will have had to face since the conflict in Korea.

The crisis, Mr. President, is coming in Germany. Specifically, it is coming in Berlin. Indeed, it may have already begun. For years now, the seeds of that crisis have lain dormant in a divided Germany. They have been held in check only by a kind of mutual acquiescense. The Western Powers have not wished to disturb the seeming stability in Germany. Since the Berlin blockade, the Soviet Union has not seriously threatened it. A few years ago, uprisings of East Germans shook the stability, but did not break it.

Those who have thought at all about the German situation have known for a long time that the surface calm would not last. The existence of two German authorities in what is one Germany has been, from the end of World War II, a makeshift arrangement. The Western Powers have recognized it. The Soviet Union has acknowledged it. The German leaders know it.

The key question has never been, Will Germany be unified? The question has long been, When and how will Germany be unified? Those of us who have urged an initiative in American policy with respect to Germany have been aware of this distinction. When I addressed myself to this subject in the Senate in May 1958, I had the distinction very much in mind. Because I did, I tried to deal in the specifics of an American initiative. In suggesting, last May, alternatives to present policy, my thought was that when the status quo gave way, as surely it must, the changes ought at least to hold promise of leading to the strengthening of freedom in a peaceful Germany.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President will the Senator from Montana yield to me?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I am delighted to yield to my distinguished friend from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. I wish to apologize for interrupting so soon the remarks of the Senator from Montana, because I believe that the address he is delivering will be a most significant one. But I wish to say that, characteristically, in his opening remarks the Senator from Montana has pierced to the nub of the issue. Conditions in Germany are going to change. Germany will not indefinitely remain divided against itself. Germany will not indefinitely continue to be garrisoned by foreign troops.

It seems to me that those who say our foreign policy must be inflexible overlook the fact that ours is not a static world.

Therefore, Mr. President, I think the Senator from Montana rendered us a service when, a year ago, he emphasized the fact that conditions in Germany would be changing, and that we must be prepared to face up to those changes if we are to cope effectively with them. Flexibility in our foreign policy is a must. A steel blade bends. Pig iron breaks.

I wish to thank the Senator from Montana for coming forward at this stage in the developing Berlin crisis with a speech which will be helpful in giving guidance to all of us, to the President, and to the Secretary of State, in our common effort to solve that crisis for the benefit of the free world.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank my friend from Idaho.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, at this point will the Senator from Montana yield briefly to me?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, we have just returned to this Chamber from a most impressive joint session with the other body, in connection with the celebration of the 150th anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln. At the joint session, during a brilliant address by the great writer and poet, Carl Sandburg, he had occasion to quote a sentence from Abraham Lincoln, which I believe is pertinent today in connection with the splendid address which my friend, the Senator from Montana, is making on the German question. Lincoln said:

> The dogmas of the quiet past are inadequate for the stormy present.

I wish to congratulate my friend, the Senator from Montana, for the fine address he is making on the German problem.

However, I would not be true to myself if I did not register a slight dissent from some of the comments which have been made with respect to the Secretary of State.

It is unpleasant and unrewarding to say unkind things about a man who is in physical pain, who has shown great physical courage, who is unquestionably a patriot, who is a man of great dedication to the public interest; but I would feel untrue to myself if I did not register on the floor of the Senate a dissent to the statement that he is indispensable to the conduct of our foreign policy in the immediate future. I call attention to what I have said on other occasions with respect to this matter.

I hope that these comments will be taken in good part, and that it will be understood that I make them only because I cannot remain silent when it might be indicated that I was in accord with what has been said.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I appreciate what the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania has just said. I commend him for his honesty and his integrity. Of course, I recognize that it is not a new viewpoint on his part, but that he has been consistent in his views in this respect for some time. I would point out, however, that the immediate danger, as I see it, is the Berlin and the German situation. No one knows more about those situations at the present time or is better prepared to lead the allies in meeting them than is the Secretary of State. On that basis, as well as on other bases, I wish him well. I wish him a speedy recovery. I anticipate that in the not too distant future he will resume his duties, and will act, not as his own agent, but as the agent of the President of the United States, in conducting foreign policy.

Mr. CLARK. Obviously, I do not wish to engage in a colloquy of extended duration with my colleague at this time. I should like to be recorded as very much hoping and praying for Mr. Dulles' immediate recovery; but I cannot agree that there are not in the State Department others as well or better qualified than the Secretary to carry on the German negotiations. I appreciate that this is a situation on which the distinguished Senator from Montana and I disagree. I shall desist from further comment on this particular phase.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I shall desist, also.

Mr. President, I repeat, in suggesting, last May, alternatives to present policy, my thought was that when the status quo gave way, as surely it must, the changes ought at least to hold promise of leading to the strengthening of freedom in a peaceful Germany.

We did nothing, Mr. President. We took no initiative. We went on in the familiar vacuousness, in the familiar patterns of policy patterns devised years ago, in another setting, under another administration. We did not face the fact that that policy was adequate to maintain a semblance of stability in Germany only so long as all directly concerned acquiesced in the continued division of that nation.

That is water under the bridge. We did not choose to act in a positive fashion to change the status quo. Now, the Russians have chosen to break it. They have chosen to make the break at Berlin. They have said, in effect, that, after the spring of 1959, the situation will no longer be as it has been in that city. They are quite right, Mr. President. Things will no longer be the same in Berlin or anywhere in Germany. If there is any certainty, it is that the situation in Germany at the close of 1959 will be far different from the present situation. We are approaching the beginning of the end, the beginning of the end of two Berlins and of two Germanys.

The question, as I have already observed, was never, Would Germany be unified? It was, When and how would Germany be unified? We may now have begun to comprehend the when; the actual process of unification is likely to begin this year. Only one question remains: How is Germany to be unified?

Will it be by conflict, by negotiation, or by some mixture of the two? That is the question which is impelling us and the rest of the world toward the coming crisis in Germany.

CONSTITUTIONAL RESPONSIBILITIES IN THE GERMAN CRISIS

The responsibility for establishing binding foreign policies to deal with the impending crisis, the coming change in Germany, rests with the President and his Secretary of State. Let there be no doubt on that score, in this body, at home, in the executive branch, or abroad. It is not for the Senate to direct the President in this matter. The President will have to make his own decisions, with the assistance of the vast resources of the executive branch. When he speaks officially on Germany, however, he will be speaking for all of us, whether or not we agree with what he says. There is no other way under the constitutional system of the United States.

To say that is not to constrain upon the Senate a silence in these matters. On the contrary, since we shall be bound, since the people of the United States shall be bound, by what the President and his Secretary of State do or fail to do in the coming crisis, the obligation of the Senate to debate, to discuss, and to advise is real and it is compelling.

The Senate of the 86th Congress was not constituted so that it might ignore pressing domestic questions. How much less then, can we remain silent on the life-and-death matters of foreign policy? The President and the Secretary of State have given no indication that they would have this body turn its back on the crisis in Germany. On the contrary, I note that the Secretary of State has already sought the counsel of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. FULBRIGHT]. I commend the Secretary for his initiative. The brilliant chairman of the committee has much to contribute to the development of policy for the situation in Germany.

If the Senate is to meet its responsibilities, Mr. President, we must form, through debate and discussion, an understanding of the situation as it is, and as it is evolving in Germany. We must also discern clearly the stakes of the people of the United States and of freedom in that situation. We must advance, finally, ideas for consideration in formulating the foreign policies which are to safeguard the vital interests of our people.

These are the thoughts which have led me to these remarks on the coming crisis in Germany. I make them in the spirit of responsible Democratic cooperation with a Republican administration in a matter of vital concern to all the people of the United States.

TWO GERMAN AUTHORITIES IN ONE GERMANY

Let me begin by exploring the significant realities in Germany, as I see them. The basic reality, Mr. President, is that there are two political authorities in one Germany. That is a contradiction which cannot and will not stand. There is one Germany. And there are compelling historic and practical reasons which require that the unity of that nation begin to emerge without delay if there is to be peace in Europe and in the world.

I stress the point, Mr. President, that when we speak of the two Germanies we are really speaking not of two nations but of two political authorities. Each of these authorities presumes that it is the wave of the future in all Germany. Each seeks to draw the whole of the German people into its orbit.

To be sure, there are profound differences between the West German government in Bonn and the East German Communist regime in Pankow. The Bonn government is based upon principles and practices of democracy which are consonant with those of other Western nations and are expressly supported by the inhabitants of West Germany. The Pankow regime exists by the methods of authoritarianism which come from the East. Its source of authority lies in the will to power of those who wield the authority and the acquiescence—however sullen—of the repressed people of East Germany. Its survival depends, to a far greater degree than anything we know in the Western democracies, on military and police power—its own and the Soviet Union's.

The West German democratic government exists. It is there, at Bonn, and the Communists are not going to wish it away or subvert it away. It is going to stay as long as the people in that zone sustain it and as long as the Western nations remain committed to its protection against military aggression from the East. We cannot ignore the fact, however, that the East German regime also exists. It is there at Pankow, and German communists run it, even though Russians may pull the strings from behind the curtain. Unfortunately, I see no evidence that the Western nations are going to wish away or subvert away that East German political authority in the practicable future.

If neither side can be wished away, or subverted away, how then is the division of Germany going to be made to disappear? How is a unified Germany, this essential Germany, this inevitable Germany, going to emerge? There was a time, perhaps, when it might have been reasonable to hope that the Russians and German Communists would soon find it too costly to maintain their control in East Germany. For years we have waited for this promised development. We have waited for the Russians and their campfollowers to fold their tents and steal away.

What we must ask ourselves now is whether there is any realistic basis for hoping that this development will come about in the practicable future? I regret to say that such public indications as there are suggest that the Pankow regime, with Soviet support, is consolidating its position, that its authoritarian hold on East Germany is, if anything, more secure today than it was a few years ago.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. With respect to the last thought expressed, the Senator from Montana has stated that the authoritarian hold on East Germany is now greater than it was before. Will the Senator deal a little more in detail with that, and state whether the hold is the result of the power of the Communists, or whether it is the will of the people that they be held by the Communists?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I should be delighted to try to answer my distinguished friend from Ohio. I can say, of course, without equivocation that the present status is not the desire or the will of the people. The source of my statement is the U.S. News & World Report, the issue of February 13, 1959.

> East Germany's Communist government has just published official figures on its planned expenditures for 1959.

Before I read further I wish to say that all the information I have in my presentation has appeared in the public print. There is nothing secret or official about what I am saying, and it simply represents one Senator's opinion as to what I think is the most difficult and dangerous question of today.

I continue with the quotation from the U.S. News & World Report:

> West German financial experts, looking into the Reds' figures, in the budget and out of it, made a startling discovery.
> Military spending by the East German Reds in 1959 is to be 30 percent higher than military spending planned by West Germany. Yet the Reds say that West Germany is threatening the peace of the world.

That is what I mean when I say that the Pankow regime is more secure, not in a political sense but in a military sense. They have been strengthening themselves on a military and paramilitary basis. Of course, the 22 to 23 Soviet divisions are still in East Germany.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I agree with the Senator. My inclination would be to believe that the people of East Germany, if they had the opportunity, would unshackle themselves of the hold which the Soviet has upon them.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The Senator is absolutely correct. I have been told that the figure would run as high as 95 to 96 percent of the East Germans who, if they had the opportunity to vote, would vote against the present Ulbricht regime.

Mr. LAUSCHE. But the fact is that the Soviets and those of East Berlin who agree with the Soviets are applying constantly heavier pressure in the development of the military?

Mr. MANSFIELD. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, it is all very well to hope, as a general principle, for the disappearance of totalitarianism. We have held that principle for decades, but we have also had to live in a world which has contained since its beginning and still contains many totalitarian regimes.

No, Mr. President, a valid policy on Germany, now, must be built on more than the hope of the eventual disappearance of German totalitarianism. It can only be built on the premise that Germany, in one way or another, is going to unify and it is going to begin to unify soon. Further, it can only be built on the premise that that unity in Germany, if it is to come in peace, is likely to fall short of the ultimate goals set for it by both the Communist nations and the free nations—the goal, on the one hand, of a Communist totalitarian Germany, and the goal, on the other, of a fully representative democracy in all Germany.

Until a few months ago there might have been a possibility of evading that reality for a while longer by assuming that the status quo of division in Germany might go on indefinitely. But the prospect of evasion is now narrowing rapidly in the wake of Mr. Khrushchev's announcement of the coming Soviet withdrawal from Berlin. The blunt fact is that soon either negotiations leading to German unification in peace shall begin in earnest or there shall begin in earnest the use of force to that end.

BERLIN—THE CORE OF THE COMING CRISIS

This brings me to a second matter which we must explore, Mr. President, if we are to see our way clearly in the impending crisis. That is the question of Berlin. It is at Berlin, divided Berlin, and along the western routes of access to the city, that the first indications of the conflict leading to war or the success of negotiations leading to stable peace are likely to appear in the coming months.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to review the historic circumstances surrounding the present difficulties of the Western position in Berlin. It is simple enough to find fault with what was done or not done by political and military leaders years ago. It is as easy, as it is pompous, to pass angry judgments on others, with the prop of hindsight. That process will serve no useful purpose in this situation.

Nor shall I take the time of the Senate to review the legal status of our position in Berlin. Some may find solace for our difficulties in legalism. Even the Russians sought justification for their actions in it. But legalism is at best a dubious way to deal with an explosive situation, when there are, as there are in this situation, two opposing judges, two opposing judgments, and two opposing instruments of mass destruction for enforcing the judgments.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I wish the Senator from Montana would discuss in a little greater detail the element of legalism being introduced. I have my own understanding of it. I think we are advocating the proposition that there are certain legal obligations rooted in agreements which we have made in the past, and that in making our demands we insist upon adherence to those obligations. Does the Senator mind discussing that question?

Mr. MANSFIELD. The Senator from Ohio is correct. References have been made to the agreements made at Potsdam relative to the occupation of Berlin.

References have been made to the agreement entered into by Gen. Lucius Clay, at that time commander of our forces in Germany, with the Soviet authorities, by means of which we were guaranteed by the Soviet authorities access by rail, by road, and by air, from the western zones in Germany into the western sectors of Berlin.

Then, as I recall—and I believe the Senator will corroborate me on this—some sort of agreement was made by Mr. Phillip Jessup and a Russian representative whose name I cannot recall at the moment, which agreement Mayor Willy Brandt brought to our attention at the luncheon held in the Foreign Relations Committee room the other day. If I remember correctly, he stated that out of these Jessup-Russian consultations and agreements, which brought an end to the need for the allied airlift into Berlin, also came an agreement that we be allowed continued access. He suggested that we look into the agreement to which he referred as the agreement of 1949. Unfortunately I have not had an opportunity to do so yet.

But there are these agreements, or alleged agreements, which give us the right to go in and to maintain access between the western zones and the west sector of Berlin.

The Russians predicate their claims on similar agreements, which they say were made at Potsdam and elsewhere.

Mr. LAUSCHE. It is the position of the Senator from Montana, then, that the problem is more involved and far graver in its possible consequences to world peace than mere adherence to those agreements would justify. We must go beyond that.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The Senator is absolutely correct, because in my opinion the potentials involved in this situation are terrible and tremendous.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MANSFIELD. It does not much matter now how we got to Berlin, or why the Russians have no legal right to ask us to leave. What does matter, Mr. President, is why we need to stay in Berlin, as stay there we must. We are, bluntly, in a highly difficult and dangerous position in Berlin. Great sacrifices may be entailed in remaining. We had better understand clearly now the significance of maintaining our position there. We had better understand now what is vital and what is not vital in that position to the people of the United States and to freedom.

The administration has responded to the Russian proposals on Berlin by reiterating a long-standing view of the Nation. It has said, as the Democratic administration before it said, that we will not be driven from the city. The position of this Government, to stand firm in Berlin, has been endorsed by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. It is supported by Democrats and Republicans alike in the Senate.

It is a sound position. Only it is not enough. It is not enough to say, Mr. President, that we are standing fast in Berlin. That is a slogan, not a policy. Nor is it enough, Mr. President, to stand fast merely to demonstrate our determination to maintain our legal interpretation of the situation as against the Soviet Union's.

Nor is it enough to say that we stand fast in Berlin so that we may continue to demonstrate in the heart of Communist Germany the material superiority of freedom or free enterprise over Communist collectivism. To be sure, there is a striking contrast between West Berlin and East Berlin, but I doubt very much that the people of the United States will countenance the sacrifice of a single human life for the purposes of propagandistic demonstrations in Berlin. And before this year is out many lives may have been spent in Berlin.

No, Mr. President, it is not for reasons of legalism or propaganda that we stand fast in Berlin. The Western nations are in Berlin because Berlin belongs neither to East Germany nor West Germany; it belongs to all the German people. We are in Berlin because some Germans may now look to Bonn and others to Pankow for leadership, but all Germans will soon look to Berlin. We are in Berlin to see to it that when that city is once again the capital of all Germany, as it surely will be, the concept of freedom in peace will not be absent from the scene. If that concept were to disappear from Berlin, the citadel of German nationalism, sooner or later it would disappear from all Germany. Then, sooner or later, the torch would be lit in Germany, whether by German hands or some others, to set Europe and the world aflame once again. That torch was lit twice in Berlin in the past, and twice the world has paid an enormous human price. To see that it is not lit again is in the essential, the vital interest of this generation and future generations of the people of the United States.

That, Mr. President, is the reason which beyond all others, justifies the taking of the great risks which we may soon be called upon to take at Berlin and along the western routes to the city. We are in Berlin in order to get out, but to get out only on condition that the German political forces which stand for freedom in peace have a sure footing and equal chance to survive and to grow on their merits in the future capital of all Germany.

I support fully the position of this administration on the necessity of standing fast in Berlin. I question, however, the adequacy with which we have related that position to the changing situation in Germany. I question a policy which provides that not only do we stand fast in Berlin, but also implores or demands that the Russians stand fast. After years of trying to get the Russians out of the innumerable places into which they sprawled after World War II, it is indeed strange to hear that we are insisting that the Russians must not, indeed, cannot, leave Berlin. That is a most peculiar position to say the least; and the Russians obviously have no intention of obliging us by remaining.

It is clear what is afoot there. In a few months hence, the Russians will leave East Berlin despite our demands or urgings to the contrary. East Berlin will then be, once again, a German city—Communist, to be sure—but nevertheless German. By contrast, West Berlin will retain the appearance it now has, the appearance of a Western enclave in the heart of Germany, for there are thousands of Allied officials and military personnel in the area. The contrast will not be lost on German nationalists in East or West Germany.

Further, Mr. President, if we are to hold this enclave without struggle, it will be at the sufferance of the East German Communist authorities. If they do not choose to accommodate us, then we shall in all probability have to fight our way through to Berlin, not against Russians, but against Germans. Even if this course does not lead to a great conflict, the repercussions in Germany will be profound. Among Germans, as among others, blood may prove thicker than ideologies.

As I said, there can be no quarrel with the need to stand fast in Berlin. I do question, however, a policy which does not anticipate the developments which I have just outlined and fails to take steps to mitigate them.

I question, too, a policy which presumes as our policy does that the Great Powers of World War II—the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom, France, and the United States—can bring about German unification. There may have been a time when such a course was possible. If it ever existed, however, it was years ago when Germany lay devastated and prostrate. It was years ago, in the freshness of the common sacrifices of World War II and in the measure of mutual respect and tolerance which these sacrifices engendered.

Those years are gone. The time is not today. Today, there is little respect between this Nation and the Soviet Union except the fearful respect which the military power of the one may generate in the other. Today, Germany is neither devastated nor prostrate; it has become once again the most dynamic nation in Western Europe.

No, Mr. President, the erstwhile Allies, the divided Allies of World War II, are not in a position to ordain a unification in peace for a revitalized Germany. At most, they may be able to contribute to that unification by rethinking their own security needs in anticipation of its inevitable development. At most, they may be able to contribute to unification by exercising such influence as they may possess to encourage the Germans themselves to reach a reasonable procedure on unification and by sanctioning that procedure if it is sound. It is the Germans, themselves, however, who will make the decisive decisions on unification, if they are to be made in peace.

FREE ALL-GERMAN ELECTIONS

Further, Mr. President, I question, in present circumstances, a policy which presumes to lead to the peaceful unification of Germany solely on the basis of free, all-German elections. I say now what I said last May on this point, only with more emphasis. Events have moved a long way since this policy was devised and the bell no longer has an altogether recognizable sound when it is rung over and over again in the same fashion. A German political authority has emerged in the West. Another political structure has appeared in the East which is manned by Germans, even if it is not directed by them. Whatever we may think of this structure, there is no reliable indication that it is going to go away peacefully, of its own accord.

There are now military and paramilitary German forces in both East and West Germany. How are these forces to be integrated in peace? Is this a problem that can be solved by free, all-German elections, at least without extensive preparations by the Germans who officer these opposing forces?

There are differing economic and social structures functioning in Western and Eastern Germany. How are these structures to be fused in peace? Can they be harmonized by free, all-German elections, at least without extensive preparations by those Germans who operate them?

I cite these problems as examples. There are no doubt others of a similar nature. A policy which advances no thought on how they are to be met does not begin to meet the realities of the German situation. If the unification of Germany is essential and inevitable and if it is neither our responsibility nor in the interest of this Nation to seek that unity by force, then I submit that a policy which merely clings to an unrealizable slogan of free all-German elections, which does not pursue German unification by other means, is no policy at all. It is a straitjacket. It is an excuse for immobility. It may well lead down the blind alley of an unnecessary conflict or disastrous diplomatic retreat.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I take it, from what the Senator has stated, that the efforts to procure an overall election of citizens of East and West Germany have thus far proved to be futile.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The East Germans will not consent to have an election under which their people can give expression to the type of government they want. Based upon the fact that that objective is an unrealizable objective, an overall free election, the Senator from Montana suggests that other means should be explored to procure a solution of the problem. I wish the Senator would comment on that point.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I believe that the position of the Western Powers on the question of all-German elections is one which stands no possibility in the immediate future, and perhaps in the indefinite future, of achieving any degree of success. Therefore we should try to work out other means.

As I shall indicate in the course of my speech, there are contacts in existence between the East German Government and the West German Government. These contacts are made on an interzonal basis, and are tied up with commercial intercourse and trade commitments. I would hope that in considering the idea of elections, we might be able to explore, perhaps, ideas other than all-German elections, even though they are the most desirable, and I should like to see them come to pass, and we might try to break it down—and the sooner the better—so that the East Germans could express themselves at the polls, perhaps just in East Germany, and declare to the world where they want to go. In that way they might get out from under the yoke the Ulbricht government, which is exercising despotic and complete control over 17 million Germans in East Germany.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator from Montana clarifies my mind on the subject. In other words, all of us want a free election under which the people themselves would decide the type of government they desire to have.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Absolutely.

Mr. LAUSCHE. However, every effort in that direction has been rebuffed, and it is therefore necessary to find other means of trying to reach an agreement.

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is the idea. The Senator is correct. Every effort to achieve an all-German election has failed because of the insistent and dogmatic "nyet" of the Soviet Union.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Do I understand correctly the position of the Senator from Montana to be that, while he adheres to what we have advocated so long, that is, free elections for all of Germany, and the idea of a unified Germany, he recognizes the very practical difficulty of having that under present conditions? Therefore he says that perhaps we ought to make ourselves more flexible and start exploring some other way, and that there might be held a separate election in East Germany and a separate election in West Germany, and thus perhaps there could be agreement upon some kind of independent government in each of the two areas, with the idea that eventually, as he says, because blood is thicker than water, with teamwork the two temporary Germanys will combine themselves into one overall united Germany some time in the future, even though we know not how far in the future.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The purpose of my speech today is to suggest, respectfully and constructively, some possible alternative which may be of value to the Department of State, or out of which may come ideas which would be worthwhile toward the bringing about of a solution to this most difficult problem.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I should like to propound a question to the Senator from Montana. He spoke about the rigidity of our position in the past. Undoubtedly it has been rather rigid, so rigid that perhaps our country, as well as a great part of the world, was rather shocked recently when Secretary Dulles suggested there might be more flexibility than we have given to the idea, and when he suggested there might be methods other than free elections for the solution of the problem. Is it not true, and would not the Senator agree with me in this, that perhaps we have oversimplified the matter in assuming that a reunification could be easily brought about between the two Germanys?

I may say that about 3 years ago I had the pleasure of attending an international conference at Garmisch in Germany. The conference was made up of people from all the NATO countries, representatives of governments, officials, business people, economists, members of Parliament, and so on, and one of the German Ministers with whom I had quite a long talk made the point to me, the first time I had ever heard it mentioned, that reunification is not a simple matter. As has been pointed out by the Senator from Montana, it might have been a relatively simple matter several years ago, right after the war. But since that time the two Germanys have grown away from the conditions which the Senator has so well described in his speech. They have grown away from some of the incentives which might have pushed them together.

Furthermore, different enactments have taken place. For instance, the Minister of the Bonn government said to me, "This may sound strange, coming from me, but East Germany has a social security system which in many respects is better than ours."

Mr. MANSFIELD. It also antedates our own.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. Although I was speaking of the social security of West Germany, it is also true that theirs antedates ours, too.

East Germany has a system which is in many respects better than that in West Germany, so the East Germans could not be asked to give up their system of social security, workmen's compensation, and land reform.

The Senator from Montana, I believe, heard me ask the mayor of West Berlin the other day that very question, and he heard the mayor's comments, to the effect that to bring the two Germanys together, whenever it may be done, will necessitate the resolving of differences and the making of allowances between the two governments. As I understand, that is exactly what the Senator is talking about. He is speaking of the necessity on the part of those concerned to be ready to consider and to negotiate with reference to all the changes which have taken place throughout the years.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I commend the Senator from Montana for making this very able speech and calling to our attention a matter which is not only of tremendous importance but also of great timeliness. After all, the ultimatum will expire on May 28, which is not far off. It has been suggested since the ultimatum was made that perhaps there will not be absolute adherence to that exact date. Nevertheless, we are approaching the day when Russia will leave Berlin.

I think the Senator is correct in saying that Russia will leave, and that the United States will be placed in a rather ridiculous position if we try to keep Russia there, when, as a matter of fact, we have been saying to the world for many years that she should get out of the different countries which she occupies.

Mr. MANSFIELD. As a matter of fact, the Soviet Union has already withdrawn some of its troops and a considerable number of the dependents of those troops. So it does not appear that Russia was fooling when it delivered its ultimatum. I hope that the United States will do, as I feel certain we are doing, everything possible to develop alternatives and to consider ways and means to meet the situation, if and when it arises, when the deadline occurs, as the Senator from Alabama has pointed out, on May 27.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think the Senator from Montana is exactly correct. Certainly we should be exploring all the alternatives. I think the Senator will agree with me that we ought not simply, easily, and quickly reject any proposal which is made, but that we should be willing to let the world know that we are willing to sit down and negotiate concerning every proposal which may come from either side.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes. I hope both the Soviet Union and the United States will get away from the automatic reactions of the proposals which one country makes to the other. Usually the answer is an automatic "No." Once in a while a "maybe" or a "perhaps" and occasionally a "yes" would be useful. I think in that way we might begin, at least on the marginal level, to do away with some of the differences. If we can do that, perhaps we can work our way upward to an eventual solution of the bigger problems.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The other day, in the talk with the mayor of West Berlin, I was greatly encouraged by his reasonableness in wanting to explore every avenue which might lead us out of darkness into the light and to an assured peace for those people. May I ask the Senator from Montana if he has given any consideration to the ability of the Soviet Union, after it has once withdrawn its troops, to jump in again because of its closeness to this area of East Berlin?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I have, indeed. If the Senator will bear with me, I shall discuss that subject briefly when I come to the ninth point in my recommendation.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator from Montana.

MILITARY WITHDRAWAL IN GERMANY AND CENTRAL EUROPE

Mr. MANSFIELD. Finally, Mr. President, I question a policy which appears to regard as sacrosanct present military arangements in Germany and central Europe. I can understand, I can accept, I can support the concept that Western Germany's ties with Western Europe are essential to the peace of Europe and they must not be broken. Within that concept, however, I cannot comprehend a view which seems to hold inflexibly to the present form and extent of German rearmament. We have accepted and even encouraged rises in the German military contribution to NATO in certain circumstances in the past. I do not see that we cannot accept and encourage declines in that contribution in other circumstances in the future.

Security needs are ever-changing needs. Western German rearmament is not an end in itself. It is for the purpose of the defense of German freedom in common with the defense of the freedom of the Western community. It is not for the purpose of keeping rigid the tables of organization and the projections of presumed needs by the military command of NATO. These projections, in any event, have not been met for years and the world has not yet come to an end.

The nature and extent of German rearmament and of non-German armaments on German soil, in short, is one area of the problem of unification in which reasonable proposals for negotiation, wherever they may originate, ought not to be rejected out of hand. That is especially the case if these proposals are related to the reduction of military power throughout central Europe. I know full well that the Russians may have no intention of withdrawing from the Eastern European States in any circumstances. Nevertheless, I can see no reason to make it easier for them to justify their remaining by a seeming intransigence on our part. I cannot see that the road to the eventual freedom of states like Poland and Czechoslovakia is made easier by such a process.

RUSSIAN ROLE IN THE COMING CRISIS

Mr. President, let me turn now to the question of Russian intentions in the coming crisis in Germany. In this matter there is only one certain course. Whatever they may do, we must assume that the Russians are acting to enhance the position of the Soviet Union and that of totalitarian communism throughout Germany and Europe. We must also assume that they will use whatever methods they believe will lead to these ends, not excluding aggressive war. The Russians may blow hot or they may blow cold. They may down a plane on their border one day. They may release a blocked convoy the next. We cannot know with certainty why they act as they act at any given moment.

We cannot know with certainty the purport of Mr. Mikoyan's recent visit to the United States. We cannot know with certainty the meaning of Mr. Khrushchev's comments on a thaw in the cold war. They may be meant to provide a setting for successful negotiations. They may be meant simply to confuse or beguile.

If they do confuse, if they do beguile, however, we shall have no one to blame but ourselves. We ought to be able by this time, years after the ill-fated Geneva Conference of 1955, to distinguish between the conciliatory gesture and the act of conciliation. Those of us who come from the cold country have learned through bitter experience that winter thaws can be followed by summer frosts. The promise of spring in February is not the same as the coming of spring in May.

There is, as I say, no way of knowing with certainty what some particular Soviet gesture or other signifies. What we can know, Mr. President, is that they are all, good or bad, peripheral to the crisis which is coming in Germany. Mr. Mikoyan's visit is not going to free us from that crisis. Mr. Khrushchev's thaws will not do it. Increased Soviet-American trade has little relation to it.

If we are to be prepared to face this crisis in Germany it will be best not to become distracted or obsessed by the twists and turns of Soviet behavior. It will be best to keep our eyes on Germany. The fundamental question of policy for us is not so much what the Russians are looking for in Germany. We know what they are looking for; and they may very well seize it while we amuse or fascinate ourselves by trying to interpret the charades of Russian behavior.

No, Mr. President; more important, far more important, to us is to know what we ourselves are seeking in Germany. We must bring to this crisis not only courage, but also conviction. We must bring to it a positive and understandable policy which meets our essential national needs and the essential needs of freedom.

THE ESSENTIALS OF A WESTERN POLICY IN THE COMING CRISIS

As I noted earlier in my remarks, it is not for the Senate to direct the President and the Secretary of State in the conduct of the foreign relations of the United States. But it is a responsibility of Senators to try to contribute constructively—and I wish to repeat the word "constructively"—to the policies which govern those relations. It is in that sense, Mr. President, that I seek, in these final comments, to express the thoughts which this exploration suggests—thoughts on the essentials of a sound Western policy for the coming crisis in Germany. I have no crystal ball. I have no secret information. I have not been coached by anyone, nor have I been asked by anyone to deliver this speech. What I suggest may not be valid in the light of the greater understanding of others. It is one Senator's views, based upon what he has read, what he has heard, what he has tried to reason. It is, in short, the course which suggests itself to me on the basis of the understanding which I have been able to draw out of the confusion and complexity of the German situation. I can be—and may well be—wrong; and I stand ready to accept a better illumination of the problem through discussion and debate in the Senate. For whatever they may be worth, however, I outline the following points as essentials of a sound Western policy on Germany.

First. It is essential, Mr. President, that forces representing the concept of freedom in peace not be driven out of Berlin. They need, at the least, to remain on a basis of equality with the forces of totalitarian communism in the future capital of Germany. If those forces are to have a chance to remain in peace, a Western initiative for peace is essential.

Second. It is time to call upon German leaders of the two Berlin communities—East and West—to begin serious efforts to unify the municipal government and public services of that city.

Third. To that end, Mr. President, it would be helpful to enlist the conciliatory services of the Secretary-General of the United Nations. If agreement can be reached by East Germany and West Germany to establish an all-Berlin government, then it will be desirable to replace both Soviet and Allied forces with a United Nations interim police force composed of contingents from nations not directly involved. That force might supervise the agreement, and might see to it that all the routes of access to the city remain open until Berlin once again becomes the capital of a peaceful, unified Germany. It may be that in the Berlin microcosm there may evolve patterns of unification which will be applicable to the larger problem of all-German unification.

Fourth. If this approach or some such approach to a unified, neutralized Berlin fails, Mr. President, then it is essential that the forces representing the concept of freedom in peace in Berlin remain in Berlin, regardless of whether the Russians leave. Let them go, if they will. I would not wish to see this country a party to any insistence that they stay.

Fifth. At the same time, however, the forces representing freedom in Berlin must be Germanized as rapidly as possible. It is time to think seriously of replacing the thousands of allied military personnel in Berlin with German militia, fully supported by NATO guarantees.

Sixth. Some may regard discussions between Germans of the West and Germans of the East as tantamount to recognition of the East German Communist regime. Some who regard as appeasement not only talk, but even thought, which apparently is alien to them, on the serious problems of the Nation, may even go so far as to label with this stamp of political chicanery any proposals of meetings between East and West Germans. Let them do it, Mr. President; it is their privilege.

But let me say this: If talk constitutes recognition or appeasement, then we have appeased and recognized Communist China, because a representative of this Government has been talking on its behalf, on and off, for years, with a Chinese Communist representative in Geneva and Warsaw. If talk constitutes recognition or appeasement, then the West Germans have recognized and appeased Pankow for years. The fact is that East Germans and West Germans have worked out practical agreements of various kinds between the two zones of Germany. As early as 1957, West Germany's exports to East Germany for the year totaled $201 million. During the first half of 1958, $125 million in trade moved in each direction. That kind of trade, Mr. President, does not take place without talk.

I do not know what the theory of international law may be. I do not know whether talk is tantamount to recognition. I do know that, as a practical matter, we have talked with, but have not recognized, Communist China. West Germans have talked with and traded with, but have not recognized, Pankow. What is involved in the coming crisis in Germany is not a classroom problem on the theory of international law. It is the life or death problem of peace or war. The stake is the lives of tens of millions of human beings, Americans included.

I cannot see that there is going to be any peaceful solution of this problem without a great deal of talk—between Germans who are in authority in the Federal Republic and Germans who purport to be in authority in the Eastern zone. It seems to me essential, moreover, that this talk cover the whole range of problems of unification of the two zones, the whole range of problems involving the harmonizing of the political, economic, and military systems of the two zones.

Seventh. There is a point beyond which the search for peace can lead to the jeopardizing of freedom. Regardless of whatever agreements emerge, it seems to me essential that the people of East Germany have some genuine choice in the form of control which is exercised over them. There must be provision for the protection of the rights of all peaceful political forces in all Germany. All-German elections may not be essential—although I think them highly desirable—but at least there must be a chance for men and women of Eastern Germany, as well as those of Western Germany, to express themselves and their political preferences and to participate in political affairs without the threat of terror.

Whatever may be the details of the fusion of the two zones, they are best left to the Germans of the two zones. The Germans are likely to know better than anyone else what will suit them and what is possible among them. Furthermore, it is inconceivable that at this late date the erstwhile allies of World War II can work out these details on their behalf.

Eighth. The contribution which the Western allies, as well as the Soviet Union, need to make, if there is to be peace, is to guarantee, for a period of time, the kind of unified Germany which may emerge from discussions among the Germans. What the former allies need to do is to see to it that a unified Germany neither is subjected to military pressures from its neighbors, nor becomes a source of military pressure to its neighbors.

Ninth. To that end, Mr. President, it is essential to include within the scope of our policy the search for agreements which, while they do not compel a severance of West Germany's numerous ties with Western Europe, may lead to limitations of armaments throughout Germany and central Europe. Also needed are agreements which will pull back the so-called ultimate weapons and the armed forces of both East and West from the points of imminent contact in Germany and in central Europe. In short, Mr. President, it seems to me essential that our policy, NATO's policies, do not exclude a careful consideration of the Rapacki plan, the Eden plan for a demilitarized zone in middle Europe, or similar proposals in connection with the unification of Germany. Perhaps the best way to consider these matters would be to predicate them on reasonable agreements which may emerge from the Geneva Conferences on Surprise Attacks and the Suspension of Nuclear Tests.

Now getting back to what the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio [Mr.

LAUSCHE] mentioned a while ago, he asked, I believe, if I recognized the significance of a pullback and how it would benefit the Soviet Union. I do recognize that in some kinds of pullback the Western Powers would receive the worst of it, but I think we ought to recognize also that if there is to be any possibility of peace, we shall have to make some concessions; this might be one of them. We need to recognize that in so doing, if a withdrawal, based on a reasonable solution were brought about, we would be the ones who would take a loss in position, since the Soviet divisions, in going back to the heartland, would be in striking distance and would be better prepared than we would be to carry on any military activity in that area. But we have to develop give and take, by starting from the bottom and working upward. If we do not get out of the position of rigidity, I believe the situation in Berlin and in Germany will become worse, and the bases on which there can be peace will become fewer and fewer.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I agree with the statement of the Senator. In my opinion, there is a condition existing in which, if the Soviet Government continues to dictate to the government of East Berlin, it will be impossible to bring about a reconciliation of East and West Berlin. Soviet Russia will not tolerate it. Based upon the adamant position of Soviet Russia, and based upon the rigidity of the situation as described by the Senator from Montana, while the matters about which I have spoken are highly desirable, I agree we should look for other avenues to escape the great holocaust which seems to be threatening us in the future. I, for one—and I believe confirmation has been given to this view by the mayor of West Berlin—would want every avenue explored, talks had, continued talks, in the hope that some solution may be found.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The Senator is correct.

Mr. President, I have taken a great deal of the Senate's time today. I have tried not to take it lightly. I have done so because it is clear that this administration, following the example of its predecessor, has committed the Nation to stand fast at Berlin.

It is a resolve well taken. Since we cannot yet perceive to what extremity of sacrifice it may lead in the months ahead, I have felt it essential to try to set forth for the consideration of the Senate my understanding of what is involved in the coming crisis in Germany. I am grateful that in this crucial time the Senate's principal Member in these matters, the outstanding Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] is a man with such a deep understanding and intelligent grasp of the international forces that play on the Nation. I hope that he will make his voice heard; I am sure that the President and the Secretary of State will listen most carefully. I would hope, further, that between them will evolve a policy that all of us, as Americans, will be glad to support.

Most important, Mr. President, I hope that the President of the United States, his Secretary of State, and the Congress will fortify the resolve to stand fast in Berlin with the conviction which only a positive policy for peace can give it. The Secretary of State has spoken of mutual concessions. Those are calm and wise words for this moment in time, with the clouds of radioactive death waiting to envelop the earth. I hope, deeply, that they will lead to a positive policy for peace. It is that kind of a policy for which rational men everywhere are waiting. It is that kind of a policy which they will be able to comprehend and to which, if need be, they will be able willingly to consecrate their lives.

The policy has yet to be formed. It needs to be formed soon. If it is formed, the concept of freedom in peace will not perish in Berlin, in Germany, or in the world.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It has been a treat to be privileged to hear an excellent speech, such as the one which has just been concluded by a great man. The distinguished Senator from Montana has made many contributions to the cause of peace in the world, but none more important than his forceful statement today. Always responsible, always constructive, we his colleagues in the Senate take great pride in serving with him.

On behalf of the State which I represent, I wish to say to the State from which he comes that the world is a better world because of MIKE MANSFIELD, and that the suggestions he has made today, predicated upon the great philosophy of Isaiah's advice, "Come now, let us reason together," should be heard around the world.

I thank the Senator for his constructive contribution. I feel very humble to be able to sit in his presence.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the distinguished Senator from Texas.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I was given a copy of the fine address which the distinguished Senator from Montana delivered today. I read it, and I have heard part of the address today.

I agree very much with the very fine encomium paid by the distinguished majority leader to the Senator from Montana. As many folks have said, "MIKE MANSFIELD is a real guy." I agree with that statement.

I can agree with much the Senator from Montana has stated. I particularly agree about the need for us in this Chamber to discuss responsibly and constructively not only foreign policies but also all measures in that manner. Full and free debate was and is an essential element of a bipartisan approach.

I wish to say to the very able Senator, there is no need for the Senator to reassure the Senate regarding his serious purpose and his careful choice of words. I and my colleagues on this side of the aisle always are confident the Senator will give sober, intelligent and constructive addresses on any subject, foreign policy or anything else. He is "that sort of guy," as someone has said. The Senator has set high standards for himself, and I congratulate him.

I should like to record my agreement with the Senator concerning the seriousness of the Berlin situation and the need for all of us to maintain open minds and the utmost of flexibility, in considering possible avenues for a possible resolution of the problem, in accord with the free world interest. Indeed, I think we have been given a sound account of the background of the situation in Germany, as well as a number of clues—I hesitate to call them all essentials—toward finding the peaceful solution we seek.

However, I should also like to state my belief that at least two main elements in the current German scene have been barely mentioned in my colleague's notable speech.

The first missing ingredient concerns the past and continuing requirement that the United States consult with and move in concert with its allies, especially France, Great Britain, and West Germany. There is no question that the Soviet Union, acting only in its own interests, in the very nature of things has been able to represent itself as ostensibly more flexible than the West in propaganda and diplomatic approaches to central European problems.

We must remember that the West German Government itself has been a foremost exponent of firmness in dealing with the U.S.S.R. This point gains in importance when we recall the remarks made by the Senator about the unification question being one for action by the Germans themselves.

We know who holds the strings in East Germany. We know who controls East Germany. We might as well look that fact in the face. They not only control East Germany, but they also control Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria, Rumania, and all the Baltic States. It is not a question of the East Germans and the West Germans getting together.

We were told the other day by Willy Brandt, a statesman, which was confirmed to me personally by Mr. Adenauer, that if the East Germans had their own way 95 percent of them would join with the West.

In fact, I could not help feeling that the address of my distinguished colleague had a slight tone in it which was hard to understand. The Senator seemed to alternate back and forth between giving us and the Germans primary responsibility for taking the initiative. I do not complain, for this is a natural consequence of the great complexity of the issues at stake. More important, I do not complain of any sacrifice of flexibility which may be inherent in our need to act in agreement with our allies, for I am certain that we can all agree the Western alliance is the cornerstone of the free world security.

The second missing ingredient, in my view, is the lack of recognition accorded to the efforts of our Government and to the efforts of our allies over the years, to say nothing of the recent concentrated work over the past weeks and months, toward finding ways to negotiate this extremely serious problem. In fact, the headlines this morning contain news of Western willingness to widen the scope of envisaged negotiations, which confirms the activities of Mr. Dulles and his European counterparts. Clearly, our policy has not put us in a straitjacket.

I think it is also clear that my colleague has, in the fashion of Don Quixote, been doing a little tilting at a stone wall, and that stone wall is the Kremlin, not the East Germans.

Despite these few difficulties I have encountered so far, I thank the distinguished Senator from Montana, in all seriousness, for a highly illuminating presentation of the crux of the Berlin problem. I am not prepared to comment in depth on his useful address, because I have not had time for that. However, as frequently happens, Mr. Walter Lippmann's column of this morning contains some thoughts which I consider extremely pertinent to this subject, so I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed at this point in my discussion the comments of Walter Lippmann in his article of this morning.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MR. DULLES IS NEEDED

There is no reason to doubt that John Foster Dulles will once again come out on top, carried through his ordeal not only by his stamina, which is fabulous, but also by the knowledge that he is at this moment the indispensable man. There have been times in the past when things were at the end of a chapter, and he could with grace and dignity have made way for a younger man. But not just now. This is a period when things are moving toward a climax, after which the world may be very different, and he, himself, is at the climax of his career.

There is no one else in the Western World who has authority, comparable with his, to lead the enormously complex negotiations about Germany and about Europe which in one way or another are now unavoidable and imperative. If the West moves, as it must, from a policy of standing pat, to one of negotiation and compromise, his personal leadership will be the best guarantee that flexibility is not flabbiness and that a strong and tough hand is in charge. The Russians will make no dangerous mistakes while he is there, and our allies will be much less apprehensive.

There is one question which, if we knew the answer to it, would light up the whole situation. Why is it that Moscow has opened up Berlin and the German question now rather than, let us say, 2 years hence? The Russians know quite well that German opinion is evolving, and that Dr. Adenauer's refusal to negotiate on a realistic basis will not be held to by his successors. In 2 years, Mr. Dulles will be out of office, and until very recently there was no difference between his position and Dr. Adenauer's. In 2 years, moreover, there will be—if the Russians believe what Senator SYMINGTON and others say—a marked shift in the balance of power.

Why, then, are they in such a hurry now? My own guess, which rests only on hints and inferences, is that they regard the position in Eastern Germany, and perhaps also in Eastern Europe, as precarious and potentially explosive. They are deeply concerned, as everyone knows, about West German rearmament, which will have been achieved in about 2 years. Why are they so concerned about it when they themselves have a very much bigger army and are also themselves a first-class nuclear power? When I asked some of the people I saw in Moscow why they worried so much about West German rearmament when they could annihilate West Germany with their intermediate-range missiles, the stock answer was that they feared an armed Germany backed by the United States.

But I do not think that this is the whole explanation of their fear, or, rather, I do not think that it spells out the nature of their fear. My guess is that they have no illusions about the discontent of the East Germans, and that what they fear is that the East Germans, when they see a strong West German army less than 2 hours away, may be sorely tempted to start an uprising in cahoots with officers of the West German army. If that happened, the fat would be in the fire and both the United States and the U.S.S.R. would be involved.

Something of this sort is, I feel sure, the crux of the German problem today. There is an ever-present and growing danger of revolt in Eastern Europe which would entail Soviet intervention in the Hungarian manner and would unavoidably bring about a great war. The Russians are undoubtedly worried about this, and truly responsible men in all the Western capitals are equally worried about it. Only those who have more emotion than they have imagination and foresight take the view that an East European uprising would be wonderful and just what the free world wants.

It is the impending danger in Eastern Europe which makes it imperative to move toward German negotiations. For the best, and perhaps the only, way to avert the danger is to move toward the beginnings of the reunification of the two Germanys. We should make the Kremlin understand that we approach the coming negotiations, not with intent to provoke an uprising in Eastern Europe, but in order to find an alternative to it.

The Russian problem in Germany and Europe is not how to conquer and absorb Western Europe. This is away beyond anything that is within their reach. The Russian problem is how they can disengage themselves in Eastern Europe without jeopardizing their own security. How can the satellites become, not their violent enemies, but neutrals? At bottom the problem is how to let go without falling off and being run over.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have gone over these points which the distinguished Senator from Montana has made. The Senator places great emphasis on the fact that ultimate unification of Germany is inevitable, and that we should have recognized it and should have done more about it.

Exactly what should we have done? When we are faced against the Kremlin, which has taken 500 million human beings into its orbit, and when the United States has placed, as it were, its iron curtain against the approach onto West Germany and onto France and the Lowlands—what should we have done? Let us consider. The fact is that the inevitability of the ultimate reunification of Germany has been recognized by the Western countries since the end of World War II. That has been common talk. Germany has to be brought together. Unification has to come.

We have not only recognized that fact, but we have also recognized that a divided Germany constitutes a serious threat to the peace. Willy Brandt was quoted by the newspapers yesterday, after he had had a talk with the President, as saying that definitely the President said we are not going out of Berlin. We are sticking. We are there with the purposes we have always had. That, in substance, was the remark.

We have not only recognized this fact, but we have recognized that a divided Germany constitutes a threat to the peace. Both the Republican and Democratic administrations since 1945 and 1946 have made unrelenting efforts to bring the four zones together. I remember the efforts which have been made time after time.

We actually got an agreement at the Geneva Conference in 1955 for a reunification of Germany and for free elections. What happened? Of course, the Russians broke the agreement wide open. The Russians reneged on the agreement. All of the subsequent efforts to achieve reunification, including the notes we sent last fall, have failed. We have been working at this a long time.

I desire to give credit where credit is due. I do not care to say simply that we are at fault if we cannot get a government to reason with us and to work with us. That is what has happened, so far as the Kremlin is concerned, but we have been on the job.

As I have said, in Geneva we obtained an agreement for free elections. Who pushed that agreement? We did. Afterward it went out the window. The reason the West Germans have been rebuffed is that the Soviets have been unwilling to agree to any plan of reunification which would not guarantee the bolshevism of Western Germany and its annexation to Eastern Germany.

This is not the first time in world history that we have been unable to obtain agreements that were valid, and that would be kept by the other party. Out of 52 agreements we made with the Kremlin, the Kremlin broke 50 of them. That is the situation we are meeting. We must recognize the simple fact that the Soviets have a clutch hold on Eastern Germany. The Germans are not free. They are running out—400 a day, according to Willy Brandt. When we look that fact in the face, we begin to realize what the trouble is.

The Senator from Montana suggests that the way to work toward reunification would be to start by having the West Germans and the East Germans talk among themselves and attempt to negotiate the unification of the two divisions of Berlin. I heard that talk on the floor today. That is a consummation devoutly to be wished, but we cannot make an agreement with the slave when the master has the slave under his thumb. That is the situation. We might as well recognize it. That is what we have been trying to break down. If the master were to allow the slave freedom to work out his own salvation, 95 percent of the East Germans would vote for reunification.

It is difficult to see how the attempt to work out reunification could be any more successful than our past efforts with the Russians. We have tried to get the Russians to agree. The East Germans are not free to negotiate on their own. That is the big point. They are controlled by the Russians, and therefore they would continue to reflect the Russian control.

In effect, the Senator is saying in his speech that the West Germans should be more flexible; they should enter into negotiations with the East Germans. This is something that the West German Government, up to date, has refused to do. The West German Government is an independent nation. It claims that East Germany is a part of Germany. The contention is made that the United States can make the West Germans change their position and become more flexible.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. Let me finish this paragraph.

The fact is that West Germany is a proud and powerful ally of the United States. As an ally, it has a mind of its own, and we cannot dictate to it, as the Russians are dictating to the East Germans. The West Germans are the ablest people in Europe. They know the situation; and when they take the position they have taken, they take it with their eyes open. They realize that they are under the thumb of the Russians, or the East Germans, and they realize that they cannot even negotiate with the people who are the serfs.

I now yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I believe that there should be called to the Senator's attention the fact that relationships exist at the present time between the East German Government and the West German Government. Such relationships have existed for some years. Those relationships are based upon interzonal agreements. The result is that trade amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars is generated between the two areas.

The Senator also makes the point that I seem to be advocating an American initiative. What I have been trying to advocate is a Western initiative, including all the allies, and including West Germany. I do not think we can maintain a petrified policy, because we know that there is no prospect of going forward on that basis.

We are facing a deadline, May 27, 1959, at which time the Soviet Union has indicated it will have all its troops and dependent personnel withdrawn from the eastern sector of the city. I think we must come up with something in the way of alternatives. I was very pleased when Secretary Dulles came back and said that he would be willing to consider concessions on a quid pro quo basis. I was delighted with the degree of success the Secretary had achieved among our allies, Dr. Adenauer, General DeGaulle, and Prime Minister Macmillan.

So I do not quite get the point the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin has in mind, because, as I recall the speech I made, there seems to be very little difference between us.

I expressed the hope that those in the State Department would give some consideration to the speech made today, not because of any personal interest I have in it, but because of the fact that some suggestions are being made, and perhaps out of those suggestions, or others which may be generated, will come a degree of success in meeting the difficulties which confront us in the German and Berlin situation, and out of which, perhaps, may come unification of the two Berlins and the two Germanys at an earlier date than any of us can anticipate at the moment.

I thank the Senator for yielding to me and giving me an opportunity to answer him in part.

Mr. WILEY. Did the Senator wish to address any particular question to me? In what direction did he desire to direct my thought?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I wished to bring to the attention of the Senator the fact that I understood him to say that I was advocating American initiative. I was advocating Western initiative, which would include all Allied Powers, and also Dr. Adenauer.

Mr. WILEY. I do not think we are very far apart.

The only thing I disagree with is the implication that there has been no initiative. In my opinion the executive department, whose function it is to handle foreign relations, has done a great job. As I said the other day, the situation is similar to that of the man who has an ornery jackass. He can talk to him and talk to him, but he had better not get too close to him, or he may be kicked.

The Secretary of State and his assistants have worked diligently at this problem; and because they cannot get the jackass to agree, they are to blame. That is the sort of implication which I do not like to have go out to the country. I want the country definitely to understand my figure of speech.

We are continually in the midst of a political picture. I say, give credit where credit is due. Later, as I conclude my remarks, I shall have something to say about the distinguished Secretary of State. He served under Acheson. When I was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I saw his work. I observed his work as a servant of the Democratic Party. I have seen him serve for 6 years under President Eisenhower. I have seen him get acquainted with this globe, as was indicated by a distinguished columnist this morning, as no other man in history has done. He knows every neighborhood. He knows all the peoples. He knows the problems. He has dealt with them.

Because we could not get the divergent interests to agree, he is to blame. That is what I am objecting to. Such an implication is absolutely unfair. Undoubtedly it has had much to do with sending Secretary Dulles to the hospital. He is only human.

My next point is that the Senator from Montana, in his speech, asks that not only the West Germans, but the United States, take a more flexible approach to the problem of German and European security. The Senator from Montana mentioned the Rapacki plan and the Eden plan, and said we should explore both of them. We not only explored the Eden plan, but put it forward as a Western proposal at the Geneva Summit Conference. We have constantly been considering all kinds of possible European security plans. We have agreed that we must keep an open mind on this subject.

On the other hand, all these plans involve a general withdrawal of Western strength from Western Europe; and we must be careful not to engage in too much loose talk about the seeming retreat type of policy unless we have reason to believe that the Soviets are disposed to initiate a pullback toward their borders. As the Senator from Montana stated a few minutes ago, they would get out of East Berlin; but they would be on the line where troops would be ready to march in and take over West Berlin.

Our people are not blind. They recognize the fact that they are dealing with some of the most efficient—if I might call them that—international Machiavellians in history. In doing so they are going to protect the interests of the West and of America.

We agree that we must keep an open mind on this subject. On the other hand, all these plans involve a general withdrawal of Western strength from Western Europe and we must be careful that we do not engage in too much loose talk about this seemingly retreat type of policy unless we have reason to believe that the Soviets are disposed to initiate a simultaneous pullback of their forces toward their borders. Nothing in the present situation gives us hope that the Soviets are, in fact, willing to carry out a meaningful pullback of their forces. Too much general talk regarding neutral zones in withdrawal or thinning out of our forces at this time, therefore, could give the impression of softness on our part and weakening of our resolve to stand firm in this situation.

Finally, the distinguished Senator from Montana says that standing firm in Berlin is a slogan and not a policy.

The fact is that standing firm is the bedrock of our policy. It is quite true that, having taken this decision, the problem of how we implement the stand in the face of the many variations in which the threat can actually present itself to us must be worked out. That is exactly what the executive branch has been exploring ever since the crisis developed and it was the primary reason that Secretary Dulles undertook his recent trip. We, and our allies, are all aware that we must not only be agreed on the fundamental concept of standing firm; but that we must also be agreed on the details of implementing this policy. It was to help work out a common agreement on these details that the Secretary undertook this trip to London, Paris, and Bonn.

In other words, the Senator from Montana knows very well that the executive branch here, as well as the governments of our allies, knows that we must agree on the detailed implementation of the policy in that we are all working now to get agreement on these details.

When we do get agreements, what good are they? What does experience teach us? Fifty out of fifty-two agreements were not worth the paper they were written on. The Kaiser said something like that before. He spoke about a treaty being a scrap of paper. We are dealing with a people whose philosophy and morality in connection with international affairs is very low.

My overall reaction to the speech of the Senator from Montana, however, is that it is a great deal more reasonable than many one has to listen to, and there are a number of sections, as I have indicated, in the speech which make pretty good sense.

I do want to make very clear that, as the distinguished Senator has said, when the Executive is "in the saddle" and has the responsibility to deal with crises, and that because the solution which one has hoped for is not forthcoming, that that is no reason to criticize the executive branch of our Government. The Executive has had to deal with the representatives of the Kremlin for many years.

Our past experience, as I indicated, shows what agreements with the Kremlin are worth.

I want to make it clear also, that in my humble opinion, the executive department has done everything that it can do to bring about a settlement of the German issue, as well as a settlement on the wider scale of world tensions, of which the Kremlin is the source.

In my opinion the Berlin crisis in connection with the May date is merely another indication of what we have had in the past, particularly some months ago in Formosa. It is the purpose of the Kremlin to get our attention on one point on this little globe, and then do its nefarious work at another point. The executive department is keeping its eye on the whole show, so to speak, not merely on the Kremlin, and it recognizes that this is just a part of the world-dominating influence and philosophy of the Kremlin.

Mr. President, when I heard the other evening that John Foster Dulles had gone to the hospital once again, I issued a release, and I shall read that release at this point. I said:

All Americans and many in far-off lands heard with sorrow of the hospitalization of John Foster Dulles. Countless thousands will pray for his recovery.

When I think of him, Burke's definition of a statesman comes to my mind: He possessed "a disposition to preserve, an ability to improve."

He has always been "a friend to truth; in action faithful, and in honor clear; who broke no promises, served no private end." These words of Pope characterize this great public servant.

Let us hope that during his convalescence the carping voices will cease.

In my opinion no American in the last 50 years has given of himself more unstintingly and dedicated himself more to preserve America than Foster Dulles. When others threw bricks at him, he smiled and kept on working for the general welfare. No man in American history has become so well acquainted with this now neighborhood world and its problems.

So we join with the countless thousands who wish him a speedy recovery. His country needs him.

As the President and Walter Lippmann have said, the country needs him.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the extremely able address by my good friend from Wisconsin in defense of the State Department.

Mr. WILEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to ask my good friend this question. Earlier in his remarks he offered for the RECORD the column written by Walter Lippmann published in the Washington Post this morning. My question is whether he agrees with that column.

Mr. WILEY. I took the column from the paper, and the part that I read I agreed with. However, I shall have to go over it very closely, because the implication is that I am not aware of something in the article. I have not read it closely, because I have been waiting for the Senator from Montana to conclude his remarks, so that I may obtain the floor.

Mr. CLARK. I would be happy to have my good friend review Mr. Lippmann's column, which I personally believe is a sound one, but which, it seems to me, is rather inconsistent with the point of view which my friend from Wisconsin has been so ably expounding.

I should like to call to his attention the parts of the column I have in mind, and I should like to ask him whether he agrees that the principal point Mr. Lippmann makes is that the Russians are frightened by the situation in Eastern Europe and that they fear an explosion or revolution, and that such an explosion or revolution might require them to repeat what they did in Hungary; that if they did it in Eastern Germany what they did in Hungary it would bring about the great danger of starting world war III, because we would be unlikely to permit East Germany to go down the drain the way we let Hungary go. Mr. Lippmann suggests that the problem is how we can prevent a revolution in a satellite country and how we can maintain a situation in which the Russians can get out of satellite countries and the satellite countries can remain neutral and Berlin and Germany can still be free.

I suspect that what Mr. Lippmann says makes good sense and is pretty much the essence of the brilliant address made by the Senator from Montana, with his nine points that he urges upon the administration in that address. I do hope that the Senator from Wisconsin will take another look at the Walter Lippmann column, and I hope to find that he is in agreement with it.

Mr. WILEY. I shall be happy to read it again very closely, because I am always interested in what the statesman Lippmann—and I would call him that—has to say.

When he speaks about the ferment in Europe, that is only a part of the story. There is no question that there is a ferment all over the world. One of the problems which is confusing the Russians and giving them much trouble at present, as the Senator probably knows, is the attitude of the Chinese. There are 650 million Chinese who may be "on the go." All these matters have had the consideration of the Department of State. The Committee on Foreign Relations has had this testimony before it.

Willy Brandt, the mayor of West Berlin, was asked the other day whether the people in Poland, Rumania, Bulgaria, and the Baltic States had fallen asleep and were satisfied with their rulers. The answer, in his judgment, was, "No." Of course, that gives trouble to the Kremlin. That is a part of the Russian problem.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I have no intention of attempting to engage in a debate concerning whether the action of the State Department in the past has been right or wrong. I think the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] was very wise, indeed, in avoiding that pitfall, which it would be so easy to fall into.

I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that we cannot solve this problem in the interest of peace and freedom merely by saying over and over again that the Russians have broken 50 out of 52 agreements, and that therefore it does not do any good to talk to them. I suggest that we must talk and talk and live with them, or else we will die with them.

There are such things as self-executing agreements, particularly with respect to the withdrawal of forces, which are enforcible, and this regardless of the effect of the written word. It has been my feeling that to have a more flexible policy toward negotiation is highly desirable.

I think the Senator from Montana has rendered a distinct service, because in many ways he is sending word to the State Department and to the country that, at least so far as a majority of the U.S. Senate is concerned, we are ready right now to negotiate a meaningful agreement.

We do not dismiss from our minds plans which were ridiculed when they were first brought forward 2 years ago by Mr. Kennan, Mr. Gaitskill, and Mr. Rapacki, and others. We will talk about anything in the interest of getting a workable agreement toward peace. We are not afraid to negotiate. We do not trust the Russians any more than some of our friends in the State Department do. But that is no reason for not sitting down at the table and talking with them.

Mr. WILEY. Again, the Senator from Pennsylvania has made an implied attack on the other branch of the Government.

The Senator talks about flexibility. Why does he not talk about flexibility with the people who are most concerned with it, instead of making a general statement? That is the point I am making. When I tried lawsuits, I tried to arrive at conclusions on the facts, not on implications, not on rumors. That was my only point in raising this particular issue.

The Senator refers to the breaking by the Russians of 50 out of 52 agreements. Let me tell the Senator that it was in the days before Pearl Harbor that this Chamber was asleep; the President was asleep; the people were asleep; the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force were asleep. They said it could not happen. It did. That was the only reason I referred to the breaking by the Russians of 50 out of 52 agreements. I do not want to have this country go to sleep on the generality that it is possible to deal with a skunk or someone who does not keep faith.

Mr. CLARK. I think what the Senator from Wisconsin has said and what I have said will appear accurately in the RECORD, as our good friends, the Official Reporters, will write it out. I have no intention of engaging in further colloquy, other than to say that I implied nothing. It was not I who spoke of the breaking of 50 out of 52 agreements; it was my good friend, the Senator from Wisconsin, who did so. I am content to let the RECORD stand as it will appear in print tomorrow morning.

Mr. WILEY. I agree that I made the statement. I did so for the simple reason that men like the Senator from Pennsylvania were here at the time of Pearl Harbor and had said it could not happen. I do not want the breaking of 50 out of 52 agreements to be forgotten by the Senator from Pennsylvania either.

Mr. CLARK. At the time of Pearl Harbor, I was in the uniform of my country, and not on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. WILEY. Oh, yes. But other Senators were talking as the Senator from Pennsylvania is now speaking. That is the only point I am making.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, at the very beginning, I commend the Senator from Montana for the study which he has given to the problem he discussed today. Speaking for myself, I want the Soviet Union to know that the Senators of the United States are intently desirous of obtaining peace for the people of the world. While I may see some difficulties in carrying out the plans suggested by the Senator from Montana, and projecting themselves over his talk, I see a fervent purpose and desire to bring about peace in the world. That is the light in which I wish the people of Europe and the people of the world would understand the intention and the purpose of the U.S. Senate today.

What are some of the weaknesses which I see in the proposal made by the Senator from Montana? The Soviet says: "We will withdraw from East Berlin." The question is, how far will they withdraw? In what posture will they be after they have withdrawn? In what position would we be if we withdrew from West Berlin and moved a distance of, say, 120 miles to the west?

My query would be: Based upon the past conduct of the Soviet Union, could we rely upon their word that they have withdrawn and would stay withdrawn? Or would there be the necessity of negotiating in a manner which would preclude the possibility of their abandoning their word and moving immediately back into the area out of which they came if conditions developed which were unsatisfactory

Second, for the people of West Berlin and East Berlin to negotiate would be simple. I think it is generally agreed that 95 percent of them would subscribe to the philosophy of the West and would repudiate that of the East. If there were a unification of the government of West Berlin and the government of the Soviet and communism in East Berlin, my query is: What type of government would result? I cannot forget what happened in China when a coalition government was formed. I cannot forget what happened in Yugoslavia when a coalition government was formed, and Mikhailovitch, the spirit of the fight for freedom, was scuttled. The result of that coalition government was that the Communists took control.

Nor can I forget what happened in Poland when the Soviet Union proposed a coalition government. The coalition government was created, the Red troops were there, they took control and gave orders, and soon the government of Poland became a Communist government.

But in this situation there is one gleam of light which would cause me to analyze the East Berlin and the West Berlin situation in the belief that it might be distinguished from the Yugoslavia situation, the China situation, and the Poland situation. In China, the Soviet troops were in the northern part of that country, and they dictated what was to happen. A similar situation existed in Poland. In Yugoslavia, the word which came from Britain and from the United States was that Mikhailovitch should be abandoned and Tito should be accepted.

What would happen in East Berlin and in West Berlin if those governments combined and if the Soviet would stay back? In all the other countries I have mentioned, conditions were fertile for the overthrow of those who wanted freedom and for the installation of those who wanted dictatorship. But that condition would not prevail in Germany. As we have said, in Germany 95 percent of the people would stand by the governments of the free West.

But despite my belief that these dangers are connected with the suggestions which have been made by the Senator from Montana, I believe it is the responsibility of the executive branch of our Government and of this legislative branch to explore every means of reaching an agreement, restricted only by the proposition that we maintain our honor and that we do not fall into a pit which would leave us weaker, after we negotiated, than we were before we began to negotiate.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

A CHALLENGE TO THE TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the reception of the report of the special subcommittee for the study of the domestic textile industry which was submitted to the Senate on February 4 is most encouraging. Both news articles and editorials in the national press have been most favorable. The most encouraging aspect of the reception given this report is shown by the round of wage increases currently being announced by the textile industry.

As an example of the influence of this report, I should like to quote from the statement of the J. P. Stevens Co., announcing a general wage increase:

In its statement of a week ago the Stevens Co., pointed out the dangerous situation created by textile imports. Since that time, the report of the Pastore subcommittee, as approved by the full Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, has been published. This official document of the U.S. Senate recognizes the danger of unrestricted textile imports from cheap labor foreign countries. This inspiring expression from high legislative channels encourages us to go ahead with upward wage adjustments in our various plants, even in the face of constantly increasing threats to the cotton, synthetic and woolen industries from overseas. The Pastore subcommittee report leads us to believe that something affirmative will be done to arrest the decline of U.S. textile manufacturing in recent years.

As a splendid example of the same sentiments, I ask unanimous consent that an excellent editorial from the Greenville News of Greenville, S.C., which was published on February 9, 1959, be inserted in the body of the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A CHALLENGE TO THE TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Two developments of tremendous importance to the textile industry, foundation of the economy of this area, occurred in the past few days.

First, a special U.S. Senate Subcommittee reported on the series of hearings it had conducted into the problems facing the industry.

And, second, the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization officially recognized the industry as being essential to the security of the Nation.

Taken together, the two constitute the first official recognition of the fact that the textile industry is in difficulty and that a successful solution to its problems is vital to the entire country.

This, of course, is what textile executives and others have been saying for some time. Until now, however, they have received scant attention from the public generally or from Members of Congress representing nontextile producing constituencies.

The report of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, for example, is not exactly news either to textile producers or to military leaders. It may seem incongruous, and doubtless has to many persons, but textiles have frequently been said to be second only to steel production in terms of importance to national defense.

This has an entirely practical meaning. For, because of many factors, textile production has been declining for many years in proportion to other industries. According to the OCDM, in the cotton and rayon broad woven industry, requirements and capacity are almost completely in balance, and further displacement of U.S. capacity could pose a serious mobilization problem.

The OCDM promises to watch this situation carefully. It should. One can easily imagine the frantic efforts that would be made at the national level if a similar situation existed with reference to steel or chemical production. In view of the acknowledged importance of textiles, no less an effort is mandatory in its behalf.

Of more immediate promise are the report and recommendations of the special subcommittee of the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee. This group, headed by Senator JOHN O. PASTORE, of Rhode Island, and including South Carolina's Senator

STROM THURMOND, has performed an outstanding job. It has compiled statistics demonstrating beyond doubt the present weakness of the industry; it has uncovered the factors responsible for its decline, and it has pointed the way toward removal, or at least amelioration, of those disturbing elements.

Not the least of the services rendered by the subcommittee is the fact that it makes clear the responsibility of the Federal Government in this field. For not only is the future of the textile industry of vital importance to the Government (witness the OCDM statement), but also the Government itself is responsible for erecting some of the roadblocks in the way of the industry's prosperity and growth.

The report points to several Federal programs which have proved especially damaging. Among them are the price-support system which has made it possible for foreign textile producers to buy American cotton cheaper than American textile mill operators; the foreign trade policy which has opened our doors to cheap labor textile products, and the foreign aid program which has spent American money to build textile mills abroad.

As in the case of the OCDM statement, this is not news to the people of this area. But it is to many others and the subcommittee has made a notable contribution by spelling it out and compiling an arresting array of figures to prove it.

Additionally, the subcommittee recommended a 10-point program to aid the industry. This includes setting up of interagency advisory committees; revision of some tax laws; a more flexible administration of the foreign trade and aid programs to recognize the importance of the domestic industry; the elimination of the two-price system on cotton or the increasing of tariffs on imported cotton products; and an expanded textile research program.

The subcommittee's recommendations are sound and should receive the immediate and sympathetic consideration of the Congress.

The subcommittee's report is not, and does not pretend to be, exhaustive. For one thing, it lacked time to make the kind of study that could have given a completely clear picture of the ills that threaten domestic textile production. And, for another, there are many problems that are the responsibility of management and not of the Government.

And it is to management that the challenge now must go. The Senate subcommittee has done its job of initial spadework; presumably, Congress will follow through. The Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization has promised its assistance.

If all these groups fulfill their promises of recent weeks—and we see no reason why they should not—then it will be up to the textile industry itself to prove that it can continue to perform the services the Nation so clearly needs.

We are confident that it will do so.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, Congress and the administration must act expeditiously to implement the recommendations of this report in order that the confidence reposed in the report can be merited, as it has resulted in this well-deserved increase in wages for faithful and hard-working textile employees.

AN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, interest in an International Development Association, which the Senate last year asked the executive branch to study, having in mind the idea of United States participation, has continued to be lively and widespread.

Because I was sponsor of the resolution outlining the possibilities of a fresh approach to this country's policies regarding economic aid to underdeveloped areas of the world, I have received numerous requests to speak and to write on the subject, as well as to discuss the proposal with callers from all parts of this country and from many foreign nations. I have spoken to religious groups, college students, and a variety of organizations interested in economic progress and international relations who have indicated interest.

The winter issue of World Affairs, quarterly publication of the American Peace Society, which is distributed throughout the world, included an article entitled "The Senate Resolution for an International Development Association," with my byline. For help in preparation of the article—which I intended as a brief, but full, outline of the purposes and possibilities of an International Development Association—I am much indebted to Mr. Robert A. Wallace, staff director of the full Banking and Currency Committee. Throughout the committee hearings and the Senate debate on this resolution, Mr. Wallace gave to me, to the International Finance Subcommittee, and to the full committee the kind of professional assistance which all of us hope to find in the committees of Congress. I want to commend him and to thank him, especially for his help with this article, which I would like to place in the RECORD at this point, if I may have the unanimous consent of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SENATE RESOLUTION FOR AN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION

(By U.S. Senator A. S. MIKE MONRONEY)

The United States, with other nations of the world, must recognize that the patchwork-quilt approach to economic problems of underdeveloped areas can and should be supplanted very quickly by a long-term program, operated on a banking basis.

Since capital is the scarce ingredient in most of the emerging nations seeking economic progress, varied banking facilities are needed to finance development on terms which meet these nations' special needs.

With this in mind, I introduced Senate Resolution 264 early this year recommending that prompt study be given to establishing an International Development Association to make multilateral development loans at terms more liberal than those currently available. The proposed IDA would be an affiliate of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (World Bank). The Senate passed the resolution last summer by an overwhelming vote. In October, at the request of President Eisenhower, U.S. Secretary of the Treasury Robert B. Anderson recommended its study to the members of the World Bank during its meeting in New Delhi as one of three major U.S. recommendations.

The Senate enacted the resolution in order to explore the possibilities of providing a new source of multilateral development loans for the less industrialized nations. These loans would differ from those offered under existing programs in that they would—

1. Encourage more countries to contribute capital for international development;
2. Promote greater use of foreign currencies received by the United States from the sale of farm surpluses;
3. Be made for longer periods of time;
4. Carry lower rates of interest;
5. Be repayable partly in local currencies; and
6. Provide a separate fund for subordinate loans to supplement the World Bank's lending activities.

Few needs are more compelling than economic development of the less industrialized nations. Events in many areas of the world are demonstrating the inadequacy of present programs to achieve stability and safety for newly independent nations. Thoughtful Americans and citizens of other industrialized nations are becoming increasingly convinced that sponsoring military buildup in an effort to discourage external attack provides a hollow shell of strength, unable to withstand the mounting pressures from within these nations.

These pressures are being generated by what Adlai Stevenson has called the revolution of rising expectations. Around the globe captive peoples are in revolt—in revolt against the captivity of poverty, of social immobility, of disease, of national inferiority. Their demands for an equitable share of the world's goods and recognition as a significant force in the world's culture constitute the basic reality of our age—more basic and more pervading than atoms, or sputniks, or political alliances.

America is one of the main fountainheads of these aspirations. We, above all other nations of the world, should have nothing to fear from this revolution. We must, however, recognize that our safety, and the peace of the world, require that we strive, with others, to fulfill these aspirations. It is our responsibility to take the lead in fashioning the instruments and the institutions through which the hopes of the world's captive peoples may be realized, and this must be done in an environment of self-respect and mutual help.

The programs of nonmilitary economic aid conducted by the United States since World War II have been addressed to two separate problems: The first was the economic reconstruction of industrial nations which were ravaged by the war. The second problem to be met was the economic development of the agrarian countries of Asia, Latin America, and Africa, for whom any appreciable industrialization has remained mostly a dream for the future. In each case we had political as well as humanitarian and economic motives—to provide an alternative to the achievement of reconstruction or development by totalitarian methods.

Our efforts were focused first on the reconstruction of Europe under the Marshall plan. These were a brilliant success. More recently we have attempted to apply essentially the same methods in the underdeveloped areas. Our goals remain the same: To provide for economic development by democratic rather than by totalitarian methods.

The necessity for foreign capital to supplement the meager accumulation which is possible from the resources of these new nations is obvious. It is a need which Americans, especially, should be able to understand because we, too, faced it as a young nation. Now we are a primary source of capital on which the less developed nations must depend, for ours is the economy which provides half of the world's goods. We must help to develop a mechanism to provide the additional capital they require.

How do our efforts need to be strengthened?

On today's economic frontiers the economic significance of the United States aid dollar has been obscured by its political symbolism. New independence is independence of the most hypersensitive variety. Acceptance of unilateral foreign aid has been represented by extremist political groups within the underdeveloped countries as implying a political commitment to support every position taken by the United States in its cold war with the Soviet Union. Such representations are false, but in the midst of misleading propaganda, these commitments are often taken as a betrayal of the aspirations for independence of action common to these newly independent states. Thus that which is an economic necessity has become a political liability.

The other side of the same coin has been equally difficult. Unfriendly countries charge that our aid imposes an unacceptable obligation on the recipient, but on the other hand, the recipients of our aid sometimes tend to assume that the obligation is on the giver—that political support in the cold war entitles them as a matter of vested right to share in the bounty of our foreign-aid program. The whole relationship militates against the easy friendship of sovereign states.

The next development was of course inevitable—a competitive Soviet aid program, with the more cynical uncommitted countries happily encouraging the bidding. In other words, they have pitted the West against the East in bargaining for aid at special prices, on special terms, or for special commitments. The danger here is that a competitive situation will develop, in which aid will become merely a football in the power struggle between the East and the West.

I believe a conviction is growing in the U.S. Congress that our economic-aid programs have sometimes produced, not friendship and confidence, but rather increased animosity and distrust. While most of us here might agree that popularity was not our primary objective, many Americans have serious doubts as to the success of further foreign aid.

There is also a growing conviction that other nations, many of which were restored to economic health by our earlier Marshall plan, should begin to bear an increased portion of the common burden and responsibility for the progress of underdeveloped areas.

It was in this general environment that the evolution of our assistance to underdeveloped countries began last year with the creation of the Development Loan Fund. This marked the transition from grants to loans. Moreover, it marked a shift away from the country program approach to economic assistance, and toward the project developed by the country itself.

Certainly the Development Loan Fund was an improvement, but it is not a final solution to the basic problems which afflict our economic development programs. I submit that the final solution of the problems requires that we provide economic assistance to underdeveloped areas through an international economic institution.

Senate Resolution 264 which recommends study of establishing an International Development Association, proposes that such study include consideration of the following objectives:

First. Providing a source of long-term loans available at a reasonable rate of interest and repayable in local currencies—or partly in local currencies—to supplement International Bank lending activities and thereby permit the prompt completion of worthwhile development projects which could not otherwise go forward.

Second. Facilitating in connection with such loans, the use of local and other foreign currencies, including those available to the United States through the sale of agricultural surpluses and through other programs.

Third. Insuring that funds for international economic development can be made available by a process which would encourage multilateral contributions for this purpose. The resolution contemplates that a companion institution to the World Bank be created to perform a related but distinct lending function. It would be designed to provide long-term loans at low rates of interest for basic economic development projects.

I proposed this particular approach for several reasons:

First. By organizing this new institution as an affiliate of the World Bank, we can take advantage of the very high regard in which the Bank is held, both at home and abroad, and greatly increase the likelihood of the acceptance of the new institution.

Second. By organizing it as an affiliate of the Bank we can take advantage of the tremendous talent and experience which are represented in the staff of the Bank, and can put the new organization into operation with the minimum of delay.

Third. The closest possible cooperation between the World Bank and the proposed association would be essential. Today the World Bank must refuse loans for many worthwhile projects which will not pay out. It could, however, finance a substantial part of the cost of these projects if some second-mortgage money, frequently in very small amounts, was available from the International Development Association.

Fourth. By following a pattern of organization similar to that of the World Bank, with control based on stock ownership, we could provide the necessary international character and still could insure that the Bank would be operated by those providing the funds, rather than by the borrowers.

I believe this study will indicate that such an association would require a minimum initial capital of $1 billion in hard currencies to be provided on the same percentage basis as that of the World Bank, to which the United States has subscribed 34 percent of the total capitalization. It should be emphasized, however, that the amount of the initial capitalization is a matter which would require detailed exploration at the time of the actual organization of such an association.

It has been suggested that additional funds, over and above the subscription to the capital stock of the association probably must be made available for lending by the United States. I do not believe this represents any insurmountable problem. Certain amounts of fixed income—for example, the interest received on our previous foreign loans—might be earmarked over a long term for the purchase of debentures of the association. In this way, additional funds could be put up by the United States without disturbing the multinational nature of stock ownership.

An international organization tends to denationalize loan transactions; and it is for this reason that many governments prefer to borrow from the World Bank or a similar international agency, rather than from a single country.

There is not now an international organization to make long-term low-interest loans for economic development repayable partly in local currencies. Nor is there an international program for subordinate development loans. Nor is there an international mechanism for encouraging third-country loans with local currencies. The feasibility of making such loans through the creation of an International Development Association should be most carefully studied.

There are definite advantages to raising development capital among as many nations as possible. First, because the advantages of development accrue to all members of the international political community, it seems only fair to share the cost of the development program among all who can participate. Second, a lending institution including both debtors and creditors gives a greater measure of assurance that the loans will be repaid. Third, governments may sometimes prefer international loans because they remove any possible implication of political interference in internal affairs.

IDA requires study, which is why the Senate acted first with a resolution rather than with legislation. It would be no panacea. It would promise no cheap and easy solutions to the hard problems of economic development. It would in my judgment, however, place one more valuable tool in the hands of those who seek progress without subjugation.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, the New York Times reported in a front page article in December that the proposed International Development Association is very much alive; and the Times quoted top U.S. officials close to the international negotiations aimed at establishing the new agency. In an Associated Press article in the Evening Star, which was published on January 7, we were informed that Canada, in a communique issued after discussions among Cabinet members of our two Nations, announced it would study the American proposal to set up an International Development Association affiliated with the World Bank. I ask unanimous consent that both articles be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW WORLD BANK FOR SOFT CREDIT IS GAINING FAVOR—UNITED STATES PUSHES MONRONEY PLAN FOR LOANS TO BE REPAID IN LOCAL CURRENCIES

(By Edwin L. Dale, Jr.)

WASHINGTON, December 7.—The proposed International Development Association, considered a few months ago to have dim prospects, is very much alive.

This was the report today of top U.S. officials close to the international negotiations aimed at establishing the new agency. Taking into account developments over the past few weeks, they now consider the odds are that the new agency will come into being.

The agency was proposed this year by the United States as a subsidiary of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development to make loans in soft—not freely convertible—currencies to underdeveloped countries.

The idea first came from Senator MIKE MONRONEY, Democrat of Oklahoma. In September, President Eisenhower instructed the Secretary of the Treasury, Robert B. Anderson, to sound out other countries.

FIRST REACTIONS UNFAVORABLE

The first foreign reactions were lukewarm or negative. This emerged from comments at the New Delhi meetings in October of the bank and the International Monetary Fund. For differing reasons, both advanced and underdeveloped countries had reservations.

The change has come gradually over the last two months, beginning with conversations at New Delhi and shortly thereafter. Enough countries have now resolved their doubts to make officials confident that the agency will be established.

Some even hope that its charter will be agreed in time for submission to the next session of Congress, though it would be late in the session.

SOME FEATURES ARE NEW

The agency would have these main features, all new in international lending.

Its loans would be on easy terms and repayable in local currencies. Thus it would finance "nonbankable" projects that the world bank cannot consider.

It would involve major participation by all the main countries of the West, and presumably Japan, in supplying the basic resources for lending. Most European currencies are now about as hard as the dollar and would be difficult for underdeveloped countries to repay. The scheme will stand or fall on the willingness of such nations as Britain and West Germany to supply capital.

Wherever possible the loans would also make use of soft currencies acquired by the United States, and to a lesser extent by other countries in such operations as sale of farm surpluses. Thus a loan to Ceylon might include Indian rupees accumulated by the United States, to the extent that India could supply needed items, and was looking for a market.

The job of Secretary Anderson in selling the plan has been twofold. He has had to persuade underdeveloped countries to permit the United States to revise the agreements under which their currencies have been accumulated, to free them for the new operation.

SEEKS EUROPE'S AID

And he has had to convince the European nations that the plan would work and that it could make a major contribution toward solution of a problem that all recognize is serious—the problem of achieving economic development in the less advanced lands.

Mr. Anderson, it is understood, is trying to win agreement from the underdeveloped countries first before he presents a formal plan, with specific contributions, to the Western nations.

Under his plan, even the underdeveloped countries will have to put up at least a token contribution in gold or dollars or other hard currencies—possibly the same contribution as that required by the World Bank, 2 percent of a nation's quota. Even that small sum will be difficult for some underdeveloped countries to raise.

UNITED STATES MAY PUT UP 34 PERCENT

It is understood Mr. Anderson's plan envisages that the United States put up about 34 percent of the capital of the new agency, the same as it contributed to the World Bank. He also feels that the organization should be given a reasonably large initial capital, with no specific provision for replenishment.

The replenishment issue may be important, because of the soft nature of the agency's transactions. The World Bank regularly raises new capital funds by floating its bonds on the Western World's money markets. It can sell the bonds because its loans are hard and repaid in dollars.

When the new agency runs out of dollars and other usable currencies, it will presumably have to stop lending until the members decide to put up more capital.

A major selling point with Congress is expected to be the fact that other advanced countries will be participating in the lending—something many members have long advocated.

UNITED STATES AND CANADA AGREE ON CLOSER TRADE TIES

OTTAWA, January 7.—The United States and Canada have agreed to consult more closely on issues that can hurt each other's trade. They have called on Europe to speed up reduction of barriers to imports from North America.

Ending 24 hours of talks between Cabinet members of the two neighbors, a 1,500-word communique last night announced:

1. Wheat experts of the two countries will meet every 3 months in attempts to resolve Canadian complaints that subsidized disposal of American surplus wheat cuts into Canada's commercial markets.

2. More talks will take place on U.S. restructions on import of Canadian oil. There was joint agreement that continued oil exploration and development are necessary on defense grounds.

LEAD, ZINC CURBS

The United States expressed hope it could withdraw its import curbs on lead and zinc once some international agreement is reached among major suppliers and buyers. The curbs were imposed last September. An international study now is under way.

4. Cabinet spokesmen, probably Canadian Justice Minister E. D. Fulton and U.S. Attorney General William Rogers, will hold talks on U.S. prosecution of three big electronic companies whose subsidiaries operate a patent pool in Canada. Canada wants the suit dropped. The United States said it has no intention of infringing on Canadian sovereignty.

5. Canada agreed to consult with the United States before it applies its tough new antidumping laws, which the Americans claim violate Canada's international trade obligations. Canada gave assurances it does not intend to use the legislation in a discriminatory or arbitrary manner.

6. Canada also will consult on the impact of recent Canadian food import curbs, particularly on turkeys and frozen peas. Most of the curbs are linked with Federal price-support programs.

7. Canada will study an American proposal to set up an international development association affiliated with the World Bank.

The association would provide underdeveloped countries with long-term loans on more generous terms than the World Bank gives.

OTHER STEPS URGED

The two delegations agreed that recent European currency convertibility moves should be followed by other steps to open more European markets for North American exporters.

The ministers said:

"Convertibility has removed the financial justification for discriminating against dollar supplies and should be followed by further moves by the countries concerned to provide nondiscriminatory access to their markets for goods from the United States, Canada, and other countries."

Specifically they want Europe to speed up elimination of import curbs against North American goods.

ATMOSPHERE OF HARMONY

Canadian Finance Minister Donald Fleming said the talks were held in an atmosphere of utmost harmony. However, United States objection to the wording of the communique delayed its issuance for several hours.

The talks were on the fourth biannual meeting of the joint Canada-United States Committee on Trade and Economic Affairs, set up in 1953 to iron out problems between the two countries before they develop into embarrassing public situations.

The United States was represented by Treasury Secretary Robert Anderson, Interior Secretary Fred Seaton, Commerce Secretary Lewis Strauss and Under Secretary of State Douglas Dillon, representing ailing Secretary Dulles.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, in addition to the large number of editorials in newspapers all over the Nation which were inserted in the RECORD by various Senators when we were considering the resolution, during the adjournment of Congress there were published a number of other editorials and many articles which I should like to call to the attention of my colleagues. I ask unanimous consent for the insertion of some of them in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorials and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Petersburg (Fla.) Times, Jan. 11, 1959]

A BOLD PROGRAM FOR LATIN AMERICA

Dr. Milton Eisenhower, brother of the President, has presented a report to the President on U.S. relations with Latin America with recommendations for a series of moves to improve these relations.

But while Dr. Eisenhower was preparing his report, the State Department was pouring cold water on plans of an Inter-American Conference of Foreign Ministers to do some of the things Dr. Eisenhower recommends.

Long an expert of the U.S. Agriculture Department and now president of Johns Hopkins University, Dr. Eisenhower is quite a top authority on Latin America. He has represented the President several times on Latin American tours. A few months after Vice President NIXON made his highly publicized and highly controversial trip to South America last spring, Dr. Eisenhower made a factfinding tour of Central America that hardly drew any public notice.

As a result of this trip the President's brother made three specific recommendations in his report. They are:

Establishment of an Inter-American Development Institution to assist the American Republics in planning their development.

Creation of an Inter-American Bank to coordinate activities of the World Bank, U.S. lending agencies and private lending agencies in providing capital for Latin American development.

Cooperation with the five nations of Central America in the establishment of a regional common market that might serve as a model for all Latin America.

In short, what Dr. Eisenhower proposes is an adaptation for the underdeveloped nations of Latin America of the ideas of the Marshall plan, through which the United States helped to rehabilitate the highly developed industries of Europe.

But when the idea of an Inter-American Bank was first proposed at a conference of finance ministers in Buenos Aires a year ago, the United States greeted it with an attitude of "Let's not do anything now."

When the idea was adopted at a meeting of American Foreign Ministers at Washington in September, Secretary of State Dulles barely took time off from his world travels to deliver a routine speech that was nothing more than an oratorical greeting card.

In his recommendations for U.S. support of an Inter-American Bank, Dr. Eisenhower backs a proposal which Senator A. S. MIKE MONRONEY, Democrat of Oklahoma, has suggested on a world scale. It is the granting of second mortgage loans that can be repaid in the soft currencies of the aided nations, rather than in the hard currency of American dollars.

In addition to his specific recommendations, Dr. Eisenhower proposes the establishment, in all the Republics of the hemisphere, of national commissions to develop public interest in inter-American affairs. He suggests that a U.S. commission should promote the background material on Latin America from U.S. correspondents in the other Americas.

Dr. Eisenhower also suggests that the activities of the U.S. Information Agency in telling the American story be increased in Latin America.

All the things Dr. Eisenhower proposes have long needed to be done for the hemispheric good of the United States as well as its neighbors. The Latin American nations have made a good start on their own and the prestige of Dr. Eisenhower should give high hopes for U.S. participation.

But these recommendations come at a time when the President is highly critical of spenders and is committed to the idea of balancing the budget. It will be difficult to reconcile these ideas with an adequate foreign aid program in Latin America or anywhere else.

Dr. Eisenhower has long been known to have been highly influential in the thinking of his presidential brother. Maybe it's time that he exert some of his influence again.

Thanks to the enormous reserve of goodwill inherited by the Eisenhower regime in 1953, even with the shocking neglect of Latin America by this administration, with little trouble we could reestablish relations so solidly that we would have an immensely strong bulwark in this hemisphere.

As the President told Congress Friday, "There can be no such thing as a fortress America." On the other hand, Latin America suspicious and surly toward us could be a fatal weakness.

[From the Kansas City (Mo.) Star, Dec. 6, 1958]

IDA MAY BE A SYMBOL OF NEW BIPARTISANSHIP

Secretary Anderson, of the Treasury, has apparently done a better selling job on the proposed International Development Association than anyone thought. At the World Bank meeting in New Delhi this fall the idea went over with a dull thud. Now, however, the New York Times reports that the poor man's World Bank has a better than even chance of seeing daylight.

Some critics of Senator MONRONEY'S IDA point out that it would simply be another addition to the tremendously complex machinery of international banking and mutual security. The Washington joke describes the new philosophy, "A bank a day keeps the Russians away." Certainly we're not in favor of adding leaven to bureaucracy at either the national or international level. Nevertheless, the Monroney bank could fill a gap in the lineup. It would make use of the soft currencies of the world, such as the Indian rupee and the Brazilian cruzeiro. It would make loans to underdeveloped countries on somewhat easier terms than can the World Bank.

From the point of view of our own foreign policy, IDA is a new concept that would call, as does the World Bank, for the full participation of the other free nations. It emphasizes loans. Once it is in business, with repayments being made, it might ease some of the burden on the American taxpayer. Equally important for the taxpayer, it involves multilateral loans. We regard that approach as tremendously important for establishing a united front against the Communist economic drive.

Senator MONRONEY, an Oklahoma Democrat, made a rare contribution with a new and fresh idea of mutual security. We are glad to see that the administration has recovered from its first cool reaction and is apparently pushing IDA with all the persuasiveness it can muster. Under the circumstances, the proposal bears the bipartisan stamp that we would like to see on more and more departments of our foreign policy.

[From the St. Petersburg (Fla.) Times, Dec. 15, 1958]

MAKING THE MOST OF FOREIGN AID

After complicated international discussions, the United States is reported ready to go ahead with the establishment of an International Development Association which may broaden the whole concept of aid to underdeveloped nations.

Under the association plan, the United States and its allies with money to invest, principally Britain and West Germany, will be able to aid underdeveloped nations through use of the aided nation's currencies.

The plan was first proposed during the past session of Congress by Senator A. S. MIKE MONRONEY (Democrat, Oklahoma), President Eisenhower ordered a study of the plan by the Treasury Department in consultation with other countries. A draft of legislation to put the plan into operation is now reportedly being prepared for submission to the new Congress which meets in January.

The Monroney plan envisions a soft money bank, in contrast to the hard money World Bank in which the United States lends money through the United Nations, and the Export-Import Bank through which the United States lends money directly.

In operations of the two hard money banks, loans are made for specific construction purposes and repaid in the hard money currencies handled by the banks.

But some of the underdeveloped countries have accumulated large funds of their own currencies through U.S. military and economic aid. These funds are in soft currencies which are not acceptable in international trade.

Under the Monroney development organization, these soft currencies would be put to use, for example, to pay for local labor on hard currency projects financed by American dollars. Indian rupees, credited to the United States in the sale of farm surpluses, thus could be added to U.S. dollars loaned to India for development projects.

The Monroney plan has been likened to a second mortgage in the financing of aid to underdeveloped countries. In addition to making the most out of U.S. aid, it links U.S. aid with aid from its allies in the countries undergoing development.

The International Development Association would be a counterpart in other parts of the world of the Marshall plan which stimulated the cooperative reconstruction of Europe after the war. But it would broaden the Marshall plan into a cooperative program of the United States and its allies in the development of regions which may become important new allies.

PLANS NUMEROUS TO SPARK UP INVESTMENTS BY UNITED STATES ABROAD

(By Peter Edson)

WASHINGTON.—Everybody and his brother now seem to be crowding into the act with some new plan for stimulating American investments in the less developed foreign countries.

The Rockefeller Bros. Fund, Committee for Economic Development, National Planning Association, and the semiofficial business advisory council have irons in this fire.

The Government has some plans cooking on this stove, too. John Corson heads up the Business Advisory Council study staff in Department of Commerce. At the Hot Springs, Va., BAC meeting in October, Donald K. David, former dean of Harvard Business School, told the 100 tycoons assembled in closed meeting that the Government should initiate a massive effort to get American business to develop overseas investments, "in return for a reasonable fee" because private enterprise alone wouldn't do it in normal fashion.

In December a House Ways and Means Subcommittee will begin hearings on granting tax concessions to American investors overseas.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee has run two research studies on Foreign investments by Massachusetts Institute of Technology and University of Chicago.

They have come up with estimates that the world needs $3.5 billion more credit every year than is now available through established lending institutions.

Last year U.S. private investments overseas totaled $4 billion. But $3.3 billion of this was for oil exploration. Only $700 million went for nonoily enterprises.

But where there is no much smoke going up there must be some fire of enthusiasm. With so many different planning groups and individuals thinking along the same line, some concrete results should emerge from the next Congress.

Plans put forward so far fall into three main classifications: Expand the lending authority of existing international banking institutions. Create new institutions to fill the gaps in credit lines now available. Make a new approach through regional development banks to meet the needs of specific areas like Latin America, Africa, the Middle East.

The concensus seems to be that only by a combination of these methods can the Russians be beaten off in their attempts to conquer the free world by economic warfare.

Among existing institutions, the World Bank and International Monetary Fund have already voted to increase their capitalization, by amounts still to be determined.

U.S. Development Loan Fund, created by Congress in 1957, is now completing obligation of its first $400 million and will ask for more money in January.

The United Nations has just approved an expanded special projects fund. It will increase its technical assistance programs from $30 to $100 million of it.

The one new idea which shows most promise is Oklahoma Senator A. S. MONRONEY'S proposal for an International Development Association. It would be authorized to make hard and soft currency loans for up to 40 years at 2 percent interest. President Eisenhower has instructed Treasury Secretary Robert B. Anderson to investigate its possibilities as a subsidiary to the World Bank.

UNITED STATES RECOGNIZES SOVIET TRADE THREAT, DOES NOTHING ABOUT IT

To paraphrase Mark Twain's remark about the weather, everyone talks about the Communist economic offensive, but no one does anything about it.

The Soviet bloc's trade with the free world increased by 77 percent between 1952 and 1956. Between 1954 and 1958 the Communists extended nearly $2 billion in military and economic aid to 14 less-developed countries while their trade with such countries increased 70 percent. Russia has given most of this aid, but Red China and the Soviet satellites have contributed.

In every Red country, foreign trade is a state monopoly. Trade and aid are carefully coordinated within the bloc and used where they will do the most good to the Communist cause.

There is no such coordination or concentration in the free world. In trade it is every nation for itself. The United States dumps surplus wheat even though it damages an ally's economy. West Germany, through governmental subsidies to exporters, cuts other nations out of traditional markets.

Free world nations compete among themselves, with tariffs and embargoes and subsidies, more bitterly than they compete with the Reds. As for economic and technical aid, each large country has its own program and pays little attention to what allies are doing.

There is no lack of pleas and proposals for a united free world economic effort. British leaders have insisted that a joint economic strategy is as essential as unified military and political strategies. They predict disaster if the free nations do not end trade wars, halt commodity price fluctuations, control recessions and lead the underdeveloped areas to stability and freedom.

The Rockefeller brothers report recently proposed a western hemispheric economic union to work closely with Western Europe's contemplated common market. NATO leaders have proposed that body as a structure for economic unification.

Governor Harriman, of New York, wants this country to lead a cooperative attack, through the United Nations, on problems of the underdeveloped areas. Adlai Stevenson has a parallel proposal. Senator MONRONEY, Democrat, of Oklahoma, has won Senate approval of an international development association which would offer long-term, low-interest loans to new and struggling countries.

Administration leaders admit the peril. Allen Dulles, CIA Director; Douglas Dillon, Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs; Vice President Nixon; and even Secretary of State Dulles have said that the war without shots is as dangerous for the free world as a shooting war. Yet the administration has opposed, or brushed off, all the proposals that would lead to meaningful unification of the West's economic effort.

The administration has talked a great deal about economic interdependence. But it has done nothing to transform that phrase into fact. It has warned of the challenge of the U.S.S.R. in fields of trade and aid. But it has done little to meet that challenge.

FANFANI'S PROPOSALS FOR THE MIDEAST

As an economics professor, 50-year-old Amintore Fanfani still manages to get in his lectures at the University of Rome in addition to looking after his bigger job as Prime Minister. Moreover, as a venturesome spirit—his last book was "The Economic History of the Vikings"—he may be expected to have brought along some bold economic ideas in his briefcase for his visit with President Eisenhower and Secretary of State Dulles.

Signor Fanfani believes that the NATO nations should be something more than a military alliance, and prove, by joint economic projects in the Middle East, that they have the welfare of the emerging, underdeveloped nations at heart. One plan, advanced by his predecessor, Prime Minister Pella, proposed that Italy use for such a purpose interest payments due to the United States under its Marshall plan grants. Since then Senator MONRONEY has proposed a billion-dollar fund for a new World Bank which would bank promising loans which cannot meet the World Bank's requirements. President Eugene Black, of the World Bank, also has made proposals for economic assistance to the have-not areas.

Prime Minister Fanfani, in his discussions here, is hopeful of getting some concrete agreement on advancing one or another of these plans, or a compromise among them. Certainly such economic development should have a very high priority among the allies. West Germany has already recognized this in agreeing to join France in a $500 million project to develop North African economies. As Germaine Tillion has made so clear in her penetrating study, "Algeria," the basic problem there is too many people for too few jobs—and one which grows with a population explosion produced by the wonder drugs and their lowered infant mortality all over the world. The same is certainly true of Egypt, and all the nations where Arab nationalism is an emotional expression of the deep and real deprivations which men like Nasser do very little to remedy. One of the ways the West could show the earnestness of its desire to help the Arab peoples into modern technology would be along the lines Signor Fanfani is advocating. Congress would do well to study his ideas.

TRIBUTE TO AMERICAN MOTION PICTURE INDUSTRY AND JACK L. WARNER

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, in paying tribute to the American motion picture industry and to Jack L. Warner, my colleague, the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], has prepared a statement in which he comments on the achievements of the motion picture industry and on the record of this great man. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague's statement be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HUMPHREY

On many occasions, it has been my pleasure to pay tribute to the patriotic services of various American groups.

In my judgment, there are few industries which have demonstrated their devotion to the American people more abundantly and more continuously than the motion picture industry.

In war and in peace, there have been few, if any, public-spirited causes in which the industry and its leaders have not cooperated.

That is one of the reasons why last week, in appearing on a panel program of the Third Conference on International Exchange of Persons, here in Washington, I was pleased to commend the industry for its latest cooperation in the exchange of films.

Today, however, I should like to draw particular attention to one individual in the industry who has long been one of its greatest figures.

I should like to add my word to that of vast numbers of individuals throughout the land in welcoming back Jack L. Warner, president of Warner Bros. Pictures.

"Welcome back, Jack," is the theme of salutes during an entire week, as observed throughout this land and abroad. This week, States, municipalities, patriotic groups and civic associations are joining the press and the motion picture industry in testimonials to the services and work of Jack L. Warner.

More perhaps than any other living man, Jack L. Warner has contributed to the development and advancement of this great medium.

He is one of its foremost pioneers. Much of the credit for bringing sound to the screen may be attributed to him. But talking pictures represent but one of the technical innovations which he has spearheaded.

The name Warner Brothers symbolizes, as we know, a whole galaxy of unforgettable films which have stirred the American people and which have met with enthusiastic audiences throughout the world.

The notable productions from the Warner Brothers Studio are so numerous that they could hardly be enumerated in this brief word of tribute.

I could not, however, fail to mention such enduring masterpieces as "The Story of Louis Pasteur" and "Dr. Ehrlich's Magic Bullet."

The Warner Brothers special patriotic films, depicting the signing of the Declaration of Independence and highlighting our great American ideals and historical moments are known around the world. Their contribution to the understanding of the American tradition of liberty is beyond calculation.

Mr. Warner, through the production of films based on the lives of great Americans, has dramatized for all the world to see the achievements made possible by freedom.

The crisis which came with World War II found him, as usual, ready and eager to serve his country. During the war, he not only dedicated the resources of his studio to the national effort but personally took on the uniform of his country the more effectively to serve.

Jack L. Warner's good citizenship has won for him many accolades but his dedication to service goes beyond national boundaries. He sees and uses the screen as a dynamic medium to advance understanding and foster good relations among all peoples of good will.

This dedication to service has brought him well-deserved recognition in many awards, a few of which are: The United States Medal for Merit, the French Legion of Honor, a scroll of tribute from free China, Mexico's Order of the Aztec Eagle, the Gold Distinguished Service Medal from the Disabled American Veterans, the Italian Order of Solidarity, First Class; United States Treasury Department Distinguished Service Citation.

He has been honored with many more awards * * * too many to recite here. But I am confident that high among them all, he will cherish a current tribute which comes not alone from the industry with which he is so eminently associated, but from the worldwide public that the industry serves.

It is a privilege, therefore, to join the citizens of the United States and the peoples of the free world in rendering this acknowledgement to Jack L. Warner on the occasion of Jack L. Warner Week.

The past is but prologue to the further contributions which we know he is going to make to his industry and to this country.

TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE EXPORT-IMPORT BANK

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, today there has appeared in the Wall Street Journal an article entitled "Export-Import Bank Turns 25 Today, Has Earned Over $700 Million for Uncle Sam."

The Export-Import Bank is a Government agency which has done an extremely fine job during the 25 years it has been in existence, and I believe it quite appropriate that that fact be called to the attention of the Senate.

During these 25 years of its operations, the Export-Import Bank has, according to the article, approved over $10 billion of credits in some 1,600 transactions. Only $6,600,000,000 of those credits have actually been disbursed. Many of them have been repaid; the rest have been held back for one reason or another. At the present time the bank has $1,600,000,000 committed but undisbursed.

During this period of time the bank has made profits of $732 million. Of this amount, $196 million has been paid into the Treasury, over the years, as dividends on a $1 billion stock investment in the bank. The bank keeps the other $536 million as reserves.

The bank operates by borrowing money from the Treasury. Over this period of time, it has paid the Treasury a total of $242 million in interest paid by those who have borrowed. The bank makes a profit, because it obtains its funds from the Treasury at the going rate of interest which the Government has to pay for money, and lends out the money at a higher rate of interest.

Mr. President, I may say that although the Export-Import Bank itself does not like to be referred to as a foreign-aid agency, it has been one of the most potent agencies in our foreign-aid programs, in making repayable or bank loans to various governments, various agencies, and various companies throughout the world.

During this period of time the bank has sustained losses amounting to a total of only $2,900,000. Of course, some of the loans now outstanding certainly are less good than some of the others; but, as a whole, the agency has operated in a very sound manner.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, the very informative article which was published today in the Wall Street Journal.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXPORT-IMPORT BANK TURNS 25 TODAY, HAS EARNED OVER $700 MILLION FOR UNCLE SAM

(By John R. Gibson)

WASHINGTON.—The granddaddy of Uncle Sam's foreign-aid agencies, the Export-Import Bank, turns 25 years old today with the unusual record of having earned over $700 million in profits for the Government.

In fact, the Eisenhower administration considers the earnings picture is good enough that the bank's own borrowings could be financed on the public securities market, rather than from the U.S. Treasury. This, of course, would help President Eisenhower keep his budget for next fiscal year balanced at $77 billion, since the bank's lending of funds from the Treasury count as Government spending.

It is understood, however, that Bank officials are leery about the idea. For one thing, it would likely mean slightly higher interest costs for the Bank, which currently gets its money at the average rate of interest paid by the Treasury on the money it borrows. The Bank would certainly have a less favorable credit rating than the entire U.S. Government. Furthermore, such borrowings, even though handled by the Treasury, would add more redtape to the Bank's operations.

BORN DURING DEPRESSION

Depression born, the Bank lends most of its money to finance exports by U.S. companies. It also makes loans to poorer countries for economic development, but many of these must also be spent in the United States for American-made goods.

Through its loans, the Bank has since February 12, 1934, become one of the country's chief dispensers of foreign aid—even though its officials quarrel with that description of their activities. Its first loan, however, would be considered a form of foreign aid today: that was a credit to Cuba to finance the minting of silver coins in the United States.

But no matter how one describes their work, Bank officials, headed by President Samuel Waugh, are proud of their profit-making record.

An up-to-date report by the Bank shows it has made $732 million in profits. Of this, $196 million has been paid to the Treasury over the years as dividends on a $1 billion stock investment in the Bank. The Bank keeps the other $536 million as reserves.

Business is getting better, too. President Eisenhower's January budget predicts the agency will show net income of $82 million this fiscal year and $88 million in fiscal 1960, starting July 1, compared with $67 million in the fiscal 1958.

The Bank has paid the Treasury an additional $242 million in interest on borrowings over the 25 years, the Bank said in its birthday report. It has authority from Congress to borrow up to $6 billion from the Treasury on a revolving basis. It relends the cash, making its profits by charging a higher interest rate than the Treasury must pay to borrow money itself.

Altogether, the bank figures it has approved over $10 billion of credits in some 1,600 transactions over the years. Only $6.6 billion of these credits have actually been disbursed—many of them repaid—with the rest held back for one reason or another.

At present, the bank has $1.6 billion committed but undisbursed. Britain, for instance, is paying 1 percent interest on $250 million of credit it got during the 1956–57 Suez War but never picked up. London must decide by the end of February whether to continue the standby arrangement or not.

LOSSES ONLY $2,900,000

Loan losses have totaled only $2,900,000. But several other credits are known to be shaky in Nationalist China, Bolivia, and Haiti.

The bank figures it has encouraged more than $1 billion in U.S. private investment abroad through its loans and loan guaranties.

Now in its busiest year, other than fiscal 1957, when it made its big credit to Britain, the Export-Import agency figures to make about $1.2 billion of credit commitments. The President's budget projects fiscal 1960 loans and guaranties at about the same mark, compared with the $857 million of fiscal 1958.

However, not everyone agrees the bank does everything right. From time to time, for instance, the Export-Import agency and the completely separate 68-nation World Bank tangle over credit projects. These differences usually come when the World Bank thinks a certain country should be denied international loans until it curbs inflation or otherwise puts its economic house in order. Often in such instances the Export-Import Bank won't see things quite that way because a credit would be to the advantage of U.S. foreign policy or to a hard-pressed U.S. industry.

OREGON'S 100TH ANNIVERSARY

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, Saturday, February 14, 1959, is a day of many meanings. To some, to the schoolchild, to the young in heart, whatever be their chronological age, or to the florists and candymakers, it commemorates a Roman martyr of the third century who by the ironic usage and the strange alchemy of history has become transformed into a romantic symbol. There are a few, and I hope only a few, to whom the day is but another Saturday, and if they mark it at all they do so in anticipation of the holiday which follows.

However, Mr. President, my colleagues from Oregon on this day join with our friends in the Congress from the great State of Arizona in celebrating yet a third type of anniversary. It was on Valentine's Day, 1859, that Oregon was admitted to the Union. Oregon, the 33d State, added to the Union a broad and fertile expanse of wheatfields, snow-capped mountains, verdant forests, wide rivers, and rugged coast.

Mr. President, I am proud and happy to announce that to help us celebrate the historic occasion of our 100th birthday Senate Majority Leader LYNDON JOHNSON and Speaker SAM RAYBURN of the House of Representatives will join a gathering of Oregonians in the Senate restaurant tomorrow to cut a 100-candle birthday cake.

On behalf of all of us who call Oregon home, I wish to express my heartfelt thanks to these two Texas colleagues of the Oregon delegation in Congress for their interest in joining us in our celebration.

Oregon enters its second century with an illustrious history of a first century of progress and achievement.

It is in connection with this anniversary celebration that I offer on behalf of the Oregon delegation to the most distinguished President pro tempore and all the citizens of his State the heartiest of congratulations on this anniversary of the admittance of the State of Arizona to the imperishable Union. Arizona, like Oregon, has been called the Valentine State because its birthday is February 14. On that day in 1912 it became a sovereign State.

So, too, Mr. President, it is fitting that for a moment I digress from my theme to pay tribute to the youngest of our sister States. As the representative of a centennial State, I welcome with gladness the entry of our sister to the far north into the family of our great Nation. At the same time, I express the fervent hope that 1959, marked as it is with so many events, will be remembered in history by the Oregon centennial and the admission of the great State of Alaska as an equal partner among the United States, and I hope, by the addition of a 50th State, Hawaii. So, Mr. President, as a representative of the 33d State, I pay my respects to the 48th and 49th States. We are bound together, not alone by the strong bands of the Union, but, in addition, by ties of friendship and the sharing of historic memories brought to mind by the coincidence of date and year.

The centennial celebration in Oregon which is continuing through this year, and which will be formally opened at the State capitol in Salem this coming Saturday, permits Oregonians to pause for a moment to reflect upon that which has gone before and to take inventory of the present in order that we may plan soberly for the future. It is, as it were, a summit in time from which eminence we can scan the route we have traveled and look westward into the valleys of the future. Thus, the observance of a centennial, over and above the advertisement it affords for our God-given beauties of farm, field, river, forge, and coastline, permits also a look at the spiritual geography which, as much as the physical, shapes our destinies.

Few would deny that the political geography of Oregon is marked by such achievements as the direct primary, the initiative, and the referendum. These are landmarks of democracy as awe-inspiring, each in its own way, as is Tillamook Head, the Gorge of the Columbia, Crater Lake, or the majestic crests of Mount Hood and Mount Jefferson in the realm of nature's masterpieces.

The monumental political developments mentioned a moment ago have social parallels. Dr. Domenico Gagliardo, in his "American Social Insurance," a standard text used in graduate courses, has this to say about medical insurance plans:

In this country the first medical prepayment plans developed in the mining and lumbering regions of Washington and Oregon, where settlements were small and usually far removed from large urban centers.

After making a footnote reference to a claim of Tampa, Fla., to early activity in this area, Dr. Gagliardo goes on to say:

Employers contracted with doctors and hospitals to care for workers injured in the course of their employment, sharing the cost with the workers. Later those States required by law that employers and employees contribute to the cost of medical care for industrial accidents covered by their workmen's compensation acts. Contracts were made by employers with hospital associations, commercial clinics, and later with medical society service bureaus, to care for the industrially injured. Many employers and employee groups then increased their contributions in order to provide themselves and their dependents with medical care for nonindustrial illness and injury as well. The movement spread slowly to other areas.

He also stated at another point:

Medical society plans in Washington and Oregon are the most liberal of all private plans in regard to benefits.

In the field of progressive social action the legislation passed under the administration of Gov. Oswald West, to preserve forever in the public interest free access to the matchless Oregon beaches by making the entire length of Oregon coast a public highway, shows a foresight in the conservation of natural beauty for recreational purposes which few, if any, of our sister States can claim to equal.

In the field of labor legislation, Mr. President, the record speaks for itself. To document it for the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks pages 274–276 of the "1959–60 Oregon Blue Book," a publication of the State of Oregon.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LABOR—OREGON'S PROGRESSIVE LEGISLATION LEADS NATION: SAFETY, WAGE, HOUR, WOMEN, CHILD LABOR, CIVIL RIGHTS LAWS

No other State gives a better deal to its citizens who work for a living than Oregon.

It has been part of the traditional policy of this State that industrial efficiency for the most part, stems from the proper treatment of workers. True to this belief Oregon has been a leader in progressive labor legislation for more than a half-century—with net gain that her workers are prosperous and happy and that she has had less industrial discord than most States.

LABOR PEACE MAPPED

Oregon laid the basis for her peaceful industrial scene over 50 years ago when her wage earners numbered no more than 30,000 in population of a half-million. Although living in a primarily agricultural economy, Oregonians of that time were aware that their young State through her water, timber, and other natural resources had a huge industrial potential that some day would be utilized to the hilt. They were fearful that an undesirable factory system with its attendant strife between management and labor would come into being. An Oregon Governor of the era, George E. Chamberlain, expressed the concern of most Oregonians in his message to the legislature of 1903: "A spirit of toleration has existed between employers and employees," he said and "it is to be desired that the friendly relations which have existed between these great forces in Oregon may continue for all time. . . ."

Oregon voters figured that progressive labor laws would achieve such harmony and they backed creation of a State labor department whose main job would be: (1) to assess changing economic and social conditions; and (2) to collect facts and figures on both management and labor activities so that intelligent legislation could be enacted and then enforced in a quiet and peaceable manner.

SAFETY FIRST IN FACTORIES

The resulting code of labor laws accumulated over five decades placed Oregon among the Nation's leaders in constructive legislation affecting the worker.

Oregon's first concern was to introduce the safety first principle into her expanding factories. An early-day program of industrial safety education made her factories and workshops safe and sanitary places to work, and brought on a workman's compensation act which today is among the best and most comprehensive of its kind in the Nation.

The comprehensive inspection of electrical installations and of elevator installations and material, and the inspection of boilers, unfired pressure vessels, and liquid petroleum gas tanks have resulted in an excellent safety record in these fields. Highway advertising was brought under regulation in 1955 for both safety and esthetic reasons.

In the protection of working women and girls, Oregon has attained preeminence among the 48 States. Oregon passed the first enforceable wage and hour act in the country. In 1913, through a special wage and hour commission, she set a minimum wage and maximum working hours for women—the first ruling of its kind ever made by a commission in America. The commission presently regulates employment of women through industrial orders setting maximum work hours, minimum wages, and other working conditions.

CHILD LABOR REGULATED

Child workers under 18 come in for their share of protection. The State of Oregon, for more than 50 years, has hewed to the dictum laid down by the Oregon Supreme Court that the regulation of children's working conditions is necessary if they are to be mentally and physically capable of performing the duties and relations of adult life. With the State closely supervising the wages, hours, and general working conditions of its young workers under 18, and with a school law which requires their attendance at school until the 12th grade is passed, the evils of child labor are practically nonexistent in Oregon.

Busy with the protection of today's industrial worker the State does not neglect the training of tomorrow's industrial worker. Oregon has a plan of on-the-job apprenticeship training, coupled with supplementary classwork, which prepares young men and women for the dual responsibilities of citizenship and craftsmanship.

No one ever questions the right of a worker to the wages he has earned, yet thousands of workers across the Nation each year are unable to collect the wages due them. Oregon is one of 17 States in the Union which, on request of the worker, will collect his overdue wages, by court action if necessary.

LABOR DISPUTES FEW

Labor disputes in the Beaver State have been relatively few, and this holds true for those great periods of nationwide turbulence and industrial activity.

An official report on State industrial conditions for two such periods is enlightening. An official report for the 1920 era states: "There have been fewer strikes and lockouts in Oregon than in any other State of the Union," and in 1945, a report on World War II conditions, a period of population growth and construction of new industrial plants, noted: "No other State had a lower percentage of man-days idle as a result of industrial disputes."

State employment records reveal only one out of 787 of the State's wage earners has been involved in labor disputes over the past 12 years. Oregon's tradition of settling disputes by calm, judicial proceedings rather than by battles, clubs, and violence has reaped its tangible reward.

UNIONS PRECEDED STATEHOOD

Organized labor in Oregon along all industrial lines has increased steadily, and its relations with the public and with management are generally good. Unions are not Johnny-come-latelies to the Oregon scene. Labor organizers came across the plains in the covered wagon.

THE FIRST CRAFT UNION

More than 100 years ago the first craft union, the printers, was formed in 1853 before Oregon became a State. Oregonians held that unions which were correctly conducted, were evidences of good citizenship, and benefited not only working men and women, but the public and management as well. The fact that for several years responsible management and organized labor have been meeting successfully at an annual industrial forum, sponsored by the University of Oregon, shows the respect responsible management and organized labor hold for one another. Here, general problems affecting both groups are threshed out in public discussion.

The problem of the migrant worker is felt to some extent in certain areas of Oregon. While crops are harvested in the main by local residents, between 18,000 and 20,000 migrant workers enter the State during the peak harvest months of June and August.

EQUAL PAY FOR EQUAL WORK

In 1955, it became unlawful for an employer to discriminate between the sexes in the payment of wages for work of comparable character, the performance of which requires comparable skills; thus another discriminatory practice was made a violation of the law.

SIXTH WITH CIVIL RIGHTS

In 1949, still true to her traditional policy of fair treatment for all workers, Oregon became the sixth State in the Nation to pass a Fair Employment Practices Act in which it was declared that the opportunity to obtain employment without discrimination because of race, religion, color, or national origin is a civil right. In ensuing years, civil rights legislation has been extended to prohibit such discrimination in places of public accommodation, resort or amusement, in publicly assisted housing, and in private vocational, professional, or trade schools.

If Oregon sticks to her traditional labor policy, she will continue to be a good and reasonable place for the laboring man and woman to work and raise a family.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the effect of physical geography upon a people has been studied by many an historian. Today I wish to touch for a moment upon the effect of moral or spiritual geography upon the politics of a people. Unless a people have vision it will perish. Unless a people establish goals which are worthy and unselfish it deserves to perish.

The shards of past nations who looked too low or in the wrong directions have long since been scattered upon the dust heaps of time. We in America must, if we wish to avoid the shattering fate which overtook our predecessors, look to our foundation faith. We are young as a Nation, because we affirmed and witnessed before the Old World our manifest belief in the goodness of man, his ability to learn from experience, and his right and duty to govern himself through the orderly processes of democratic institutions based upon procedural safeguards which protect the individual in his search for self development and fulfillment.

There is a phrase, originally a theological concept, which sums up the point I strive to make. It is "The brotherhood of man under the fatherhood of God." These words come to us as a unifying mountain chain of morality which precipitates the water of life upon the broad and fertile plains of religious toleration, racial equality, and even-handed justice under law. Through these principles succeeding generations of men may grow strong, each after its own fashion, that America may continue to live through their strength from century to century.

The spiritual geography and the political geography of a nation are inescapably interwoven, for the latter depends upon the former and is but the political expression of it. The political geography wears a different form, but in essence it must emerge with the principles of morality or be eroded into shifting sand or quivering muck.

The people of Oregon have in the past century built their institutional landmarks solidly upon democratic principles, and in doing so contributed to the continuing strength of the Union. As we Oregonians pause here today, to mark this significant century of our statehood, it is my earnest prayer that the Oregon Trail we seek in the century to come will lead upward toward greater peaks of morality and justice.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1959

The House met at 10:30 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Judges 18: 5: Ask counsel of God, that we may know whether our way, which we go, shall be prosperous.

Eternal God, our Father, who art always seeking to draw us within the compass and circuit of Thy divine fellowship, grant that we may be eager to accept and acclaim the overtures of Thy friendship and love.

We acknowledge humbly that we greatly need Thy counsel and companionship in order that we may be equal to all the tasks and responsibilities which are far beyond our finite wisdom and strength.

Inspire our souls to lay hold confidently and courageously of those principles of truth and righteousness, good will and brotherhood which Thou hast ordained for the building of a nobler civilization.

May glory and majesty, dominion, and power, through Jesus Christ, our Lord, be Thine forever and ever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Ratchford, one of his secretaries.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND AND INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 77)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read by the Clerk and, together with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

In the Bretton Woods Agreements Act of 1945 Congress authorized the participation of the United States in the International Monetary Fund and in the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

This act of leadership on the part of the Government of the United States made it possible to bring these two great international institutions into being and to launch a major effort among the nations of the free world designed to establish an effective and continuing system of international cooperation in the fields of monetary and exchange policy and economic development.

Since their foundation 12 years ago, the United States has given vigorous support to the Bank and the Fund.

The two institutions have been outstandingly successful.

The Bank has assisted on an increasing scale the economic growth of the less developed countries through well-conceived and intelligently executed development projects. The Fund, through the provision of wise counsel and timely financial assistance to member countries faced with balance-of-payments difficulties, has successfully promoted the adoption of sound fiscal, monetary and foreign exchange policies in member countries.

The international standing achieved by the Bank and Fund is such that the international economic system of today cannot successfully function without them. They are indeed vital to the continued economic growth and cohesion of the entire free world.

The National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems, which is responsible for advising me with respect to United States relationships with the Bank and Fund, has now recommended that the resources of the Bank and Fund be increased.

I strongly concur in this recommendation. Accordingly, I ask that Congress, in accordance with the provisions of the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, authorize the U.S. Governor of the International Monetary Fund to request and consent to an increase of 50 percent in the quota of the United States in the International Monetary Fund, and authorize the U.S. Governor of the International Bank to vote for an increase of 110 percent in the capital stock of the Bank, and, subject to said increase becoming effective, subscribe on behalf of the United States to 31,750 additional shares of stock of the Bank, amounting to a doubling of the United States subscription.

The recommended increase is necessary to enable the two institutions to continue to operate successfully over the years ahead. Our subscriptions are the only financial support we are required to give these institutions. Within the framework of their capital structure, they are self-supporting and do not require additional periodic contributions.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

The International Monetary Fund has two primary tasks. It promotes international monetary cooperation and sound foreign exchange practices which are vital to the balanced growth of world trade and development. It also provides short-term financial assistance to member countries to help them stabilize their currencies, maintain or move toward convertibility, and overcome temporary balance-of-payments problems without resorting to restrictions or other practices which may be harmful to international cooperation. In its financial operations, the Fund utilizes the gold and currencies which have been provided to it by the member countries on the basis of their quotas. These operations consist of advances or drawings repayable in not more than 3 to 5 years.

Since the beginning of its operations, the Fund has made available about $4.1 billion to 36 countries. Of this sum $3.2 billion was actually drawn in cash; commitments of over $800 million under standby arrangements or lines of credit are still outstanding; and $100 million in such credits were allowed to expire unused. Approximately two-thirds of the total was provided during the past 2 years, and the total amount of drawings and unused standby commitments outstanding on December 31, 1958, was $2.6 billion. On that date, the Fund's holdings of gold and U.S. dollars available for new advances or commitments were $1.4 billion, compared with $3.5 billion at the end of 1956. In the light of past experience, this amount would not be adequate if calls on the fund comparable to those of recent years were made. The fund must maintain sufficient liquid resources to constitute a second line of reserves to which its members can turn with assurance at any time.

The proposed general increase of 50 percent in the resources of the Fund, together with larger increases requested by a few countries, will meet this need. These increases will raise the resources of the fund by approximately $5 billion, of which gold and dollars will amount to some $2.3 billion. If these new resources are made available, the free world can have full confidence in the capacity of the Fund to perform its tasks in the coming years.

Under the articles of agreements of the Fund, when a quota is increased, the member must pay 25 percent of the increase in gold, and the balance in its currency. In our case, this means a payment of approximately $344 million in gold and $1,031 million in dollars. The latter will be held in non-interest-bearing notes to be utilized only at such time as the Fund may need cash to meet drawings by its members.

I should like to stress the cooperative nature of this proposed increase in fund resources. Three-fourths of the gold to be paid to the fund will come from other countries. Moreover, the additional holdings of other leading currencies will be increasingly useful to the fund, particularly in view of the recent extension of the convertibility of major European currencies. This increase in resources on a very broad base is assured by the provision that the increase will not become effective until members having 75 percent of present fund quotas have consented to quota increases.

INTERNATIONAL BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development has, in its 12 years of operations, made loans of over $4 billion in 49 different countries and territories. The Bank's reconstruction loans were made in 1947, and since then the Bank has made loans of some $3.6 billion for productive development projects. Loans by the Bank are currently running at the rate of about $700 million per year. Most of these loans have been made to the underdeveloped areas of the world. The Bank's own financing and technical assistance activities have increased the pace of economic growth all over the free world. The Bank has also been able to act as a conduit and stimulant to the flow of private capital into less developed areas.

Under the charter of the International Bank, only a small part of its authorized capital is available for lending, and the Bank obtains its funds primarily through borrowings in the financial markets of the world. Most of its authorized capital is, in effect, a guarantee for these borrowings. The Bank has raised the equivalent of more than $2 billion through issuance of its bonds in several different currencies. Approximately $1.8 billion of such bonds are currently outstanding. These bonds are recognized throughout the world as high quality securities. Both because of the member countries' guarantees and because of the outstanding character of its record, the Bank has been able to borrow large sums of money at frequent intervals at rates of interest comparable to those on high-grade Government securities. This permits the Bank to fix interest rates on its own loans that do not impose undue burdens on the borrowing countries.

At present, and in the foreseeable future, the ability of the Bank to raise funds in the capital market of the United States will depend largely upon the guarantee inherent in this country's subscription. Under the current rate of Bank borrowing, the present amount of this guarantee will be exceeded in the next 2 years. If the Bank is to continue to play its full part in raising productivity and living standards, additional capital far beyond the amount covered by the existing U.S. subscription will be needed.

The proposed increase of 110 percent in the total capital of the Bank and of 100 percent in the U.S. subscription will permit the Bank to meet its needs for borrowed funds for a substantial period of time. No part of the increase in our subscription would be required to be paid in except to meet defaults on the Bank's obligations. There is no reason to believe that this contingent liability will become a real one.

As in the case of the Fund, the proposed increase in the capital of the Bank will not become effective until subscriptions have been received for approximately 75 percent of the existing capital. This will assure a wide participation by the member countries.

The Special Report of the National Advisory Council, which describes in detail the proposal to increase the resources of the Bank and Fund, is attached.

The entire free world needs sound currencies and orderly exchange systems to foster trade and economic growth and it needs capital which will support rising living standards and accelerate the pace of economic development in all of the member countries. The International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development have achieved outstanding records as effective instruments toward these ends. For the well-being of the free world and in our own interest, it is essential that the proposed increases in the resources of these two institutions take place.

There is real urgency for prompt action. The United States has for many months been taking the lead in this important effort to equip the Bank and Fund to continue their work. The countries of the free world look to the United States, because of our economic strength, to set the pace by acting without delay to take up our subscription in the new stock of the Bank and to pay our quota increase in the Fund. I consider it to be most important for the U.S. Government to maintain the posture of leadership which it now occupies. To this end, I urge the Congress to enact the necessary legislation so that these increases may promptly be made effective, to insure further progress toward realizing a better life for the peoples of the free world.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

INVOCATION

The SPEAKER. The invocation will be delivered by the Reverend Bernard Braskamp, D.D., Chaplain of the House of Representatives.

Dr. BRASKAMP. I Corinthians 13: 13: And now abideth faith, hope, and charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity.

Most merciful and gracious God, we have assembled here to pay tribute to the life and character of a great American patriot who stood like a giant among his contemporaries and whose record of heroic service has made an indelible impression upon succeeding generations.

We rejoice that he always kept the windows of his soul open toward the unseen and eternal, whence came his insight and inspiration, his faith and fortitude, his humility and charity.

Grant that his indomitable passion for the preservation of the Union may also inspire our longing to promote and preserve the union and concord of God-fearing men and nations in their search and struggle for peace and freedom.

May our beloved country continue to pray and labor to bring to fulfillment and fruition that blessed day when all the members of the human family shall walk and work together in friendship and fraternity.

Hear us in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

THE U.S. ARMY BAND

The SPEAKER. Members of the Congress, we will now have the pleasure of some renditions by the U.S. Army Band under the direction of Maj. Hugh Curry.

The U.S. Army Band played the following marches: "Adoration," "Spirit of Independence," "Man of the Hour," and "All-American Soldier."

The SPEAKER. Members of the Congress, we will now be entertained by a choral group as known as the Idlers, Cadets of the U.S. Coast Guard Academy.

The Coast Guard Academy Chorus, the Idlers, under the direction of Bandmaster Donald L. Janse, rendered a medley of excerpts from sacred and secular music: "Lord, Thou Hast Been Our Dwelling Place Forever," "America," "Dixie," "When Johnnie Comes Marching Home," "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp, the Boys Are Marching," "Ora Lee," "Battle Hymn of the Republic," "Taps," and the closing portion of "Lincoln's Gettysburg Address." Arrangement by Bandmaster Janse.

READING OF THE GETTYSBURG ADDRESS

The SPEAKER. Members of the Congress, it is now my great pleasure to present a very famous man who has been heard and seen throughout the country and throughout the world, twice an Academy Award winner, and selected for his present role after consultation with the Motion Picture Association of the United States of America. I take great pleasure, therefore, in presenting to you a distinguished cititzen, a fine man, and a great artist, Fredric March. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. March will now read the Gettysburg Address.

Mr. MARCH. Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, Members of the Congress, honored guests:

"Fourscore and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

"Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation or any nation so conceived and so dedicated can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field, as a final resting-place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

"But, in a larger sense, we cannot dedicate—we cannot consecrate—we cannot hallow—this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it, far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion—that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain—that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom—and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

[Applause, the Members rising.]

ADDRESS

The SPEAKER. And now it becomes my great pleasure, and I deem it a high privilege, to be able to present to you the man who in all probability knows more about the life, the times, the hopes, and the aspirations of Abraham Lincoln than any other human being. He has studied and has put on paper his conceptions of the towering figure of this great and this good man. I take pleasure and I deem it an honor to be able to present to you this great writer, this great historian, Carl Sandburg.

[Applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. SANDBURG. Before beginning this prepared address, I must make the remark that this introduction, this reception here calls for humility rather than pride. I am well aware of that.

Not often in the story of mankind does a man arrive on earth who is both steel and velvet, who is as hard as rock and soft as drifting fog, who holds in his heart and mind the paradox of terrible storm and peace unspeakable and perfect. Here and there across centuries come reports of men alleged to have these contrasts. And the incomparable Abraham Lincoln born 150 years ago this day, is an approach if not a perfect realization of this character. In the time of the April lilacs in the year 1865, on his death, the casket with his body was carried north and west a thousand miles; and the American people wept as never before; bells sobbed, cities wore crepe; people stood in tears and with hats off as the railroad burial car paused in the leading cities of seven States ending its journey at Springfield, Ill., the hometown. During the 4 years he was President he at times, especially in the first 3 months, took to himself the powers of a dictator; he commanded the most powerful armies till then assembled in modern warfare; he enforced conscription of soldiers for the first time in American history; under imperative necessity he abolished the right of habeus corpus; he directed politically and spiritually the wild, massive turbulent forces let loose in civil war; he argued and pleaded for compensated emanicipation of the slaves. The slaves were property, they were on the tax-books along with horses and cattle, the valuation of each slave written next to his name on the tax assessor's books. Failing to get action on compensated emancipation, as a Chief Executive having war powers he issued the paper by which he declared the slaves to be free under military necessity. In the end nearly $4 million worth of property was taken away from those who were legal owners of it, property confiscated, wiped out as by fire and turned to ashes, at his instigation and executive direction. Chattel property recognized and lawful for 300 years was expropriated, seized without payment.

In the month the war began he told his secretary, John Hay:

> My policy is to have no policy.

Three years later in a letter to a Kentucky friend made public, he confessed plainly:

> I have been controlled by events.

His words at Gettysburg were sacred, yet strange with a color of the familiar:

> We cannot consecrate—we cannot hallow—this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it, far beyond our poor power to add or detract.

He could have said "the brave Union men." Did he have a purpose in omitting the word "Union?" Was he keeping himself and his utterance clear of the passion that would not be good to look back on when the time came for peace and reconciliation? Did he mean to leave an implication that there were brave Union men and brave Confederate men, living and dead, who had struggled there? We do not know, of a certainty. Was he thinking of the Kentucky father whose two sons died in battle, one in Union blue, the other in Confederate gray, the father inscribing on the stone over their double grave, "God knows which was right"? We do not know. His changing policies from time to time aimed at saving the Union. In the end his armies won and his Nation became a world power. In August of 1864 he wrote a memorandum that he expected in view of the national situation, he expected to lose the next November election. That month of August was so dark. Sudden military victory brought the tide his way; the vote was 2,200,000 for him and 1,800,000 against him. Among his bitter opponents were such figures as Samuel F. B. Morse, inventor of the telegraph, and Cyrus H. McCormick, inventor of the farm reaper. In all its essential propositions the southern Confederacy had the moral support of powerful, respectable elements throughout the North, probably more than a million voters believing in the justice of the southern cause. While the war winds howled he insisted that the Mississippi was one river meant to belong to one country, that railroad connection from coast to coast must be pushed through and the Union Pacific Railroad made a reality. While the luck of war wavered and broke and came again, as generals failed and campaigns were lost, he held enough forces of the north together to raise new armies and supply them, until generals were found who made war as victorious war has always been made, with terror, frightfulness, destruction, and on both sides, North and South, valor and sacrifice past words of man to tell. In the mixed shame and blame of the immense wrongs of two crashing civilizations, often with nothing to say, he said nothing, slept not at all, and on occasions he was seen to weep in a way that made weeping appropriate, decent, majestic. As he rode alone on horseback near Soldiers Home on the edge of Washington one night his hat was shot off; a son he loved died as he watched at the bed; his wife was accused of betraying information to the enemy, until denials from him were necessary. An Indiana man at the White House heard him say, "Voorhees, don't it seem strange to you that I, who could never so much as cut off the head of a chicken, should be elected, or selected, into the midst of all this blood?" He tried to guide General Nathaniel Prentiss Banks, a Democrat, three times Governor of Massachusetts, in the governing of some 17 of the 48 parishes of Louisiana controlled by the Union armies, an area holding a fourth of the slaves of Louisiana. He would like to see the State recognize the emancipation proclamation:

> And while she is at it, I think it would not be objectionable for her to adopt some practical system by which the two races could gradually live themselves out of their old relation to each other, and both come out better prepared for the new. Education for the young blacks should be included in the plan.

To Gov. Michel Hahn, elected in 1864 by a majority of the 11,000 white male voters who had taken the oath of allegiance to the Union, Lincoln wrote:

> Now you are about to have a convention which, among other things, will probably define the elective franchise, I barely suggest for your private consideration, whether some of the colored people may not be let in—as for instance the very intelligent and especially those who have fought gallantly in our ranks.

Among the million words in the Lincoln utterance record, he interprets himself with a more keen precision than someone else offering to explain him. His simple opening of the "house divided" speech in 1858 serves for today:

> If we could first know where we are, and whither we are tending we could better judge what to do, and how to do it.

To his Kentucky friend, Joshua F. Speed, he wrote in 1855:

> Our progress in degeneracy appears to me to be pretty rapid. As a Nation we began by declaring that "all men are created equal, except Negroes." When the know-nothings get control, it will read "all men are created equal except Negroes and foreigners and Catholics." When it comes to this, I shall prefer emigrating to some country where they make no pretense of loving liberty.

Infinitely tender was his word from a White House balcony to a crowd on the White House lawn:

> I have not willingly planted a thorn in any man's bosom.

Or to a military Governor:

> I shall do nothing through malice; what I deal with is too vast for malice.

He wrote for Congress to read on December 1, 1862:

> In times like the present men should utter nothing for which they would not willingly be responsible through time and eternity.

Like an ancient psalmist he warned Congress:

> Fellow citizens, we cannot escape history. We will be remembered in spite of ourselves. No personal significance or insignificance can spare one or another of us. The fiery trial through which we pass will light us down in honor or dishonor to the latest generation.

Wanting Congress to break and forget past traditions his words came keen and flashing:

> The dogmas of the quiet past are inadequate for the stormy present. We must think anew, we must act anew, we must disenthrall ourselves.

They are the sort of words that actuated the mind and will of the men who created and navigated that marvel of the sea, the Nautilus, and her voyage from Pearl Harbor and under the North Pole icecap.

The people of many other countries take Lincoln now for their own. He belongs to them. He stands for decency, honest dealing, plain talk, and funny stories. "Look where he came from—don't he know all us strugglers and wasn't he a kind of tough struggler all his life right up to the finish?" Something like that you can hear in any nearby neighborhood and across the seas. Millions there are who take him as a personal treasure. He had something they would like to see spread everywhere over the world. Democracy? We cannot say exactly what it is, but he had it. In his blood and bones he carried it. In the breath of his speeches and writings it is there. Popular government? Republican institutions? Government where the people have the say-so, one way or another telling their elected leaders what they want? He had the idea. It is there in the lights and shadows of his personality, a mystery that can be lived but never fully spoken in words.

Our good friend, the poet and playwright Mark Van Doren, tells us:

> To me, Lincoln seems, in some ways, the most interesting man who ever lived. He was gentle but this gentleness was combined with a terrific toughness, an iron strength.

And how did Lincoln say he would like to be remembered? Something of it is in this present occasion, the atmosphere of this room. His beloved friend, Representative Owen Lovejoy, of Illinois, had died in May of 1864, and friends wrote to Lincoln and he replied that the pressure of duties kept him from joining them in efforts for a marble monument to Lovejoy, the last sentence of Lincoln's letter, saying:

> Let him have the marble monument along with the well-assured and more enduring one in the hearts of those who love liberty, unselfishly, for all men.

Today we may say, perhaps, that the well-assured and most enduring memorial to Lincoln is invisibly there, today, tomorrow, and for a long time yet to come. It is there in the hearts of lovers of liberty, men and women—this country has always had them in crises—men and women who understand that wherever there is freedom there have been those who fought, toiled, and sacrificed for it.

I thank you. [Applause, the Members rising.]

BENEDICTION

The SPEAKER. The benediction will be pronounced by Dr. Frederick Brown Harris, Chaplain of the U.S. Senate.

Dr. HARRIS. Our Father God, from this national sacrament of gratitude and memory, with the winged words of a prophet of our day lodged in our hearts, with the light of Thy countenance lifted upon us,

Send us forth into this testing, trying time with the faith and patience of Thy servant, Abraham Lincoln—like him—

To be true to all truth the world denies,
Not tongue-tied by its gilded lies;
Not always right in all men's eyes,
But faithful to the light within.

Amen.

BIRTHDAY OF A GREAT PATRIOT, LEADER, AND REVOLUTIONARY WAR HERO: THADDEUS KOSCIUSZKO

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and also that any Member who may desire to do so may have 3 legislative days in which to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the life and character of Thaddeus Kosciuszko.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, today, February 12, is the birthday of a great Polish-American patriot. Tadeusz Kosciuszko was one of those unique European statesmen whose thinking was far beyond his contemporary lifetime.

Above all, Kosciuszko was a democrat in the tradition of Jefferson and Lafayette. He implicitly believed in man's desire and ability to grow, develop, and become strong under the democratic form of government. Throughout his long life—February 12, 1746, to April 2, 1817—Kosciuszko devoted his entire energy and talent to furthering this belief in practical form.

Aside from Kosciuszko's leadership in Poland as well as in all of central Europe in the cause of national and individual freedom, this great man played one of the most significant roles of any individual in America's fight for independence. He came to the United States in 1776 as a young man and distinguished himself as a brilliant military strategist, especially in New York and at the battle of Yorktown. As recognition of his services, General Washington promoted Kosciuszko to the rank of colonel of artillery and made him his adjutant. In 1783, after American independence was firmly established, Kusciuszko was rewarded for his services to the cause of U.S. independence with the thanks of Congress, the privilege of American citizenship, a considerable annual pension with landed estates, and the rank of brigadier general. A year later he returned to his native Poland for many years he led the struggling Polish people in their unending battle for independence. In 1796 he came to the United States for a second visit and lived in Philadelphia until May 1798. Gaining new insights into the democratic process, he returned to Europe and made one last, but fruitless attempt to restore the sovereignty of his homeland at the Congress of Vienna. At length he retired to his estates. His last act before his death on April 2, 1817, was typical of a lifetime devoted to the freedom of the individual and belief in the dignity of man. He freed all the serfs in his care, insisting only on the maintenance of schools on the liberated estates.

Today, with a world so torn with fear and ideological conflict it is well that we in the United States pause to pay tribute to a great military leader, a great statesman, and a great American. His energy, his insight and his unfailing belief in man as a rational political being provide a contemporary lesson for us all. Poland still fights in the name of Kosciuszko. America remembers.

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, February 12 marks the 213th anniversary of the birth of Thaddeus Kosciuszko, who contributed greatly to the battle for freedom both in his native Poland and in America.

Born in Poland in 1746 and educated in the military schools of Poland and France, Kosciuszko came to our shores during the dark days of the Revolution and unselfishly devoted his great ability to the establishment of freedom and independence in America.

To the cause of the struggling colonies Kosciuszko brought three things: Scientific knowledge, strength of character, and unwavering enthusiasm for the cause of liberty. His contribution to the struggle for American independence was rivaled only by his fight for the freedom of his native Poland.

Today all the people of America join with Americans of Polish descent in paying tribute to this great Polish patriot. His name will live always in the hearts of all people who believe in justice, freedom, and self-government.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, we have gathered here today in the Halls of the Congress to observe the 150th birthday anniversary of the 16th President and one of the greatest sons of our country, Abraham Lincoln. On this day, also, we commemorate the birthday of a famous adopted son of our country, and a hero of the Revolutionary War, Gen. Tadeusz Kosciuszko.

In their backgrounds, Lincoln and Kosciuszko were far apart. Lincoln was born in a log cabin in Kentucky, received little formal education, and advanced from his humble origin to the highest office in our land.

Kosciuszko, in contrast, was born in Poland, of a well-to-do family, and received excellent education. He was a graduate of the Military Academy in Warsaw and the Military School of Artillery in Paris. Unlike Lincoln, he was principally a soldier.

But in spite of their divergent backgrounds, Lincoln and Kosciuszko were alike in their love of liberty and justice, and in their belief in the dignity and basic equality of men.

It is these convictions which they shared, and for which they lived and died, that have earned them our love, gratitude, and honor.

The lives of these two men, and their achievements, are well known to all of us. I shall not endeavor to repeat them. I would, however, like to bring out one point which seems very significant, and very pertinent to the problems which our Nation, and the rest of the free world, face today.

Both Lincoln and Kosciuszko were involved directly in tremendous struggles to assure the freedom, and the unity, of our Nation. And they both clearly realized, and so indicated in their speeches and writings, that those wars were not fought solely for the sake of the then-living generations. Those wars were fought so that generations to come could enjoy liberty, justice, and progress in a free, democratic, and united nation.

We, too, are involved in a great and terrible conflict: the conflict between the free world and communism. The outcome of this conflict may well determine the survival of our western civilization, and the survival of the priceless heritage which came to us through the efforts and sacrifices of men like Lincoln and Kosciuszko.

We must realize and remember, therefore, as they did so clearly, that what is at stake in this conflict is not only our own future, but also the future of our children and of our children's children for many generations to come. Our actions today will determine the framework of the society in which they will live for decades and even centuries to come.

With God's help, and a firm stand and willingness to sacrifice on our part, we may preserve our heritage and pass it on to our children, so that they too will be able to enjoy liberty and justice.

This is our responsibility. God give us strength that, inspired by the example of Lincoln and Kosciuszko, our Nation today and in the days to come may live up to that responsibility.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, February 12 marks a very special day for all of us who cherish freedom in our hearts. I am proud to join in commemorating the birthday anniversary of Tadeusz Kosciuszko, who fought for freedom on two continents.

Kosciuszko was born in Poland on February 12, 1746. Benefiting from an education in Poland and in France, the 30-year-old captain of artillery joined with the American patriots of 1776 in support of the great moral and political principles set forth in the Declaration of Independence.

A skilled military leader and a tireless fighter for human liberty, he served with distinction at Saratoga, Yorktown, and Charleston. Through his talents he became a brigadier general in the Continental Army.

When it seemed that there was hope for the cause of freedom in his native Poland he returned to join the struggle. Although the small but inspired Polish army fought gallantly against the Russian hordes, defeat was inevitable. After an imprisonment of 2 years in Russia, he returned to America in 1797 for a brief visit. He formed a close friendship with Thomas Jefferson who wrote of him:

> I see Kosciuszko often. He is the purest son of liberty among you all that I have ever known.

The next year he returned to Europe to champion once more the cause of Polish independence. He died in exile in Switzerland in 1817.

To Kosciuszko, the gallant fighter for the cause of human freedom, we offer this tribute to perpetuate his memory and our gratitude.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, today, February 12, we commemorate in this country not only the anniversary of one of our great national leaders, the great emancipator, Abraham Lincoln, but also we commemorate the anniversary of a great American Revolutionary War hero and patriot, who came from his native land to help us with the liberty for which we are today so grateful, Thaddeus Kosciuszko.

It is indeed significant that the fight for freedom and democracy which brought about the independence of this country caught fire across the seas and rallied to American standards outstanding men from other countries who shared our sentiments. One of the greatest of these was Kosciuszko, an outstanding military engineer, whose efforts contributed toward the military fortifications at West Point in 1778, and who played a prominent part in the decisive Saratoga and Carolina campaigns of the American Revolution. In recognition of his great service to American independence, Kosciuszko was made a brigadier general in the American Army by Congress on October 13, 1783.

After he returned to Poland, Kosciuszko, with the same spirit of freedom, became one of the great champions of Polish independence, leading his countrymen in uprisings against their Russian and Prussian oppressors.

But the brave Polish fight for independence faced heavy odds from totalitarian aggressors, and General Kosciuszko was driven out of his homeland and died in exile in Switzerland in 1817.

On this anniversary of his birth let us pause today, Mr. Speaker, to pay honor to the memory of a great and gallant Polish officer who left home, friends, and fortunes to serve the cause of freedom in this country. May his memory remind us that the cause of freedom is indivisible, and that when the freedom of any country is menaced the freedom of all men is menaced.

Just as Kosciuszko left home to fight for American freedom, may we in days to come dedicate our energies and resources to the end of restoring freedom from Communist oppressors to the Polish homeland which he loved so well and served so faithfully.

Mr. KOWALSKI. Mr. Speaker, February is the month of heroes. To Americans the greatness of Washington and Lincoln is called to mind. To Lithuanians there are joyful recollections of independence, heroically won, only to be bitterly lost in the tragic recent past, but still celebrated in this month of honor. And to Polish people all over the world there is no date in memory more notable than February 12, the birthday of the great Polish statesman, military engineer extraordinary, democrat and patriot of two continents: Thaddeus Kosciuszko.

Never was there a man more inclined to dream of the impossible, yet at the same time so capable of fulfilling his dreams. Born into the mid-Eighteenth Century world, at a time when Poland was plagued by foreign armies, Kosciuszko grew up burning with the desire to drive the foreigners, once and for all, from Polish soil. Was this a practical dream? Was it practical to expect the people of a nation with no natural boundaries and little in the way of political unity to expel and hold at bay the arms of Europe's mightiest nations? Perhaps not, but Kosciuszko nonetheless conceived this dream and clung to it as long as he lived.

Kosciuszko's role in the American Revolution is legend. No sooner had he entered upon the mliitary scene than his talents at fortification construction earned him wide renown. The defenses erected at Ticonderoga early in the war were his work, and his removal from that post and a revision of the defenses there brought forth an anguished cry from a superior officer, who prophesied disaster unless Kosciuszko returned. The protest was prophetic for, in Kosciuszko's absence, Ticonderoga fell to British assault.

Not wanting to commit the same blunder a second time, the American Army authorities now turned over their main defensive operations to Kosciuszko. At Saratoga he laid out defenses that enabled the Americans to overwhelm the British attack. This victory, in turn, won for America her alliance with France and her recognition as an independent nation by Louis XVI.

Now fully cognizant of the abilities of this engineering genius, the Army appointed Kosciuszko to oversee the defense of the Hudson River, with headquarters at West Point, the so-called Gibraltar of the Hudson. Kosciuszko's work at West Point was the longest and most important of his undertakings in the United States and is inseparably connected in the American mind with his name. Little is now left of his fortifications, but the monument raised in his honor by the American youth, with the inscription: "To the hero of two worlds," remains a grateful tribute to his memory.

That the military students of the United States can look back to West Point as their alma mater is in great measure Kosciuszko's doing. When it was first resolved to found a training school in arms for the young men of the States, Kosciuszko urged that it should be placed at West Point, and suggested the spot where it now stands.

When he sailed from American shores in 1786, Kosciuszko left behind an enviable record. Living up to his constant dream of democratic achievement in the face of heavy odds, he had assisted in the liberation of a colonial people from the yoke of the most powerful military nation in the world. His remuneration had been slight, but that was no matter—a dream had been fulfilled.

Kosciuszko now returned to Poland in the hopes of serving the Polish people as he had served the Americans, and on the occasion of the reorganization of the Polish Army in 1789 he was appointed major general. The stage was now set for the closing drama of his career and his final contribution to the world's awkward struggle for perfection.

The democratic tidal wave generated by the American Revolution was now rushing upon Europe and compelling members of every class and creed to line up, either on the side of the revolutionary doctrine of the rights of man, or in defense of ancient European laissez-faire traditions. When this tidal wave struck Poland in May of 1791, Kosciuszko immediately announced himself as a democrat, calling upon the people to establish constitutional government. He was with the forces that carried the day.

A constitutional and hereditary government was established; burghers were granted equal civic rights with the nobility, and the condition of the peasants was ameliorated. At long last it appeared that political unity had come to Poland; that finally there existed the basis for the growth and success of a Polish state supported by the people. But such a development would deal a death blow to the designs of conquest of those who had fed so long on Polish weakness, including the neighboring state of Russia.

In consequence of this, Russia invaded Poland in May of 1792 and Kosciuszko, for the second time in his career, found himself engaged in the forefront of the world's battle for democracy. But on this occasion the odds were impossible. Notwithstanding Kosciuszko's brilliant generalship, the Polish Army was overwhelmed after two months of some of the most gallant fighting in military history.

When Poland was partitioned following the war, Kosciuszko withdrew from the army and retired to Leipzig. But the next year he was back again, leading an insurrectionary army against the Russians with astonishing success until, once again overcome by the heavy odds, he was defeated for the final time.

What had Kosciuszko's military performance achieved for Poland? The cynical might observe that nothing was accomplished. But life is not so simple as to be governed solely by skirmishes won and lost on a battlefield. Kosciuszko's brilliant, courageous, and idealistic attempt to drive the foreign invader from Polish soil, in the name of democracy, created a tradition, which persists to this day; a tradition that will never be eradicated.

In his zeal for democratic government, Kosciuszko was following in the footsteps of the United States. But that was not always the order of things. In April 1817, 6 months before he died, he issued a letter of emancipation to the serfs on his estate in Poland. It was to be almost half a century before the United States was able to emulate this departing gesture of one of Europe's truly great democrats, Thaddeus Kosciuszko, the "hero of two worlds."

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, at a time in our history when the emphasis on military and defense requirements is so constant as to be commonplace, it is especially fitting that we pay more than ordinary homage to a great soldier who rendered extraordinary military service to this country at a time when men of his kind were few and far between, and very much in demand.

I speak of course of Gen. Tadeusz Kosciuszko, the great Polish-American hero of the Revolutionary War. Both his exceptional service as a military commander in the Saratoga and Carolina campaigns of the Revolutionary War and his engineering feats as the man who built the fortifications at West Point mark him for greatness.

Today, it is imperative that we recall the great example set by General Kosciuszko for yet another reason. After the Revolution this popular hero returned to his native Poland to champion his own people's fight for independence. This is a fight that is not yet over, a fight that could well benefit from the likes of another Tadeusz Kosciuszko.

Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of gratitude and admiration that I join in this salute to General Kosciuszko on the anniversary of his birth 213 years ago.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, the success of the American Revolution was assured by the unrelenting efforts and untold sacrifices made by the people here struggling for their independence. Other peoples, not native to this country, but equally great fighters for the cause of liberty, also contributed significantly to the successful culmination of that historic and glorious event. Tadeusz Kosciuszko of Poland, that intrepid, gallant and gifted soldier of freedom, was one of those whose personal participation in the American Revolution marks him as one of the great heroes of his day.

This great man was born into an impoverished family on February 12, 1746. At the age of 13 he lost his father, but his yearning for education led him to the Royal School at Warsaw in 1765. He was graduated with the rank of captain in 1769, and was awarded a scholarship to France where he studied at the famous military school at Mezieres, specializing in artillery and engineering. In 1776 he was in Paris when he heard of the American Revolution. That stirred his imagination; he saw his chance for action in a good cause, and with borrowed money he sailed for America. He arrived in Philadelphia in August and immediately applied for military service. He was admitted, and charged with the drawing up of plans for fortifying the Delaware River. The immediate success of this work earned him a commission as colonel of engineers in the Continental Army.

In the spring of the following year he joined the Northern Army at Ticonderoga. Later the fortifications he erected at Saratoga contributed greatly to the brilliant victory of our forces there. During the next 2 years he was placed in charge of the building of fortifications at West Point. Subsequently he took part in the Battle of Charleston, and was among the first of the Continentals to enter that city after its evacuation by the British. On October 13, 1783, in recognition of his outstanding services, Congress made him a brigadier general.

Having served this country and its noble cause successfully and brilliantly, in July of 1784 he returned to Poland, hoping to carry on the fight for the freedom of his countrymen there. For more than 20 years he continued his brave but unfortunately futile efforts for Poland's freedom and was fated to die in exile in Switzerland on October 15, 1817.

Today, on the anniversary of his birth, we solemnly honor his memory. We do this not only because he fought for our independence, but also because he was a gallant and unwavering champion of the universal cause of human freedom.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, there is no aspect of human events so mighty in its consequences as militant revolution. Throughout history reformers and pseudoreformers have repeatedly raised the revolutionary banner, inciting insurrection against national governments in the name of liberty. The results have been many and varied, sometimes mighty in their beneficence, sometimes mighty only in their destructiveness, and sometimes productive not of liberty but only of a mightier tyranny than any that existed before.

The people of all nations have strong feelings about revolutionary leaders. To those who profess a love for liberty, yet actually seek only personal gain, the people accord nothing but scorn. Yet to those who actually fight for liberty, the people willingly pay eternal devotion. It is the distinction of the Polish people to honor as one of their revolutionary heroes a man regarded by the freedom-loving citizens of all nations as the outstanding democratic revolutionist of his age and one of the outstanding of all ages: Thaddeus Kosciuszko, universally acclaimed as the hero of two worlds.

Kosciuszko's breadth of vision and ability gave his career a fictional quality. Of noble birth he rose above the narrow outlook of the 18th century Polish nobility to espouse democratic reform. With no prospect of personal gain he crossed an ocean to aid a foreign people in overthrowing British tyranny. Hailed in the New World for his part in the American Revolution he forsook all honors to carry the spirit of revolutionary democracy back to Poland. Defying his own class, the Polish nobility, he campaigned politically in behalf of constitutional government in Poland and when Polish nobles and Russian and Prussian troops sought to thwart the popular will, he took up arms against them. Although achieving fame in the American Revolution as an engineering genius he now appeared in the role of military tactician, leading a minute Polish Army against the Russian horde in some of the most brilliant defensive military campaigns in history.

Triumphant as a democratic revolutionist in foreign parts, Kosciuszko was defeated in his efforts in Poland's behalf. But only physically and in the short-term sense. Actually, the classic heroism of his actions captured the imagination of the Polish people and of the world at large, and established him as a national symbol—a symbol which stands today, not only representative of Poland's past, but of Poland's future. The democratic dreams generated by Kosciuszko's actions and beliefs have taken permanent hold of the Polish spirit and no temporary tyranny, no foreign ideology is strong enough to snuff them out.

As we in America have seen, democracy is a hardy institution. It can withstand the rigors of devastation and deprivation, and ultimately come back from apparent defeat to overwhelm its enemies. This was the philosophy, the living philosophy, preached by Thaddeus Kosciuszko, and Polish patriots throughout the world have learned it well.

The man we honor on this occasion undoubtedly deserves our tribute for his political and military accomplishments, for in these respects he has few equals. But it is to Kosciuszko the philosopher, the father of democratic Polish thought, to whom we owe our greatest debt, for the fate of Poland's future is still, to this day, in the hands of his spiritual heirs.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, to Polish people all over the world there is no date more worthy of note than February 12, the birthday of the great Polish statesman, military engineer extraordinary, democrat, and patriot of two continents, Thaddeus Kosciuszko.

Revolution in behalf of any cause is a perilous undertaking. Not only does it inflict suffering on the government it assaults, but on the revolutionary party as well, not to mention the thousands of persons not directly involved in the struggle. For this reason history looks with a critical eye upon all revolutionary leaders and observes closely their merits and shortcomings.

Professedly democratic revolutions are no exception to the rule. Far too often self-styled democrats have instigated revolution, overthrown tyranny and then, in a burst of postwar confusion or villainy, established a government as tyrannical as that which it replaced. The world owes nothing to such misguided zeal but contempt, reserving its respect only for the truly democratic result, an all-too-rare occurrence in revolutionary history.

In this country, following our War for Independence, we had the good fortune to come under the guidance of George Washington, a revolutionist of genuinely democratic spirit, and our progress as a Nation is to a large extent the result of that happy occurrence. But Washington was not the only great statesman to emerge from this struggle, nor his democratic outlook peculiar to him alone. Numerous leaders in the American Revolutionary Army were to become exponents of the democratic dream and one of the most remarkable of these was the man we honored on February 12, Thaddeus Kosciuszko.

No one in history more deserves the title of democrat than Kosciuszko, whose sympathy for the oppressed carried him across the seas to fight for principle on a foreign shore. His participation in the Revolution was vital. A master in the art of fortification construction, he is credited with laying the groundwork for some of the Americans' most outstanding military achievements. And once the war was over and America was free, the people of his adopted land poured honors on Kosciuszko and bid him remain, as a distinguished and respected citizen.

But the ideal of democracy is a moving force, and it would not let Kosciuszko rest. In a few years he was back in his native Poland, campaigning as an apostle of constitutional government. Long subjected to the presence of foreign troops on their soil, the Polish people grasped at the teachings of democracy, and in 1791 rose up to form a constitutional monarchy, in the hope of at last attaining political unity and repelling foreign domination. When the neighboring states of Russia and Prussia combined with certain Polish nobles to quell this democratic demonstration Kosciuszko met them on the battlefield and though initially defeated he returned in 1794 at the head of an insurrectionary army to revive the democratic cause.

For a moment, and for a moment only, Kosciuszko sat at the head of the counsels of a free Poland. Temporarily triumphant, the Polish democrats foresaw a glorious future, such as that already spreading before the Americans, and in honor of Kosciuszko's leadership in battle they chose him as President. In this capacity Kosciuszko's attitude was the same as that of the American leader, George Washington. Despite his noble background and militaristic career, he gave to free Poland its first taste of genuine democracy, initiating democratic reforms that were immediately incorporated into the Polish tradition.

Although eventually overcome by the military might of their powerful neighbors, the followers of Kosciuszko realized that they had taken up a cause that could not be suppressed by armies alone or by any other force, and from that time to the present the democratic flame has burned brightly in the Polish heart. The result is directly attributable to Kosciuszko, whose love of democracy kindled that flame. Democratic people the world over have good reason to do him honor. His abilities, his deeds, his courage, and his foresight are unsurpassable. Indeed, among the many heroes of democracy, Thaddeus Kosciuszko ranks second to none.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to inquire of the majority leader what the program will be for next week.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the Rules Committee is meeting on Monday. One of the bills that it will consider is a rule on a bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means relating to the taxation of insurance companies. If a rule is reported out, it is my intention to bring that up on Wednesday.

At this time I know of no other legislation or no other matter that I can program for next week, but I do not by any remark of mine want to be placed in the position where I am foreclosed from assigning any legislation that we can bring up. As usual, and as is my custom, I would give the House, if there is any further program, as much advance notice as possible. Of course, that statement does not include matters going through by unanimous consent where they are very carefully screened by the leadership on both sides of the aisle, including the chairman and the ranking member of the committee, and which require immediate action.

The only bill I know of now that I can announce is the bill relating to the taxation of insurance companies. That will definitely be put down for Wednesday if a rule is reported.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. IKARD). The gentleman will state it.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

The Businessman in Public Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ERNEST GRUENING
OF ALASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, February 12, 1959

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, the address I am about to ask to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD was made yesterday by a man who is peculiarly qualified to make it. It is on the subject "The Businessman in Public Affairs," and was made to the Weirton, W.Va., Chamber of Commerce. The speaker was the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH]. He began his activities as a working newspaperman. Then he became, successively, a newspaper editor, a magazine editor, a college professor, and a business executive.

JENNINGS RANDOLPH served with distinction for seven terms in the House of Representatives. In the course of that service, I was privileged to have him, with other members of a House committee, visit us in Alaska, where his interest in its problems was reflected in subsequent legislation.

After his seven terms in the House, JENNINGS RANDOLPH became a business executive again in an industry which is greatly affected with the public interest, namely, the aviation industry. He is now, I am happy to say, our colleague in the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that his thoughtful and timely address, "The Businessman in Public Affairs," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE BUSINESSMAN IN PUBLIC AFFAIRS

Mr. Toastmaster, members of the Weirton Chamber of Commerce, and guests, it is a pleasure to be with you and to discuss the role of the businessman in public affairs. This is a question which has long been of interest and personal concern to me—since I have considered myself a businessman as well as one professionally interested in public affairs—and I note that it is a subject which is becoming of increasing regard to your own organization.

During the campaign last fall an incident occurred which I think highlights one aspect of our discussion tonight. As I was walking along the street in my home community of Elkins, talking with the voters and discussing the issues, I was stopped by a citizen who drew me into a doorway to discuss the campaign. After finishing our conversation I asked him why he had drawn me off the street and into the privacy of a doorway. Whereupon he replied: "You know I am in business and I must be very careful of what I do and say."

Though this man may have dramatized his fears somewhat, ladies and gentlemen, he does not represent an isolated state of mind. For, the rule of prudence—the precautionary attitude against speaking one's mind on controversial issues—has taken seed among too many of us. It is a measure of the failure of the democratic process—a failure in the belief in the great dialogue of democracy—when anyone, businessman, professional man, or teacher, fears to participate in the political process.

Therefore, I am much heartened by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce program of the Aircade and local political workshops to encourage the political activity and participation of businessmen.

However, I would offer a word of caution. For there is some indication that this action is stimulated by the concern within the thinking of some members of the chamber for what is seen as the growing power and political effectiveness of organized labor.

I hope that this view will not dominate the political actions of businessmen. I hope that they will see their role in larger terms—and not merely in opposition to labor. For any action which is cast in terms of protagonist and antagonist limits the freedom of the actors—by limiting the scope of their imagination and perception.

I would digress a moment to illustrate this principle in reference to our own national attitudes toward the Soviet Union. Russia has at one and the same time become our national demon and the gage by which we measure our own progress. We are too frequently confronted with such questions as "Are American schools as advanced as those of Russia?" "Do we offer enough support for basic research in science and technology compared with that of Russia?" "Are race relations in the United States strengthening the position of Russia in world opinion?"

Thus, in recent years, we have too frequently approached our problems not in terms of finding the best possible solutions, but in terms of the cold war with Russia. And to that extent we have fallen increasingly under the dominance of the Kremlin. For the solution to any problem is determined, in large measure, by the questions which one addresses to the problem.

I devoutly hope, therefore, that the political actions of businessmen will not be thus restricted—that they will ask questions not in terms of whether a particular policy will circumscribe the power of labor, but rather whether it is in the best national interests as well as their own legitimate self interests.

This is only instance, however, of the need to avoid the general tendency of interpreting public problems in terms of opposite solutions. Our political discourse, and hence the solution to political questions, is too often restricted by the use of polar or opposite terms—liberal and conservative, radical and reactionary, labor and management, farmer and consumer, socialist and capitalist, et cetera. The list could be extended. And we are all familiar with the old platitude, "There are two sides to every question."

Such a polarizing of public problems, however, falsifies the realities of political life. For there are, in fact, as many sides to every question as there are parties or interests involved. And the great genius of the democratic process is that it offers a wider variety of solutions than can be encompassed by mere opposites.

Politics in a democracy is the art of the possible—the art of compromise and conciliation. Webster defines "compromise" as "a settlement by arbitration or by consent reached by mutual concessions." This definition offers us a clue as to how the businessman can make one of his chief contributions in the arena of public affairs. For the life of business and commerce is in large measure a life of offering mutual concessions, of arriving at a compromise of interests whereby each party gains some satisfaction.

It was popular at one time in some quarters to state that America needed a sound business Government. Without commenting on the recent record of some businessmen in Government, I suggest that this statement offers an oversimplification of both business and Government. For it assumes that business can be defined solely in terms of dollars and cents and cost accounting. And that the justification of governmental policies should be decided in the same terms. I have called this an oversimplification, first, because it fails to acknowledge the complexity of government in a modern democratic society; and second, because it fails to perceive the cultural significance of business and commerce.

The modern businessman must be more than a mere cost accountant. Wise decisions in business require not only a knowledge of how to conduct a commercial transaction, but knowledge of personal relations, of community relations, and of the whole process of communication. From this point of view, therefore, the businessman, the modern businessman, is peculiarly well gifted to contribute to public affairs.

In this connection, it is appropriate to mention that one of the distinguished guests with us tonight, President Thomas E. Millsop, of National Steel Corp., is not only a man of management, but one who has associated himself with public affairs and has made real contributions to the advancement of community, State, and national interests.

The National Management Association, an organization of 73,000 members in 340 affiliated clubs representing 1,200 companies in 34 States, honored Mr. Millsop by awarding to him its 1958 Management Man of the Year distinction. I am sure that this award was not bestowed upon Tom Millsop simply because of his technical proficiency in the management field; rather, it was recognition, too, of his broad understanding of and contributions to public affairs in relationship to the free-enterprise system.

I say in passing, however, that we should not limit the term "public affairs" to the application of government alone. Public affairs, and the role of the businessman therein, imply the whole range of public life and all of our cultural institutions as well as those of the States. This means that the businessman should interest himself not only in politics in the more limited sense, but also in the advancement of our schools, our hospitals, and our institutions of the fine arts, as well as those matters which more immediately affect his own interests, such as tax revisions, fair-trade practices, and the reciprocal trade agreements.

Participation in such affairs can be justified in more than just humanitarian terms as well. It can be justified in terms acceptable to the most hardheaded businessman. For example, we are all well aware of the need to attract a more diversified industry to West Virginia. While we are fortunate in having such basic industries as coal and steel and chemicals, we also need light industries which involve a lower capitalization per man in order to revive our sagging economy and offer jobs to workers who have been displaced by technological developments. And it has been the experience of other States which have sought to attract new industry that modern enlightened management is becoming increasingly concerned with the general cultural conditions in the area in which they seek to locate. While such factors as the tax climate, transportation facilities, and natural resources are perhaps the dominant factors in attracting industry, present day management is aware that its industrial and personnel relations are strongly affected by the surrounding conditions in schools, hospitals, recreational facilities, et cetera. Thus, from a long range point of view, it is equally to the interest of the businessman to engage himself in the development of the general cultural facilities of his area.

This suggests another respect in which the business community can make a genuine contribution to public affairs. Ours is a civilization dominated in large measure by a business ethos—by the values and attitudes of the business world. This condition affords the businessman considerable influence in the molding of public opinion—in the conditioning of cultural attitudes. I would like to see him use this influence on public opinion in raising the cultural status of the expert—the person of achieved excellence.

The American businessman has the reputation of being tough-minded. He is from Missouri. He is hospitable to facts and to the person who is expert in dealing with them. I should like to see him use his influence and his arts of communication to extend this hospitality to the expert throughout the range of public affairs; I should like to see such efforts emerge in a revitalization of the American regard for the expert, for the person who has achieved excellence in whatever field—in the arts, in business, in science, in scholarship, in government administration, as well as in the individual conduct of life in our daily affairs.

We are today, and we have been for some years, faced with what might be called a growing lack of accountability. In an evermore complex society in which individual responsibility becomes lost in the mesh of social relationships, it is too easy to avoid responsibility—too simple to avoid being held accountable for the quality of one's performance. This is what I mean by the lack of accountability.

Thus we have given rise to the glorification of mediocrity and the neglect of excellence. To dispel such a popular attitude and reawaken a public regard for quality performance may well be one of the greatest contributions the businessman could make to public affairs.

Now after this somewhat philosophical foray, let me turn, in closing, to more concrete matters, to matters which I am confident have occupied a considerable amount of your interest.

I refer to two items of legislation which will soon be presented to the 86th Congress. First, Senate bill 505, introduced by Senator KENNEDY with myself as one of the cosponsors. This is the labor-management reform bill—a revised version of the Kennedy-Ives proposal which passed the Senate in the last session by a vote of 88 to 1. During my campaign I stated that I would support such legislation as that offered by Senators KENNEDY and Ives. As a member of the Subcommittee on Labor of the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee, I have offered myself as cosponsor of the present measure.

I am well aware of the criticism that has been leveled from some quarters. Without taking these criticisms up in detail, and without impugning the motives of any who have criticized the bill, I would like to state briefly its purpose and its provisions. But first I would like to quote from a letter which Senator KENNEDY recently received from former Senator Ives.

Senator Ives wrote, "This bill represents many months of careful study in committee, the collective judgment of the U.S. Senate as expressed in 5 days and nights of debating and voting, and many, many years of collective experience of labor-management legislation.

"Furthermore, it is designed to meet the objectives set forth in the report of the Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field. It is my firm conviction that this bill not only meets those objectives but does so in a fashion that makes it corrective rather than punitive legislation, a measure which will correct abuses without undermining the rights of working men and women."

First, as Senator KENNEDY has said, it is "a bipartisan measure on a nonpartisan subject." Second, it is stronger and clearer in its terms than was the original Kennedy-Ives bill. It has been revised to make it quite clear that the section on employer reporting does not interfere with normal personnel relations or communications, and that the section on bribes cannot possibly be interpreted to include wage or other normal payments.

And third, it is, as Senator KENNEDY stated, "primarily a labor-management reform bill, dealing with the problems of dishonest racketeering—it is not a bill on industrial relations, dealing with the problems of collective bargaining and economic power." The broad issues of labor-management relations are not involved in this legislation and were not so intended. For these are quite properly divorced from the issues of corruption and racketeering in labor.

I would, therefore, urge each of you to consult the bill yourself and in your own judgment determine if this is not for the best interests for labor and management alike, as well as in the larger national interests.

A question of equal importance to all of you is that of forthcoming legislation on small business. I am pleased that I am also a member of the Senate Committee on Small Business, and will be actively engaged in legislation in this field.

In preface to my remarks on this topic let me state that I am not one to whom big business per se is an evil; there is nothing inherent in the size of any economic structure, nor for that matter in any political or social structure, which makes it either good or evil. It is the uses to which such organizations are placed and the degree of responsibility exercised by those in management which determine their ultimate benefit to society. In recognizing this we must acknowledge also that bigness has become a permanent and fundamental characteristic of American economic and political institutions—big government, big labor, and big business are here to stay. The problems of capitalizing modern industry and exploring the new frontiers of technology require large units of production. But with this, we must develop and maintain the means and techniques to prevent the individual man and woman from being lost in the shuffle and to insure the continued vitality of small business.

The 85th Congress moved significantly in this direction in establishing the Small Business Administration as a permanent agency, in passing the Small Business Investment Act, and in broadening the lending authority of the Small Business Administration. But much remains to be done.

There are approximately 5 million small businessmen in the United States, roughly the same number as there are farm families. These two groups comprise much of the reservoir of talent and initiative that have brought our Nation to its present greatness. We must see that this reservoir is not drained off by neglect, by inequitable tax laws, and by administrative regulations.

Let me emphasize once again the potential power the businessman has for exerting his influence far beyond the range of the activities of buying and selling and of producing and distributing goods. For the men of commerce and industry are the ones who control the material resources of our society; morally speaking, these resources are held not in fee simple but in stewardship—a stewardship which carries with it the responsibility to see that these material resources are used to assure the widest possible benefit, both materially and spiritually, for a free society. It is within your power if you but will it.

These are times of extreme tension—sometimes of deep doubts about our tomorrows.

I close on this positive approach:

There is no room for gloom in the long-term future. Fact and faith must combine in the promise of a further unprecedented era of expansion, creation of new industry, and a more sustained prosperity.

The American people are resourceful. They will realistically meet the challenge of changing world and domestic conditions.

We must see to it that business continues its dynamic development and that our cooperative capitalism, which embraces both employee and employer, be cushioned by reasonable Government regulation and reputable practices within the framework of our private enterprise system.

Ours is a growth country. It is a fallacy to short-sell its future.

Deseret News Discusses Neuberger Bill on Alcohol and Tobacco Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, February 12, 1959

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, one of the outstanding newspapers in America is the Deseret News, of Salt Lake City. In its weekly supplements for January 17, 1959, and January 24, 1959, the Deseret News has published two comprehensive interviews with me about my legislative proposal to have Federal matching funds used to encourage courses in our public schools in educating children with respect to the impact on their health of both tobacco and alcohol.

These interviews were written by Mr. George L. Scott, veteran newspaperman, who is correspondent in the Pacific Northwest for the Deseret News.

I ask unanimous consent that these interviews from the Deseret News, of Salt Lake City, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the interviews were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Salt Lake City Deseret News, Jan. 17, 1959]

OREGON U.S. SENATOR OPPOSES TOBACCO, LIQUOR ADVERTISING

PORTLAND, OREG.—"Glamour advertising of cigarettes and liquor over TV and radio, in magazines and newspapers is aimed at the young—older people are already hooked."

So declared U.S. Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, of Oregon, as he prepared to reopen his senatorial effort to educate the youth of the Nation on their gamble with health if they use either product.

The Senator said he would reintroduce the bill he placed before the Senate on May 21, 1958. This bill, which did not reach the Senate floor before adjournment, provided Federal grants-in-aid for educational programs to teach schoolchildren about the dangers to health from cigarettes and liquor. He said there would be no substantial change in the measure.

Senator NEUBERGER emphasized that he was not advocating a prohibition in the use of either tobacco or liquor.

"My purpose is to give the States of this Nation a chance to advise their young people on important matters concerning their health," he said.

"Most of the advertising on tobacco and liquor is beamed at young people.

"They are entitled to know what the facts are. After that, if they want to smoke, it's up to them. Their own reasoning rather than the pressure of glamorized advertising should prompt them," he declared.

LAUDS HEALTH EDUCATION

Senator NEUBERGER, who does not smoke nor drink, said his determination to push for health education was intensified following his return from Washington after the last session of Congress.

He underwent surgery for a malignant growth and is still under treatment.

"My own experience," the Senator said, "has intensified my interest in anything dealing with health."

He pointed to the Nation's $6.8 billion expenditure for research, most of it dealing with nuclear science, while only $211 million, or 4 percent, was spent on medical research of all diseases.

"Cobalt radiation, now used in the treatment of cancer, is a result of research," Senator NEUBERGER said. "If my trouble had developed a few years ago my chances would have been much less.

"Look at the children in the past who died of polio, diphtheria and other diseases before medical research made recovery almost certain."

CHILDREN SHOULD BE INFORMED

"I feel every child is entitled to the right to be informed of dangers ahead. The best place to do this is in school—backed by research and not advertising glamour," he said.

"In contrast to the questionable advertising which prompts young people to take up smoking at an early age, when they frequently are told to associate this habit with the success of some great baseball star or motion-picture queen, is the warning by the Surgeon General of the United States, Dr. Leroy E. Burney, who said:

"'Many independent studies thus have confirmed beyond reasonable doubt that there is a high degree of statistical association between lung cancer and prolonged cigarette smoking * * * while there are naturally differences of opinion in interpreting the data on lung cancer and cigarette smoking, the Public Health Service feels the weight of the evidence is increasingly pointing in one direction—that excessive smoking is one of the causative factors in lung cancer'," the Senator quoted.

[From the Salt Lake City Deseret News, Jan. 24, 1959]

PUBLIC INDIFFERENCE DELAYS HEALTH BILL

PORTLAND, OREG.—Public indifference, advertising power and sectional economy will be major hurdles to clear before the public can be educated on the health hazards surrounding the use of liquor and tobacco.

Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, Democrat, of Oregon, encountered all of these obstacles after he first introduced his bill for Federal aid to States desiring to give their schoolchildren the facts of research concerning the use of cigarettes and alcohol.

He is hopeful there will be an upsurge of support from Senators and the public when he reintroduces his bill sometime in March.

"Any bill that has strong support from public bodies in the States will be brought out of committee for congressional action," the Senator said.

REACTION TO MEASURE

In dividing first reaction to his measure, Senator NEUBERGER listed the following:

Public: Indifferent, little immediate support in general.

Educators: Some support but far under expectations.

Churches: Good reaction from religious groups, particularly the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, Seventh-day Adventists, and Methodists.

Advertising agencies: Hostile reaction from advertising magazines and publications. Much of their revenues come from tobacco and liquor.

"Only a few Senators gave promise of support," Senator NEUBERGER said.

"Southern Senators are swayed away from support by the importance of the tobacco crop to the South although they favored education on liquor.

"I realize that it takes time to build up a program but with the aid of such organizations as the American Cancer Society, other health groups, educators, and churches it can be done.

"If the public gives its support you have a chance to pass legislation.

"If indifferent, little chance because of the great amount of legislation facing Congress."

CHURCH MEMBERS LEND SUPPORT

Senator NEUBERGER said he received many letters from Mormon Church officials and members in Utah, Idaho, and California backing his program.

"The power of liquor and tobacco advertisers is the main hurdle facing the grant-in-aid education program," Senator NEUBERGER said.

"We leave the field entirely to the liquor and tobacco people who have unlimited capital to support their products."

The Senator insisted that education is the great hope for everything. He pointed out that the grant-in-aid plan he backs for giving the facts on cigarettes and alcohol respects State's rights. No State, he said, is required to give such education unless it so desires.

"I don't believe in prohibition," he declared, "but I do believe in giving relative facts. If advertisers misdirect the Nation's youth, the Government should at least give the fair facts.

U.S. AGENCIES INCONSISTENT

"If ever there was a situation where the left hand knoweth not what the right hand doeth, it is in the policy of the U.S. Government with respect to tobacco and cigarettes. While one agency of Government warns that cigarettes may be a factor in causing cancer, the most terrible disease afflicting the human race, another governmental agency subsidizes and encourages the growth of the product from which cigarettes are made."

Senator NEUBERGER inquired:

"What would be the reaction here in America if we learned that the government of Red China was subsidizing the production of poppies, from which opium is distilled? Would we not raise our voices in righteous scorn and indignation? Then what must the rest of the world think of the fact that in the United States eggs and meat and vegetables are not supported as basic farm crops, but tobacco is?"

The Senator conceded that "a bill is simply a piece of printed paper that can be indefinitely postponed."

"Other things," he said, "cannot be postponed so readily—cancer of the lung, for instance. The doctors and scientists will continue their studies. They will report, and some men in journalism and politics will disseminate the reports. People will smoke cigarettes, and human tissue and protoplasm will react accordingly. Such events as President Eisenhower's account of how he himself overcame the smoking habit are sure to have a mighty effect. Americans will learn the facts about cigarettes and various diseases, and then they will wonder why their Government considers tobacco a basic crop but not the Thanksgiving turkey or baby's milk or the morning baked apple or glass of orange juice.

"When enough Americans wonder about this, my bill will pass," Senator NEUBERGER concluded.

The Federal Budget

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GLENN CUNNINGHAM
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 12, 1959

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, this is an appropriate day to recall a statement by Abraham Lincoln which represents one of the guiding principles in his private life and a basic tenet of his approach to government

In 1843, Mr. Lincoln said:

As an individual who undertakes to live by borrowing soon finds his original means devoured by interest, and next, no one left to borrow from, so it must be with a government.

Certainly no one can dispute the effect of continued borrowing on the finances of an individual. No one can hope to live forever by borrowing, for he will in truth be eaten up by interest.

It is likewise true that governments cannot continue to live by borrowing. We are in our third decade of the era of deficit spending. Since 1930 there have been only 6 years in which the Federal Government has lived within its income. Yet in the recent years this country has recorded unparalleled growth and prosperity, and in such times of record-breaking income, both individuals and governments must seize the opportunity to retire debts.

We are faced this year with a precariously balanced budget. It is doubtful that the budget will remain balanced in view of the action by Congress on the first few spending bills which have been brought before the two Houses. Many responsible persons in and out of Congress feel that unless there is bold action to balance the budget this year and in the immediate future, there will never again be a balanced budget.

I share the view that we are reaching a financial crisis, that if we are to remain a nation with strong economic policies and a sound dollar—or perhaps I should say a sound 50-cent dollar in view of past inflationary spirals—we must act boldly and strongly.

Accordingly, I am introducing a resolution on this anniversary of Lincoln's birth which would set the wheels in motion for a constitutional amendment to require a balanced budget except in war or other grave emergency.

I do not feel a sense-of-Congress resolution or any other act of Congress can do the job, for it is agreed that an act of one Congress does not necessarily bind succeeding Congresses. We must put this resolve—if the people express their desire for it—in such a way that it cannot be circumvented in future years.

My mail shows a growing concern by persons throughout the country about inflation and deficit spending. I know other Members who also report the same trend. People realize you cannot live forever on borrowed money and they know that Uncle Sam cannot either.

I urge my colleagues to let the people decide through their State legislatures whether they want to continue deficit spending and inflation or whether we will live within our income. Let the people decide and then we will do their bidding.

Extension of the Draft

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STEVEN V. CARTER
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 12, 1959

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I have cast my vote against H.R. 2260, the resolution which proposes to extend the present draft law for a period of 4 years and which was overwhelmingly passed by the House of Representatives. Only 20 Members of the House voted against the bill, although you and I know that there were many more who did not, deep in their hearts, favor the extension of a national conscription. This fact in itself may be indicative of the inordinate amount of influence that the past 20 years of military presence has imposed on our thinking. True, this military presence has been a most necessary one, but one nevertheless that should be continuously reevaluated in the light of these rapidly changing times.

I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, that there is no longer a need for military forces. I think that we all recognize such a need is self-evident. The question is, what kind of military forces do we need? We are constantly told that the Armed Forces need highly professional, highly trained, highly skilled, highly technical, and highly motivated personnel in this age in which we live. Are those the words that describe the draftee? I think we all realize that they are not. Furthermore, I think we all realize that the average draftee never receives the incentives that will convert him into the type of person fitted by these descriptive words. The so-called incentive pay bill of the last Congress was badly misnamed. The only incentive that can be read into this bill is based on the assumption that everyone who enters the Armed Forces is convinced he will become an admiral or a general. We know that such an assumption would be entirely erroneous. Since the flag positions, which were really the only ones to substantially benefit from the incentive pay bill, are usually available only to graduates of the service academies who, presumably, are already provided with necessary incentives, there actually remains little or nothing for the conscriptee or volunteer to entice him to become a career military man.

Mr. Speaker, the draft has been with us for almost 20 years now, far too long. We all know it is not being fairly and impartially administered and is far from universal in its effect. Only one of the three armed services is actually using it to any extent. So the true purpose of the draft is to act as a club to force young men to enter the Armed Forces. Those who volunteer for the Navy and the Air Force are only indicating their desire, not to faithfully serve those particular arms, but rather to avoid the rigors of Army life. Those who wait for the draft are simply saying, in effect, that they want to take the quickest way out. In either instance, the psychological approach of these young men to military service is the exact opposite of what it should be, and what I think it can be. Without the draft, the armed services would be forced to make a military career the attractive thing that it must become in order to get the type of individual they proclaim to be so necessary in this technical era. They would have to look elsewhere for the cooks, sweepers, chauffeurs, and assorted coolie labor for which today's conscripts are being used.

Mr. Speaker, I have been in youth work for a number of years, and I also have two teenage sons. I think we can all recall from our own lives and experiences, as well as those we have observed, the fact that there is a naturally occurring amount of uncertainty and indecision during the years approaching adulthood. Our draft law is simply aggravating this uncertainty and is, in fact, a substantial contributing factor to our national problem of juvenile delinquency. Our destiny and survival may very well rest in the heads and hands of the youth which are today subject to the draft. If the pitched battle for survival comes, it must surely come, it seems, within the next 30 years, or even sooner. From every quarter, voices cry out that we need scientists, educators, philosophers, artists, and political leaders to revivify the essences and guts of Americanism, and to meet the challenge of communism all over the world. But what do we do to the very number from which these people are to come? We cast over them the dark cloud of frustration and uncertainty in the form of the draft. We discourage, delay, and, in some cases, deny the steps that will lead them to lives of leadership and service in their chosen field and on a high level. Our youth cannot help but wonder why we have huge armies that train and retrain, while Asian, Middle Eastern, and South American nations continue to fall under the influence, if not the domination, of communism. These youth have a vague feeling of uneasiness, to which they are probably unable to give expression in most cases, that perhaps we have here an enemy who must be fought in other ways. They are told that we are engaged in an ideological conflict for men's minds. Yet many of our youth who are sufficiently endowed to prepare themselves for this conflict are conscripted for a period of years, in which they perform menial tasks, and they either lose the impetus or the opportunity to sufficiently prepare themselves for the defense of democracy. A further perplexing factor to our youth is the fact that our Nation's leaders, whom they feel certainly must be wise men, fail to furnish them the opportunities and inspiration, even the example, as to how this enemy should be fought. Could it be that the vistas of our leadership are too limited and too interwoven with the traditional ideas of what constitutes national power to see that we are immolating much of the potential of our youth on the altar of national conscription.

Let us liberate our youth, during that period of unique vitality, to follow whatever constructive paths they may choose. Let one of these choices be a career in an attractive Military Establishment where only the dedicated and proficient volunteer can exist.

It is my sincere hope that we can eliminate these shackles and hindrances which are so repugnant to the basic American concept of individual freedom and initiative, which has always been the keystone of our greatness.

Recognition Is Given to Worldwide Travel Show at Bluefield, W. Va.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, February 12, 1959

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, next Tuesday, February 17, the Bluefield, W. Va., Automobile Club will open its Worldwide Travel Show in the Bluefield Municipal Auditorium.

Mine has been a lively interest in the beneficial effects of travel, and I was privileged to issue a statement in connection with the forthcoming Bluefield Automobile Club travel show venture.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD my statement to the sponsoring club.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I extend my congratulations to the Bluefield Automobile Club and its director of travel, James H. Cowan, for initiating the first Worldwide Travel Show in West Virginia. I am confident of the success of this venture. The Bluefield Automobile Club deserves the gratitude of the citizens of the Mountaineer State for taking this step to attract the attention of American travelers to the charms and beauties of our fair State.

The tourist industry offers one of the chief sources of potential economic development in the State of West Virginia, and the automobile clubs are to be commended for the part they are playing in stimulating its development.

But it is worth noting that the Bluefield Automobile Club Show is not limited by merely State or sectional interests. This exhibition is an appropriate expression of the growing interest of Americans in world travel itself, and it offers another link between us and our neighbors in other lands.

We Americans are a mobile people, and the urge to be somewhere else will hold a continued fascination for innumerable millions of folk during this next record travel year.

The once-popular song words, "I was born to wander, I was born to roam," continue to be lived by vacationers and tourists who are lured "to the far-away places with the strange-sounding names."

We Americans who live and work at such a rapid pace can find in travel refreshment for the body and renewal of the lagging spirit. We may be mindful as well of the inspirational and spiritual values that flow from travel and the act of occasionally drawing away from our daily preoccupations. For it was the Master of all mankind, who, when the pressures from expectant people tapped too deeply His earthly resources, whispered to His disciples: "Come apart, and rest a while."

Travel, however, fulfills more than the needs of the individual alone. For the American traveler has become his country's main diplomat abroad. And as a nation we are in large measure judged by our neighbors in other lands on the basis of the behavior of the American tourist. Thus, the modern conveniences of travel—the jet airliner and the luxury ocean liner—will not alone bring about a world community of neighbors. There must be global-mined people traveling, men and women disposed to appreciate and understand the customs, cultures, and the philosophies of the countries they visit.

The late Irish poet, George Russell, predicted in the 1920's that the United States would have an historic role to play, because "Americans have been the first people to adopt a planetary viewpoint." Though Russell's statement was contested by those who worried about America's apparent drift to extreme isolation, he insisted that he could detect signs that we were preparing to assume planetary responsibilities. He said, "You Americans have a vision about this planet that no other nation has ever had."

We need to understand that our 177 million citizens, comprising only 10 percent of the non-Soviet world, control over half of the world's production of goods. Therefore, our policies and our actions affect not only our own national destiny, but that of the world at large. We are challenged to thinking in world terms. We have now reached the point where we must assume the same kind of responsibility in world affairs as we are accustomed to assume in our individual affairs. If we falter, the free world falters. If we are firm, the free world is firm.

The 20th Anniversary of Marian Anderson's Concert on the Steps of the Lincoln Memorial

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN BRADEMAS
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 12, 1959

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, today Members of Congress have joined in tribute to the man whom many Americans regard as the greatest figure in the history of our country, Abraham Lincoln.

We have heard a distinguished American, Carl Sandburg, speak on the 150th anniversary of the birth of a man who has been described by Walt Whitman as "the grandest figure on the crowded canvas of the drama of the 19th century."

Mr. Sandburg declared just a few days ago that Abraham Lincoln took the word "liberty" as precious, saying in 1858:

Our reliance is in the love of liberty which God has planted in our bosoms. Our defense is in the preservation of the spirit which prizes liberty as the heritage of all men, in all lands, everywhere.

Not only, Mr. Speaker, is 1959 the 150th anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln. It is also just 20 years ago that Lincoln's memory was honored in a concert on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial, a concert given by one of the grandest figures on the crowded canvas of the drama of our century, Miss Marian Anderson.

It seemed to me most fitting that Miss Anderson, one of the world's greatest musicians and one of America's finest citizens, should be invited to sing at the joint session of Congress today when we commemorate the birth of Abraham Lincoln. For this reason, last month I wrote a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Arrangements on the Joint Session urging that Miss Anderson be invited. I am pleased to say that I understand the committee did extend to this great lady an invitation and that only the pressures of the late hour prevented her being with us today.

I wish to insert in the RECORD at this point my letter to the chairman of the committee:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., January 29, 1959.

The Honorable FRED SCHWENGEL,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SCHWENGEL: I am writing to you in your capacity as Chairman of the Committee on Arrangements on the Joint Session of Congress for the commemoration of the 150th anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln.

It is my understanding that your committee has invited former Presidents Herbert

Hoover and Harry S Truman to take part in the ceremonies of February 12, 1959, and that your committee has also arranged for participation in the ceremonies of the distinguished American poet, Mr. Carl Sandburg, and the distinguished American actor, Mr. Fredric March.

I wish to congratulate you and your colleagues on your plans for honoring the memory of this towering figure in our country's history.

I should like to suggest, however, that you invite another distinguished American to take part in the activities of February 12—Miss Marian Anderson, one of the world's greatest musicians and one of America's finest citizens.

I was among those who on May 26, 1957, watched Marian Anderson receive the honorary degree of doctor of laws from the president of St. Mary's College, Notre Dame, Indiana. The degree citation read in part:

Arturo Toscanini said of Marian Anderson that a voice like hers happens once in a hundred years. The distinguished composer Sibelius protested that the roof of his house was too low for her voice * * * Chiefs of state representing their people have celebrated her public triumphs. At the invitation of our own Government, Marian Anderson has sung to honor the visit of royalty, the return of a hero from a war and the inauguration of a President."

Miss Anderson has indeed served our country nobly and in many capacities, most recently as an alternate delegate to the General Assembly of the United Nations. She won much friendship for the United States by her 1956 and 1957 concert tours in Europe and the Far and Near East.

Her accomplishments are many and could be multiplied and, as the President of St. Mary's College said in 1957, "All these achievements Miss Anderson has accomplished in a spirit of profound Christian faith."

It was just 20 years ago, in 1939, that Marian Anderson gave her now legendary Easter concert before 75,000 persons in Washington, D.C. She sang from the steps of the Lincoln Memorial.

I believe it would be most fitting for your committee to invite Miss Anderson once again to sing in the shadow of Lincoln's memory as the Members of both Houses of the Congress of the United States join to pay tribute to the man who is the symbol of America's dedication to freedom.

I hope, sir, that you and your colleagues on the committee will invite Miss Anderson to take part in the ceremonies of February 12, 1959, before the joint session of Congress.

With highest regard and best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

JOHN BRADEMAS,
Member of Congress.

Housing for the Elderly

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANTE B. FASCELL
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 12, 1959

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced today a housing bill which should be of substantial assistance in relieving the shortage of housing for elderly persons and in increasing rental housing and related special health facilities for elderly families. My bill is directed toward the accomplishment of two objectives:

First. Assistance in obtaining more liberal FHA financing for the construction of rental and sales housing, especially designed in whole or in part for our senior citizens; and Second. Provision of adequate health and medical facilities as an integral part of such elderly family housing projects.

This bill makes a substantial amendment to the existing FHA program for section 213 cooperative housing, and in addition, provides for an entirely new FHA insured-loan program for elderly family rental housing and for nursing homes. The program for improving the financing of elderly family rental housing is set forth in a new section proposed for inclusion under title II of the National Housing Act, as amended.

This new section, 229, would increase the dollar limits on insured loans for elderly family rental units and provide for insurance of a loan up to the full replacement cost of a project as estimated by FHA. A significant change from existing law is that this bill provides for FHA insurance of loans for both profit corporations and nonprofit organizations. Present law is limited to nonprofit operations.

In my bill, the maximum interest rate would be 4½ percent and a priority of occupancy is assured for elderly persons or families—60 years of age or over. At least 50 percent of the units in such a project would have to be especially designed for occupancy by elderly persons.

By special definition, the mortgage on an elderly family rental project would be able to cover structures and facilities designed for assisting the elderly occupants in the care of their health. These special facilities would be such structures as infirmaries, inpatient or outpatient health facilities, therapeutic facilities or such other facilities as the Commissioner of FHA might approve and deem adequate to serve the elderly occupants of the project.

In addition, my bill amends the existing law on cooperative housing to provide that an FHA section 213 cooperative housing mortgage, for either sale or rental housing, can cover the cost of special facilities which are of the type I have just described. In this way, a cooperative housing project which, in many areas of the country, is an ideal vehicle for the supply of low-cost, liberally financed housing suitable for our senior citizens, will be even more able to serve their needs. Existing law already permits cooperative rental projects to cover needed commercial and community facilities. It makes sense, therefore, to add this further provision and thus make possible in its most beneficial way, the availability of cooperative housing for our elderly families.

In one further way, this bill should prove of real assistance for elderly family housing projects. I have included provisions in this bill which have already received the approval of the other body, covering a new program for the insurance of a loan for the construction of a nursing home especially directed toward the care of elderly persons. In my bill, I have included in addition, however, a provision directing the FHA to encourage the construction of such nursing homes at or near the site of elderly family housing projects. In particular, I am anxious for the facilities made available by these FHA programs to result in coordinated and integrated projects of most benefit and economical use for our elderly families. Wherever possible, I feel, that projects of housing designed for our senior citizens should be set up so as to become a fully equipped community for their better enjoyment of life.

I would hope in the future that a program can be devised, using private financing and private construction but with the insurance provided under the FHA programs, so that our large, single family housing projects under the basic section 203 of FHA, can be developed as planned communities including the facilities and services, with FHA financing aid, if needed, that seem best suited to the majority of the occupants for which the project is built.

Let me note that the amendments to existing law which are contained in this bill and the provisions of a proposed new program for FHA rental housing, are no burden upon current budget proposals in any manner whatsoever. At the most, in the long distance future, there is, of course, a contingent liability as now exists on all FHA insured loans. Experience has demonstrated conclusively, however, that the security of the construction, coupled with the debenture system of FHA, are more than adequate, together with its very substantial financial reserves, to protect the Government's interest, without drain, in any way, upon taxpayers.

Civil Rights Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM M. McCULLOCH
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 12, 1959

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill to implement the seven recommendations made by the President in his civil rights message of February 5, 1959.

This proposed Civil Rights Act of 1959 constitutes a moderate, practical, sound, and, I believe, generally acceptable step forward.

First. Title I would make it a criminal offense to interfere with the exercise of rights or the performance of duties under orders of U.S. courts in school desegregation cases.

Second. Title II of the bill would make it a Federal offense to cross State lines to avoid prosecution or confinement for destroying or attempting to destroy by fire or explosive any structure used for educational or religious purposes. This legislation will clarify the authority of the Federal Bureau of Investigation to assist local enforcement authorities to track down the perpetrators of such offenses.

Third. The President has said that the right to vote is the keystone of democratic self-government. Title III of my bill will require election officers to retain and preserve for 3 years all records and papers which come into their possession relating to elections involving candidates for Federal office. The measure will also authorize the Attorney General to demand their production for examination and copying with recourse to the courts in the event of noncompliance.

Fourth. In establishing the Commission on Civil Rights, the 85th Congress provided that the Commission shall terminate its existence not later than 2 years and 60 days after the date of the enactment of the Civil Rights Act. This would mean that in the absence of an extension the Civil Rights Commission would, at the latest, cease to exist early in November of this year. The President has recommended, and title IV of this bill will accomplish, a 2-year extension in order that the Commission may adequately perform the job for which it was created. The bill also provides for the President and the Congress to be advised in an interim report to be submitted not later than September 1, 1959, as to Commission activities as of that date.

Fifth. Title V will give legislature stature and independent existence to a Commission on Equal Job Opportunity Under Government Contracts. The 15 member Presidential Commission would be authorized to continue and to expand the work which has been done in recent years to promote equal job opportunity in the performance of Government contracts without regard to race, creed, color, or national origin.

Sixth. Title VI of the bill would appropriately amend Public Laws 815 and 874 of the 81st Congress, which authorize Federal payments to school districts which provide free public education to children whose parents reside or work on Federal property not subject to State or local taxation to include children of members of the Armed Forces whether they reside on Federal property or not. This title will also authorize the acquisition of certain school buildings as rental property, to be used for providing for children of military personnel education necessitated by the closing of the public schools.

Seventh. The final substantive title, title VII, will authorize the Federal Government to provide technical assistance to States which prior to the Supreme Court decision of May 17, 1954—Brown against Board of Education—maintained segregated schools and which seek to comply with the decision of the Supreme Court. It would accomplish this purpose by making Federal grants available to the States. Also, at the request of the States or local agencies, the Commissioner of Education would be authorized to provide technical assistance and information in the development of desegregation programs and upon request of such officials will initiate or participate in conferences dealing with the educational aspects of problems arising from desegregation of public schools.

As indicated at the outset of this statement, I am convinced that this bill is a sensible, middle course which the Congress should look upon with favor. I sincerely hope it will receive consideration at an early date.

SENATE

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1959

Rev. John C. Petrauskas, headmaster, Marianapolis Preparatory School, Thompson, Conn., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, as we humbly commend ourselves to Thy omnipresence, we invoke Thy infinite blessings on this august assembly, whose deliberations and decisions reverberate to the farthermost ends of the world which Thou hast created.

Imbue our lawmakers, O Lord, with a delicate sense of justice, a burning love of the moral good, an unrelenting opposition to iniquity, and an unswerving trust in Thy inscrutable ways.

As Thou regardest this troubled world, with its emphasis on superlatives, take heed, O Lord, of the plight of small nations. We beseech Thee to look with favor upon Lithuania and her neighboring Baltic States as they mark in mourning a once proudly proclaimed freedom and independence. Banish tyranny and bondage from the face of the earth, and grant that Lithuania and all other captive nations may once again know the blessings of freedom and security, so that they may continue to glorify Thee.

With filial devotion and confidence, we have recourse to Thee, who hast been called our tainted nature's solitary boast, and whose motherly concern embraces the suffering and the oppressed. Instill in mankind a deeper sense of human brotherhood under Thy common motherhood and present to God, the Father of all, our prayerful petition that international justice and peace with honor may endure among nations forever. Amen.

DESIGNATION OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., February 16, 1959.

To the Senate:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. THOMAS J. DODD, a Senator from the State of Connecticut, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence.

CARL HAYDEN,
President pro tempore.

Mr. DODD thereupon took the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, February 12, 1959, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED

The Secretary of the Senate reported that on February 12, 1959, he presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 961) fixing the representation of the majority and minority membership of the Joint Economic Committee.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, under the rule, there will be the usual morning hour for the introduction of bills and the transaction of other routine business. I ask unanimous consent that statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

JOHN FOSTER DULLES

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the news of the weekend from Walter Reed Hospital weighs heavily upon all of us as we meet here in the Senate today.

A valued American lies ill. Our hearts and the hearts of free men everywhere go out to John Foster Dulles as he begins his fight for health. If tenacity, dedication, and resoluteness of purpose are allies of medicine, then the prognosis is certainly encouraging, for Mr. Dulles has never been lacking in these qualities. In the most difficult and demanding of public duties, he has been tenacious and tireless in pursuit of what he has held to be right. His example of exhausting and unhesitating devotion to duty is one which we both admire and envy.

Over the period of his service as Secretary of State, Mr. Dulles and I have both agreed and disagreed. Yet it has never been difficult to work with him for the best interests of the Nation. I have never had occasion to say anything personal about him in any circumstance, for I have held him in very high regard, and I still do.

Mr. President, as a measure of our feelings for the Secretary of State, John Foster Dulles, I now submit, and send to the desk, a resolution which expresses the sympathy of the Senate for the Secretary of State at this time of his illness, and expresses our prayers and our confidence for his early recovery. I ask unanimous consent that after the resolution is read, it be considered and adopted, and that then the Senate stand for a moment of silent prayer for the return of our friend and countryman to the duties of his office.

I now submit the resolution.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 79) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate stand in silent prayer to the Almighty for the early and complete recovery of the Secretary of State, the beloved John Foster Dulles.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was, by unanimous consent, considered and agreed to.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will stand in silent prayer.

(The entire Senate and the occupants of the galleries stood for a moment of silent prayer.)

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, every energy and virtue of an individual are meant to be used. Not the least of these is a Christian conscience. Everywhere, men will admit that John Foster Dulles has used them to high purpose.

Though there may be disagreement with some of his views and policies, none will deny his vision, his zeal for good works, and his sense of mission in advancing mankind's search for peace and a better world.

What a delicate, arduous, and momentous task he has had: to plan, explore, measure, counsel, and direct our efforts and those of other nations toward peace, friendship, good will, and continued well-being. He has given a contagious quality to the unremitting effort to find ways and means for effectively meeting the challenges of our day. Truly, his dedication to liberty and dignity, as ends in themselves, to peace, to amity, to the well-being of other peoples, as well as ourselves, has generated hope and courage everywhere. Well might we pray for the restoration of his health and vigor, that this work can go forward.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, all of us are saddened that John Foster Dulles has again been retired to a hospital. We learn with distress that since last December he has been fulfilling his exacting duties although his health was so undermined that President Eisenhower and the Secretary's doctors believed that he ought to take a complete rest until he felt fit once more. This he refused to do.

A little while ago, in the fullness of his years, Mr. Dulles underwent grave surgery for cancer, and apparently recovered. He could then have retired with grace and dignity to his chimney corner, to savor the sweetness of rest and the constant companionship of his devoted wife, after a lifetime of strenuous activity, much of it in the service of his country. Instead, he chose to shoulder again the somber responsibilities that attach to his office in our troubled times, and to discharge them at whatever cost to himself, if that cost should be total.

One is especially moved when observing Mr. Dulles in action. His responsibilities are the more awesome and his loneliness the more poignant in that, for whatever reasons, he, more than any of his predecessors within living memory, must play the leading role, both in formulating our foreign policy and in articulating it. And his tasks are not the less exhausting because he has found it congenial to discharge them by repeated journeyings to the world's capitals, for consultations with heads of states and with his counterparts elsewhere.

No man, I suggest, with the burden of his years upon him and with pain his constant companion, would be moved to such heroic exertions unless he felt that the task was great and the day short—not only his own day, but the day of all men everywhere in this century, the most dangerous of the 60 centuries of man's recorded history.

Mr. Dulles and I have not always agreed upon certain aspects of the conduct of our foreign policy; and, as befits the public servant of a democracy, I have not hesitated to express my sometimes sharp disagreement with his point of view. I hope both of us will live to agree, and sometimes perhaps to disagree, in the future, and thereby discover and elucidate the truth for which all civilized men so desperately strive.

No man, I think, can but be moved to admiration by the spectacle of the courage of John Foster Dulles, by his austere sense of duty, by his exceeding gallantry in the shadows of personal doom, and by his unrelenting purpose in seeking peace through peaceful means, for the millions on this earth whose reluctant feet may already be planted upon the road to Calvary.

It is my prayer, then, that the wellsprings of Mr. Dulles' great and abundant vitality will again come to flow, and that he will return to us renewed, restored, and reinvigorated.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the body of the RECORD following my remarks the text of the letter which Secretary of State Dulles wrote to the President requesting a leave of absence to undergo a hernia operation. The letter was published in the Washington Evening Star of February 10. I know that we all share the same confident expectation expressed by Mr. Dulles that he will soon be able to resume fully the duties of his most responsible office. The tone of Secretary Dulles' letter reflects his indomitable spirit and the vigor and fortitude with which he has discharged his duties through the tense times in which we have been living.

I expect that no man could serve as Secretary of State in these times and enlist unanimous and unfailing support for all his actions and policies. However, I am sure we all agree that Secretary Dulles is one of the most courageous and conscientious public servants that our country has ever produced.

From long personal association and friendship with him, I know that Under Secretary of State Christian A. Herter merits the same measure and quality of confidence and admiration as he assumes the full burden of Mr. Dulles' duties.

I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the body of the RECORD at the end of my remarks two short biographical articles about Acting Secretary Herter which appeared in the New York Times and the Washington Evening Star, respectively, on February 10.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the requests of the Senator from Massachusetts?

There being no objection, the letter and articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star, Feb. 10, 1959]

SECRETARY REQUESTS PERMISSION FOR LEAVE

Following is the text of Secretary of State Dulles' letter to President Eisenhower yesterday asking for a leave of absence to undergo a hernia operation:

FEBRUARY 9, 1959.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I should like your permission to turn over to Under Secretary Herter, or in his absence, to Under Secretary Dillon, the duties of Secretary of State for a short period.

My doctors advise that I should have an operation for a recently developed hernia; and I have not wholly thrown off the effects of the inflammation of the colon which occurred last December. I should accordingly like to devote a few weeks to physical recuperation, and also have some time when, free from other responsibilities, I could concentrate on the complicated and grave problems raised by the Soviet threats regarding Berlin and the allied response thereto.

I would be available for consultation with you and my associates and would expect, after a few weeks, to resume fully the duties of the office.

I regret the circumstances which lead me to ask for this respite, but I have full confidence, as I know you have, in my associates in the Department of State.

Faithfully yours,

JOHN FOSTER DULLES.

NO. 2 IN ONE-MAN SHOW: CHRISTIAN ARCHIBALD HERTER

WASHINGTON, February 9.—As Under Secretary of State, Christian Archibald Herter has for the last 2 years had the misfortune of being No. 2 man in a one-man State Department.

As often in these last months, when the operating power was temporarily out of action on the sidelines or in full action on the frontlines, Mr. Herter today was again handed the title of "Acting Secretary." The key word here is acting, for if Mr. Herter did not know it when he arrived at State—and there is evidence that he did not—he soon found that the Secretary of State, John Foster Dulles, had determined that there would never be a Sumner Welles in the Eisenhower administration.

Mr. Welles, Under Secretary during the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt, had a closer relationship with the White House than the Secretary himself, Cordell Hull.

LITTLE CHANCE TO SHINE

Accordingly, even when Mr. Dulles has been temporarily away from the store, his stand-in has had little chance to make the impact of his own personality felt on the great issues of state.

Some of Mr. Herter's associates in the Department have felt at times that Mr. Dulles was keeping him in not-so-splendid isolation and that a considerable talent was being buried under the weight of one of Washington's most powerful personalities.

Mr. Herter arrived in Washington soon after the Eisenhower election sweep of 1956 with impressive credentials and a magnificent press. An earlier tenure here, in the House of Representatives, had established him as an attractive Republican internationalist.

Two successful terms as Governor of Massachusetts confirmed his executive ability and, after the Eisenhower heart attack of 1955, his name was high among those discussed as possible liberal Republican presidential candidates, should the President decline to run in 1956.

The President decided to run and Mr. Herter was promptly involved in a fiasco when Harold E. Stassen, then the administration's disarmament specialist, personally nominated him as the man to replace Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON on the Republican ticket.

Mr. Herter, then leaving the governorship in Massachusetts, suffering from a painful arthritic condition and facing the end of his public career, was induced to torpedo the Stassen assault my making the nominating speech for Mr. NIXON. After the inauguration, he was appointed Under Secretary of State, and there were rumors that he was to be groomed for an early succession to Mr. Dulles.

The future matured without such exciting development. Mr. Dulles, at the desk or away, stayed in charge. Mr. Herter, once the darling of those who had hoped for fresh approaches in United States diplomacy, remained untested and unexposed.

Mr. Herter was born March 2, 1895, in Paris, where his parents were studying art. Young Chris was 10 and spoke fluent French before he returned to the United States. He had his first taste of diplomacy during World War I, serving as Acting Minister to Belgium at the age of 22, when illness in the diplomatic ranks left him the top man on the spot.

After the war he served 3 years as personal assistant and secretary to Herbert Hoover, then Secretary of Commerce. As a Representative after World War II he toured 18 nations on a project that was instrumental in the creation of the Marshall plan. In 1952, he was elected Governor of Massachusetts.

In his personal contacts, Mr. Herter at 63 is a polished and charming gentleman of the old school whose manner has often deceived the unknowledgeable into mistaking him for a Boston Brahmin. With an easy smile and a persuasive graciousness, he gives the casual visitor no sign of the physical hardship imposed by the arthritis.

He is married to the former Caroline Pratt and has three sons and a daughter.

HERTER DRAWN EARLY TO FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Unlike many American politicians, Christian Archibald Herter has been interested in foreign affairs most of his life.

The man who will be Acting Secretary of State while John Foster Dulles is out for a hernia operation had a headstart in developing this interest.

He was born in Paris, France, almost 64 years ago, to struggling young American artists, Albert and Adele Herter.

Although he was brought to the United States while still a boy, his interest in foreign affairs has never wavered.

After graduating from Harvard with honors, Mr. Herter decided he would like to be an architect and enrolled at Columbia University.

But in 1916 he returned to Harvard for his first class reunion. There he talked with a classmate, Lithgow Osborne, who had been in Berlin as an aid to Ambassador Gerard. Mr. Osborne's tales of life in wartime imperial Germany excited Mr. Herter's imagination, and a week later he was on his way to Europe as a member of the United States Foreign Service.

NEARLY SHOT

He was one of the last Americans out of Germany after this country entered the First World War—and he almost didn't make it out at all. He was trying to reach neutral territory, but on reaching Mainz was arrested as a suspected spy. One officer favored shooting him on the spot, but Mr. Herter managed to convince him that he was entitled to safe convoy as a member of the United States Embassy.

Mr. Herter tried to get into the Army, but was turned down. Too tall, he's 6-feet-5, and too lightweight, he's still slender.

But this didn't keep him from taking on several difficult jobs, such as serving as secretary of a commission to negotiate a prisoner of war treaty with Germany and, after the war, secretary of the commission to negotiate the peace treaty.

In 1919 he went to Germany with Herbert Hoover to help direct the American Relief Council there.

LEARNS A LESSON

Later he was to serve with Mr. Hoover in the Commerce Department, and there he learned a valuable lesson. Mr. Hoover, he has said, was an extraordinary and brilliant administrator, but when he got into politics, he could not be flexible in his dealings with humans—as one must be in politics.

Mr. Herter soon had a chance to test his political theories.

In 1930 he was elected to the Massachusetts House, where he spent 12 years, the last 4 as speaker.

By 1942 he was ready for bigger game—Congress.

In the House, Mr. Herter busied himself with foreign affairs, but kept an eye open for likely looking Republicans who might take the White House away from the Democrats. He was one of the earliest to say he thought that man was Dwight D. Eisenhower.

At the same time, he took a political risk of his own.

He was persuaded to run for Governor of Massachusetts against Paul A. Dever. Most observers didn't think he had a chance, but he squeaked through, by 14,000 votes.

RETURNS TO WASHINGTON

Late in 1956 he returned to Washington, as Under Secretary of State.

An Under Secretary has an important job, but usually an unpublicized one.

As politicians go, Mr. Herter seems relatively content to operate outside the main arena.

It's probably appropriate that most voters know him for what he didn't do.

In 1956 there was a boost for (a) Mr. Herter for President, when it was thought Mr. Eisenhower's health would forbid a second term, and later (b) Mr. Herter for Vice President, in place of RICHARD M. NIXON.

This last campaign was carried on—almost exclusively it seemed—by Harold E. Stassen, but it produced most of the excitement at the 1956 Republican Convention.

In the end it got nowhere.

The tall, seemingly shy man got up at San Francisco and made a speech nominating Mr. NIXON.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I compliment the majority leader, and other Senators who have spoken, upon their statements regarding the Secretary of State. I am glad I can be present to add my own personal expression to the record of what has been said in that regard.

My own friendship with Foster Dulles goes back to 1931, when he was legal adviser to the firm with which I was active at that time. During the years I formed the impression that Foster Dulles was one of the most brilliant, able, devoted, and conscientious friends I have ever known.

In 1949, after he was defeated by Senator Lehman when he was a candidate for election to the Senate, I talked with him. I think it was advice he gave me at that time, and the expression of his opinion about public service, and similar matters, which influenced me more than any other thing to attempt to run for the Senate, myself, in 1950. Thus, I feel a special sense of friendship for Foster Dulles which I am happy to express at this time, while he is a patient in Walter Reed Hospital.

I sincerely pray and hope for his immediate and complete recovery, in order that he may continue to give our country the great and devoted service that has characterized his life really ever since World War II.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, we pray today for the early recovery and return to duty of our distinguished Secretary of State, John Foster Dulles. He has dedicated his life, without thought of personal convenience or of his own health, to the cause of the peace of the world. He is a man of strong convictions. Furthermore, he is willing to stand firm on his convictions. A recent editorial in the Topeka Daily Capital concludes with this statement:

Whatever history records about the rightness or wrongness of Secretary Dulles' policies, it must put them down as a man who served his country first and himself last.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks the complete editorial which appeared in the Topeka Daily Capital of February 12, 1959.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DULLES: DEVOTED TO DUTY

The lot of Secretary of State John Foster Dulles has not been a happy one in recent years but that is not something peculiar to Dulles' career. Second-guessing Secretaries of State is a sort of national pastime and the critics in the Nation's capital are numerous. So are those abroad.

But Dulles' service to his country is once again complicated by illness and his current leave of absence, to permit him to undergo a hernia operation, poses the question of whether he should continue in one of the most strenuous jobs in the world.

The word from the White House is that the Dulles' leave of absence is just that. He's expected back on his globe-girdling job, the White House says, in a few weeks.

No one, not even those critics who have disagreed violently with Dulles' policies, can say he has not given great devotion to his job. He has traveled at a gruelling pace and, at 71, has fought back against ill health with a vigor not often found in younger men. In 1956, the cancerous part of his lower intestine was removed. Dulles was soon back at his job. Last December he was hospitalized with an inflamed colon. In January he passed up a trip to Canada because of a virus infection. But Dulles was soon back in the news, active in spite of the ailments that were reflected in his tired and haggard face.

If Americans argued about the progress of the country in foreign affairs, they were certain of one thing—that here was a man who served them devotedly and was following the course he believed best for the country. He stood firm on Quemoy and Matsu in the face of great pressure. He doggedly kept speaking of preserving the interest in the United States and the western allies in Berlin and the threats of Khrushchev and his East German henchmen.

Secretary Dulles' latest illness, however, puts President Eisenhower in the position of a baseball manager. Although Dulles is on leave of absence, he is still the nominal Secretary of State and in there pitching. Due to ill health, Dulles may take himself out of the game in the next few weeks. Or the President may decide to put in a new pitcher in view of the urgent need to meet the situation in Germany and elsewhere as effectively as possible. Dulles is the kind of a man who would graciously step aside if the President asked him to, and the President may have no other choice.

Whatever history records about the rightness or wrongness of Secretary Dulles' policies, it must put him down as a man who served his country first and himself last.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I agree with all that has been said concerning the character of John Foster Dulles. When he was stricken I sent a message to him which has appeared in the RECORD heretofore. He is a great citizen and a great man, one who will go down in history as one of America's greatest Secretaries of State.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I wish to join my colleagues in the remarks they have been made about our ill Secretary of State. I am sure the Senators know my feelings, because I consider John Foster Dulles to be not only a great Secretary of State, but a warm and personal friend. I hope that he has far more than a fighting chance to return to active duty and to once again become the Secretary of State in fact as well as in name.

SALUTE TO THE COURAGE AND HEROISM OF MR. JOHN FOSTER DULLES

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a moving and poignant column by Drew Pearson hailing the personal heroism and courage of our Secretary of State, John Foster Dulles. This column was published in the February 16 issue of the Washington Post and Times Herald under the title of "Dulles Heroism on Duty Lauded."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DULLES HEROISM ON DUTY LAUDED

(By Drew Pearson)

The full story of John Foster Dulles' heroism has not yet been told. Probably it can't be told in full for some time.

This writer, when in Mexico for the inauguration of President Lopez Mateos, reported that the Secretary of State was suffering great pain, had two doctors, standing by one night, but went through the ordeal of shaking hands with several thousand Americans at an Embassy reception, plus the formalities of the Mexican inauguration, without letting anyone know how ill he was.

He even refused to call off his trip to San Francisco to speak before the chamber of commerce, remarking to a friend that, if he was suffering from cancer, 1 or 2 days would make no difference in reaching a hospital.

Back in Washington, Dulles rested a few days, then flew to Paris for the meeting of NATO. The European statesmen who sat opposite him had no idea they were talking to a sick but courageous man. He had to pass up four diplomatic functions and curtail his work, but faithfully attended the chief NATO conferences.

He found his doctors amazed at his stamina and he was sternly warned that he would have to slow down. He did slow down for a while, went to the West Indies, then came back to throw himself into the pressing problems of Mikoyan's visit and Berlin.

MRS. DULLES AGREES

President Eisenhower argued with him, threatened to order him out of the State Department. Finally he decided Dulles would never be happy if he were not at work. Mrs. Dulles agreed. Most women want their husbands to retire after a certain age, but Mrs. Dulles, knowing her husband, knows that he lives only to pilot our pressing foreign affairs toward the goal of peace. If he retired, he would be restless, unhappy.

Shortly before he went to Europe this last time, Dulles' pains started coming back. He refused to be hospitalized. In London he did not tell Prime Minister Macmillan that he was ill and would have to undergo another operation. Nor did he tell General de Gaulle.

The only European in whom he confided was Chancellor Adenauer, 83-year-old leader of West Germany, who has become Dulles' close friend. The two have sometimes differed, sometimes have been irritated with each other, but there is great basic trust between the two, and Dulles confided that when he returned to Washington he would have to undergo another operation. The Chancellor almost broke down and wept. Dulles told the old German not to worry, that the United States would not let Germany down.

When Dulles flew back to Washington he was racked with pain and fatigue. Under Secretary of State Chris Herter was in South Carolina taking warm baths for his arthritis, which at times makes it difficult for him to walk. Dulles urged Herter to finish the treatments. He himself went to the hospital and has continued to direct major State Department policy from his bed.

The Secretary of State is suffering from lesions, an aftermath of his previous operation; a hernia, and now cancer. In addition, he is 71 years old.

WHITE HOUSE ADVISER

His doctors have told him that the odds are very much against his returning to any active day-to-day direction of the State Department. They have told him that the only cure for his complicated physical distress is long rest, not a hectic 12-hour day with the burdens of the world on his shoulders.

But the dogged and dedicated Secretary Dulles is determined to settle the Berlin crisis, after which he will probably be content to retire to the status of White House adviser, leaving the active direction of the State Department to someone else.

President Eisenhower, despite denials, has become reconciled to this. The President will consult with former Gov. Tom Dewey on the latter's return from the inauguration of President Betancourt of Venezuela regarding a successor.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, there must be few men and women in the civilized world today who do not salute the fortitude with which our Secretary of State has carried on, in the teeth of adversity in health which would have overcome a person of lesser determination and grit.

Fortunately, this is in our country's best tradition. We recall the valiant Franklin Delano Roosevelt, who served longer as President than any other American even though he was permanently crippled by infantile paralysis. We know the chronicles of Grover Cleveland's radical surgery for cancer of the jaw and how he served effectively in the White House for over 3 years thereafter.

But, today, the man whom the free world heralds for courage is John Foster Dulles. I have asked unanimous consent that Mr. Drew Pearson's column be printed in the RECORD as a tribute to Mr. Dulles—and perhaps as a warning to the rest of us that we should take from the Secretary's illness a determination to undertake a genuine "crash" program in the field of cancer research.

Mr. President, with respect to my remarks concerning cancer research and the renewed illness of the Secretary of State, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article about medical research and my own illness which I wrote at the request of the editors of United Press International.

The article was published widely throughout the Nation in such newspapers as the Washington Post and Times Herald, the Washington Daily News, the Oregon Daily Journal and many others.

This particular clipping is from the Journal of February 12, 1959, under the title "Grateful NEUBERGER Urges Cancer Funds."

Mr. President, I shall read to the Senate one short sentence from the article, in view of the illness of our Secretary of State:

Does it make sense to invest in cancer research only about 1 percent of what we spend on research into armaments and weapons of war?

There being no objection, the article from the Oregon Journal was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GRATEFUL NEUBERGER URGES CANCER FUNDS

(Last fall, Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, 46-year-old Democratic Senator from Oregon, underwent surgery for removal of a cancerous tumor. In this dispatch, Senator NEUBERGER speaks frankly of his experience and, as he prepares to resume a normal schedule of activity—his physicians' words—offers a message of hope to other cancer sufferers.)

(By U.S. Senator RICHARD NEUBERGER)

It has become almost axiomatic to protest about our modern age. Yet if I did not live in a modern age, I would probably be dead now. Three miracles of modern medical science have given me a prospect for recovery from cancer which my doctors regard as excellent.

These miracles are (1) early detection of the tumor, (2) skillful surgery, and (3) the twin agents of cobalt radiation and chemotherapy, with their destructive impact on any of the tumor which might have spread.

Even before cancer was diagnosed in me, I stood on the floor of the U.S. Senate and advocated vastly increased Federal support of medical research. Yet I used glibly the reference that 40 million Americans were destined to have cancer. I never thought I might be among the 40 million. I always felt that this would be somebody else. I suppose countless citizens feel this way—otherwise we would not tolerate spending more on chewing gum than on cancer research, and many times more on such things as permanent waves and cigarettes.

Along with my colleagues, Senator LISTER HILL, of Alabama, and Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY, of Minnesota, I have been proposing an international medical year and a pooling of medical discoveries made by all nations. This has a particularly urgent meaning for me today. Cobalt radiation, a vital factor in the successful treatment I have undergone, was developed by such illustrious scientists of Canada as Dr. David A. Keyes and Dr. H. F. Batho. I am fortunate that no unwise import quota kept this marvel of their intellects from coming to the United States.

A brush with cancer tends to place many things in true perspective. First, one becomes profoundly grateful to all those who, through the long history of medical research, have contributed to the advances thus far made in treatment of this grim disease. Secondly, old antagonisms fade away. I no longer can transform political disagreements into any feelings of personal malice. When one is grateful to be alive, it is difficult to dislike a fellow human being.

I am keenly aware that some of the most eminent Members of the Senate have died of cancer during recent years—among them Charles L. McNary, of my own State of Oregon; Robert A. Taft, of Ohio; Arthur Vandenberg, of Michigan; Matthew Neely, of West Virginia; and Brien McMahon, of Connecticut. That is why I regard it as so crucially important if I can stand in the Senate and stress to my colleagues that my own life has been spared, because I have had a type of cancer which has responded to a discovery thus far made in the realm of medical research.

Is it not vital that we devote every effort to extending these discoveries, if possible, into other areas of cancer where successful treatment has not yet been achieved? Does it make sense to invest in cancer research only about 1 percent of what we spend on research into armaments and weapons of war? Two out of every three American families are in peril of affliction from cancer.

From the very beginning, I told my doctors to include candidly in their medical bulletins the fact that my illness has been diagnosed as cancer. I realize that has not been done in the case of some public figures. Yet we need to have full understanding of this disease if it is to be conquered.

Medical scientists inform me that some people, knowing they may have cancer, still hesitate to seek treatment because they fear it is inevitably hopeless. Thus, if a person in public life does recover from cancer, it is an event which can give hope and courage to many millions of others.

The American Cancer Society reports that, already, about 30 or 35 percent of cancer victims are being saved. As new findings are attained in the field of chemotherapy, this percentage undoubtedly will be increased—especially if people seek immediate medical care.

While much remains to be known about cancer, I think it is essential that Americans have faith in the competence of their doctors. Some believe that capable care can be received only at a few nationally known medical centers. I chose to remain for treatment in my native city of Portland, Oreg., because I believe that knowledge and competence in this field are not confined to one or two famous places. I think I have been confirmed in this decision by the fact that, in my travels around our State this last fall and winter, I have met quite a few men and women who have recovered from cancer under the able auspices of their own local physicians.

The National Cancer Institute, which is part of our U.S. Public Health Service, makes grants throughout the Nation to all promising avenues in the area of cancer research. Your own life or that of a loved one might potentially be saved if you urge your Senator to vote full and adequate appropriations for this vital Government agency, which provides about 72 percent of the funds for research into the causes and possible cures of the series of diseases known as cancer.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, later in the week I expect to introduce some proposed legislation in this field. I trust that the Senate will give it additional interest because of our concern over the recent illness of Secretary Dulles.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS DURING SENATE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Labor Subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare be permitted to sit during the session of the Senate today.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I thought permission was to be requested for the subcommittee to sit for the rest of this week. I understand the majority leader is now requesting permission for just today, but there will be executive sessions for the rest of the week. I would certainly not object to amending the unanimous-consent request so that it would include all week.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I would prefer to do it on a daily basis. That is the way the request has been made.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I make the same request with regard to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, that it be permitted to sit during the session of the Senate today.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I wish to say, in cooperation with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] that I, as chairman of the Railroad Retirement Subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, have agreed that the meetings of my subcommittee will be held in the afternoons, so that the Senator from Massachusetts can have his meetings in the mornings. I assure the Senator from Illinois I know this meets with the pleasure of members on both sides of my subcommittee.

Therefore, I should like to ask unanimous consent that the Railroad Retirement Subcommittee, which has to complete its hearings this week, may hold its meetings in the afternoon while the full committee holds its meetings in the morning.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I would have no objection, but I prefer to have the consent on a daily basis, and I shall be glad to have that request made for today.

Mr. MORSE. We are not meeting today.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I shall propose that request for the Senator tomorrow.

Mr. President, have the requests for the committee meetings been acted on?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the requests of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and the requests are granted.

"SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 1

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress and the President of the United States to safeguard and preserve established State and individual rights to the use of water within the separate States

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Utah, the Governor concurring therein—

"Whereas recent decisions from the Federal courts and recent rulings from the U.S. Department of Justice have deprived States, and persons, of rights which said States and persons previously enjoyed, to regulate and control the use of the water in those respective States; and

"Whereas, said decisions and rulings are further a part of a general pattern developing gradually into Federal supremacy and usurpation over water, which, if continued, will destroy individual and States rights over water, and substitute in lieu thereof an all powerful centralized Government control thereover: Be it therefore

"Resolved by the 33d Legislature of the State of Utah, the Governor concurring therein, That the Congress and President of the United States and the Representatives of Utah in the Congress of the United States be, and they are hereby urged and requested to take all necessary action to (1) preserve the water rights of the individual and the States and to prevent Federal usurpation of those rights; (2) to see that legislation is initiated and supported to reestablish to the individuals and to the States, the rights taken from them by the Federal courts and the Justice Department; and (3) in every way possible reaffirm, renew, and defend the concepts that water rights are property rights and that these established rights, to the use of water, by a State or an individual, should not be taken away without due process of law and adequate compensation; be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies of the above be promptly transmitted to the President and Vice President of the United States, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress, Chairman of the U.S. Senate and House Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs, U.S. Senator WALLACE F. I ask unanimous consent that this resolution be made a part of these remarks and that the resolution be referred to the proper committee.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION OF VEGETABLE GROWERS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW JERSEY, INC.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Vegetable Growers' Association of New Jersey, Inc., concerning land reclamation.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LAND RECLAMATION—RESOLUTION ADOPTED DECEMBER 17, 1958, VEGETABLE GROWERS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW JERSEY, INC.

Whereas since World War II it has been increasingly evident that there has been overproduction of vegetables; and

Whereas this has created quite a hardship for farmers in the form of low returns for their crops; and

Whereas the U.S. Government has spent a great deal of money trying to correct this situation; and

Whereas increased production per acre of vegetables as well as other farm commodities is compounding an overproduction problem; and

Whereas the U.S. Government should not justify the spending of public funds to build dams to irrigate new lands, further increasing overproduction, especially in vegetables: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Vegetable Growers' Association of New Jersey, Inc., restate its position opposing the use of public funds to bring new land into production, and that the Secretary be instructed to send a copy of this resolution to each of our Representatives and Senators in Washington, D.C., to the Secretary of Agriculture, and to the Vegetable Growers' Association of America.

REDUCTION IN VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION BUDGET—LETTER

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter received from the Burlington County Executive Committee, the American Legion, urging that no cuts be made in the Veterans' Administration budget.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BURLINGTON COUNTY
AMERICAN LEGION
EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
January 20, 1959.

HON. CLIFFORD CASE,
U.S. Senator From New Jersey,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: At a recent meeting of the Burlington County Executive Committee of the American Legion, a motion was unanimously passed directing me to write a letter to you in regards to veterans' benefits.

At this time when Congress is concerned with the new budget, we feel that no cuts should be made in the Veterans' Administration budget. We know that any cuts in this budget will work a hardship on many a deserving veteran and also will make a heavier burden on the community in which he resides.

Representing the 3,500 Legionnaires of Burlington County we are asking you to help keep the VA budget from being cut.

Yours truly,

W. ROBERT BOHN,
Adjutant, Burlington County Executive Committee.

AMENDMENT OF FOREIGN SERVICE BUILDINGS ACT

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, by request, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Foreign Service Building Act of 1926, as amended. This bill was submitted to the Vice President by letter on February 3, 1959.

This proposed legislation has been requested by the Secretary of State, and, in my capacity as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I am introducing it in order that there may be a specific bill to which Members of the Senate and the public may direct their attention and comments.

I reserve my right to support or oppose this bill, as well as any suggested amendments to it, when the matter is considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations. In this connection, I take the opportunity to recall that when this bill was previously considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations in 1957, I urged that there be a limitation inserted to ensure that the Department of State would not use foreign currencies in the building program at the expense of using them for international educational exchange activities. I expect to go into this matter further when this subject is considered by the committee.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be printed at this point in the RECORD, together with the letter from the Secretary of State to the Vice President and a statement reflecting the authorizations and appropriations under the Foreign Service Buildings Act supplied by the Department of State.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill, letter, and statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1044) to amend the Foreign Service Buildings Act of 1926, as amended, introduced by Mr. FULBRIGHT (by request), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 4 of the Foreign Service Buildings Act, 1926, as amended (22 U.S.C. 295), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) For the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this Act there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, in addition to amounts previously authorized, an amount not to exceed $100,000,000, of which $50,000,000 shall be available exclusively for payments representing the value, in whole or in part, of property or credits in accordance with the provisions of the Act of July 25, 1946 (60 Stat. 663). Sums appropriated pursuant to this authorization shall remain available until expended."

The letter and statement presented by Mr. FULBRIGHT are as follows:

FEBRUARY 3, 1959.

The Honorable RICHARD M. NIXON,
President of the Senate.

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: The Department submits and recommends for your consideration the enclosed proposed legislation amending the Foreign Service Buildings Act, 1926 (22 U.S.C. 292–300).

Authorizations of appropriations to carry out the provisions of the Foreign Service Buildings Act from 1926 to the present total $231,625,000 of which $200 million is authorized to be used exclusively for payments to agencies of the U.S. Government for foreign credits and currencies. After the appropriation for the current fiscal year, there remains an unappropriated balance of authorization of $28,095,000 of which $27,234,000 is for the procurement of foreign currencies and $861,000 is in dollar authorization. These amounts will be reduced further by the appropriation for the fiscal year which ends June 30, 1960.

Thus far, under its Foreign Service buildings program, the Department of State has acquired residences, office buildings, and staff housing valued in excess of $158 million. Even so, many of the personnel at oversea posts are working and living in accommodations far below the standards considered minimum in the United States of America. In order to assess the total needs overseas, the Department initiated a post-by-post survey of buildings requirements, and as a result of this survey prepared a program to meet the basic requirements. A copy of the program is enclosed. It contemplates expenditure of an estimated $120 million in the period from fiscal year 1961 through fiscal year 1965.

Acquisitions under the Foreign Service Buildings Act have been financed largely through the use of foreign currencies and credits. Surplus property and lend-lease credits have provided foreign currencies for a substantial portion of the program. The use of these credits permitted the conversion of a portion of the debts to tangible assets of lasting value. The disposal of surplus agriculture commodities authorized by Public Law 480 currently is providing foreign currencies useful in financing the buildings program.

There are, however, certain limitations to the use of foreign currencies and credits. A substantial portion of them are held in countries where the need for building facilities no longer is acute. Under regulations prescribed by the U.S. Treasury Department and placed in effect on December 1, 1953, all agencies of the U.S. Government needing foreign exchange are required to purchase it from U.S. Treasury holdings, and they may not purchase from external sources unless the Treasury cannot supply the kind of currency needed. Only a relatively small number of foreign currencies are held by the Treasury in substantial amounts, relative to overall U.S. needs, and this number is being reduced wherever possible by exchange conversion of surplus holdings into currencies in demand.

Conversely, many of the Department's most urgent and compelling buildings needs are in countries where credits or local currencies in excess of current disbursing requirements are not held by the United States. In addition, the buildings program funds the maintenance and operating costs for owned and long-term leased buildings of the Department of State overseas, and a number of these buildings are located in areas where no currency credits are available. U.S. dollars must be expended to meet obligations in these circumstances. Consequently, the dollar requirements have increased in recent years and probably will continue to increase in the future.

The proposed amendment to section 4 will authorize additional appropriations of $100 million of which $50 million is to be in foreign currency credit authorization. A statement reflecting the authorizations and appropriations under the Foreign Service Buildings Act is enclosed.

The Department of State has been informed by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the presentation to the Congress of the proposed legislation.

A letter similar to this is being sent to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN FOSTER DULLES.

PROPOSED LITTLE DELL DAM AND RESERVOIR, SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference, a bill which would authorize the construction of a combined flood control-municipal water storage project to be located on Dell Creek in Parleys Canyon east of Salt Lake City. The proposed Little Dell Dam would be constructed about 2 miles above the existing Mountain Dell Dam. The estimated cost for the entire project is $6,393,000.

Since damaging floods of 1952 swept out of the mountains east of Salt Lake City, I have devoted considerable time to the development of a comprehensive flood control and water conservation program for the Jordan River Basin. The Salt Lake City and County Commissions have been zealous in the formulation and carrying out of such a program and I have been pleased to cooperate with them.

As a first step, funds were secured to start the Jordan River and Surplus Canal project. Congress has appropriated $541,000 thus far to expand the capacity of the valley streams and thus halt or diminish the frequent flooding along the Jordan River and the Surplus Canal. The President has requested $1,339,000 in the fiscal year 1960 budget, now before Congress, to complete the project. Salt Lakers who live near these streams have been plagued for years by flooding in varying degrees of severity. Commissioner Lamont Gunderson has done an excellent job in pushing this project to completion.

The second step was to request the Army Corps of Engineers to make a comprehensive flood control survey of the entire Jordan River Basin. It was obvious that expansion of stream carrying capacity in the valley would not alone be sufficient to meet the variegated flood problems of the basin. The 1952 experience pointed up the fact that the flood waters must be intercepted in the mountains before they wreaked havoc the full distance from the canyon all the way to the Jordan River in the valley.

It soon became apparent that completion of a comprehensive survey would require an extended period of time. Therefore, the Salt Lake City Commission requested that an interim survey be made, limited to studying the feasibility of a dam in Parleys Canyon. I was happy to support this proposal and the bill which I am introducing today incorporates the recommendations of the interim survey.

The district engineer's report of November 3, 1955, recommends the construction of an earth-fill dam, 175 feet in height, which would create reservoir storage for about 8,000 acre-feet of water. Actual construction costs are estimated to be $6,052,000, of which the Federal Government will pay $3,843,000, and the city of Salt Lake will pay $2,209,000. In addition to paying 36.5 percent of construction costs, the city will pay $341,000 for all lands, easements, and rights-of-way necessary for construction of the project, including the relocation of highways and other utilities. The city has also agreed to maintain and operate the completed project at a cost currently estimated to be $24,000 annually, in accordance with rules and regulations provided by the Secretary of the Army. The project represents a constructive Federal-local partnership effort.

The dam and reservoir will have many salutary benefits. It will greatly alleviate flood problems from Parleys Canyon to the Jordan River in the vicinity of 13th South Street resulting from floods on Parleys, Emigration, and Red Butte Creeks. About 30 percent of the reservoir capacity will be reserved for flood control. Moreover, by capturing the water in the mountains, the flow to the Jordan River and Surplus Canal will be diminished during floods, thus lessening the flood threat along the valley streams. The existing Mountain Dell Dam is solely operated for water storage. Because of its construction, it cannot control floods since there is no overflow spillway and the water pours over the top of the dam.

The Little Dell project will also add greatly to water storage for municipal purposes. At the present time, the Mountain Dell Reservoir with its 3,000 acre-feet capacity is grossly inadequate to meet storage needs. It is estimated that an average of 13,000 acre-feet of water is lost each year. However, the 8,000 acre-feet capacity Little Dell Reservoir will cut these water losses sharply.

A public hearing on the proposed project was held in Salt Lake City in the summer of 1956. Agreement has now been reached, and I ask unanimous consent that a resolution from the Salt Lake City Commission together with the transmitting letter approving the project be printed in the RECORD at this point.

Some formal administrative processing will still be required, but I am anxious to have this important project before Congress.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the resolution and letter will be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The bill (S. 1045) to authorize construction of the Little Dell Dam and Reservoir project at Salt Lake City, Utah, introduced by Mr. BENNETT, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

The letter and resolution presented by Mr. BENNETT are as follows:

SALT LAKE CITY CORP.,
Salt Lake City, Utah, August 29, 1958.

Hon. WALLACE F. BENNETT,
U.S. Senator, Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: We are enclosing a letter from Roy W. McLeese, Salt Lake City engineer, together with a resolution setting forth the city's proposal for the construction of the earth dam in the Little Dell Fork, Parley's Canyon, Utah.

Both the letter and the resolution were duly approved by the board of commissioners in regular session held August 26, 1958.

The city commissioners are most appreciative of your interest and effective work to assist in the construction of this valuable dam, and are highly pleased that you have offered to continue your efforts in this direction.

Sincerely,

HERMAN J. HOGENSEN,
City Recorder.

RESOLUTION

Whereas a public hearing was held in Salt Lake City on August 14, 1956, by the Corps of Engineers, U.S. Army, relative to a proposed Federal dam and reservoir on Parleys Creek for the control of floods and for domestic water supply; and

Whereas at said time certain estimated costs and distribution of benefits and expenses were arrived at; and

Whereas on the 10th day of October 1956 the Salt Lake City Commission by resolution agreed to participate in the construction of said dam and reservoir and agreed to bear their portion of the cost of said project; and

Whereas additional studies and further consideration have been made as to said project and that a meeting was held with the city officials and the Corps of Engineers, U.S. Army, on the 23d day of July 1958, at which time new and final figures were arrived at as to the cost and expense of said project; and

Whereas the Corps of Engineers, U.S. Army, has requested that the Board of Commissioners of Salt Lake City agree to participate in the construction of said dam and reservoir on the following basis, to wit:

(a) Furnish without cost to the United States all lands, easements, and rights-of-way necessary for construction of the project, including in this provision the undertaking of all necessary alterations and constructions of highway facilities and other utilities, all at a cost currently estimated at $341,000;

(b) Reimburse the United States for 36.5 percent of the Federal first cost of the project, said percentage currently estimated at $2,209,000, such reimbursement, if possible, to be in uniform annual payments over a 50-year period covering both principal and interest at Federal rates on the unpaid balance; and

(c) Maintain and operate the completed project at their own expense, at a cost currently estimated at $24,000 per year; such operation to be in accordance with rules and regulations to be provided by the Secretary of the Army; and

Whereas Salt Lake City is in urgent need of flood control and additional water supply: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Board of Commissioners of Salt Lake City strongly support authorization and early construction of the Little Dell Dam and Reservoir for flood control and water supply, as proposed by the Corps of Engineers; and be it further

Resolved, That the board of commissioners hereby furnish the Corps of Engineers, U.S. Army, the requested assurances to the effect it will enter into a contract with the Federal Government for its fair and equitable share of the project as above outlined and for the maintenance and operation of the project by Salt Lake City, such contract to provide, preferably, for uniform annual payments by Salt Lake City to the Government, over a 50-year period, covering both the principal and interest at Federal rates on the unpaid balance.

This resolution to supersede and take the place of the resolution heretofore passed by the Salt Lake City Board of Commissioners on the 10th day of October 1956.

Dated this 26th day of August 1958.

AMENDMENTS OF THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT OF 1938

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and Senators MORSE, CLARK, MCNAMARA, MURRAY, RANDOLPH, and WILLIAMS of New Jersey, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to bring about long-delayed and much-needed improvements in the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, popularly known as the wage-hour law. Our bill proposes two basic improvements in the present wage-hour law:

First. It raises the Federal minimum wage from the present figure of $1 an hour to $1.25 an hour.

Second. It extends the coverage of the law to approximately 7½ million additional workers.

In 1938, when the Fair Labor Standards Act was passed, Congress pledged itself "to correct and as rapidly as possible to eliminate all of the conditions detrimental to the maintenance of the minimum standard of living necessary for health, efficiency, and general well-being of workers." Mr. President, it is time to redeem that pledge, to eliminate the conditions deplored by the 75th Congress, and to assure our workers of the minimum standard of living to which they are entitled.

In 1938, when the 25-cent minimum was established, the average earnings in American industry were less than 63 cents per hour. The difference between the minimum and the average was therefore 38 cents. Today the minimum is $1 and the average is $2.19, or a gap of $1.19 per hour.

To put it another way, in 1949 the minimum wage was raised to 75 cents. Since then average industry earnings—including the lowest paid group—have risen 77 cents an hour. The higher paid, better organized workers have averaged increases of more than 85 cents an hour in wages alone. They have, in addition, received numerous fringe benefits which would increase this figure to over $1 an hour. Yet during these same 9 years the minimum wage has advanced only 25 cents.

Accompanying the advance of the general level of wages, there has been a considerable increase in the cost of living. Thus, since July 1955, when the $1 minimum wage was adopted by Congress, there has been a 9-point increase in the Consumer Price Index. This has yielded an automatic 18-cent-per-hour wage increase to workers covered by escalator clauses. In addition, during this same span there have been four annual improvement factor or productivity increases averaging about 26 cents an hour in all. This is a total of 44 cents an hour entirely apart from any basic change in rates negotiated at the termination of contracts. Certainly the lowest paid, largely unorganized workers are entitled to some relief.

Otherwise, we face the creation of a depressed class within our own society—a class of workers who, though they are employed, are condemned to a way of life that falls further and further behind the standards enjoyed by American workers as a whole and behind the price of the food they must buy and the clothing they must wear.

Many studies have been made of the minimum subsistence requirements of families and of individual workers. If the Department of Labor study made in 1951, 8 years ago, is adjusted for subsequent increases in the cost of living, it reveals that a family of four requires an income of $2.25 an hour to maintain a decent minimum standard of living today. The increase to $1.25 per hour contemplated by the proposed legislation is a modest recognition of this fact.

Turning now to the second objective—the extension of coverage—we find that the amendments to the law which were adopted in 1949 have actually reduced the proportion of workers now covered to less than the proportion that were covered in 1938, when the law was passed. These are the workers in large retail stores, in wholesale establishments, in the construction industry, in service industries, and a score of other smaller categories.

Although the present bill does not include farm labor, I believe we all recognize that there is a pressing need for the extension of wage-hour protection to those who are employed in huge agricultural enterprises. There are many such enterprises which may accurately be termed "factories in the field." However, the farm labor problem presents so many special complexities that it is not included in this bill but is the subject of separate legislative proposals. I believe, however, that the hearings upon this bill should include a consideration of the treatment of our farm workers and the extent to which fair labor standards should be applied to them.

I have shown the need for this bill in facts and figures. But that is not its only justification. When we permit the growth of a depressed class, numbering millions, whose members cannot afford the bare necessities of life, we pay a heavy price. We undermine the general prosperity of the Nation which rests upon consumer purchasing power. We promote the spread of slums, of crime, of disease, of all the ills that grow from hopeless poverty. We weaken our moral position as the proud symbol of the blessings of democracy and as the leader of the free world. It has been said that the test of our belief in human dignity is the manner in which we treat those at the bottom of the economic ladder. The 75th Congress recognized that fact in the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938; the 86th Congress can bring reality to the promise of nearly a generation ago.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed at the end of my remarks the section-by-section analysis of the bill which I have prepared, together with a joint statement by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], Representative ROOSEVELT, and myself, dealing with this subject.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the section-by-section analysis of the bill and the joint statement will be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The bill (S. 1046) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting commerce, to increase the minimum wage under the act to $1.25 an hour, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. KENNEDY (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

The section-by-section analysis and joint statement presented by Mr. KENNEDY are as follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF PROPOSED FAIR LABOR STANDARDS AMENDMENTS OF 1959

The proposed Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1959 is a bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, to provide coverage for employees of large enterprises engaged in retail trade or service and of other employers engaged in activities affecting interstate commerce, and to increase the minimum wage for employees under the act to $1.25 an hour.

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE

This section contains the title of the bill, "Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1959."

SECTION 2. FINDINGS AND DECLARATION OF POLICY

Section 2 amends section 2 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended (hereinafter referred to as the "act") by adding to this section a new subsection (b) containing an additional congressional finding setting forth the need, in retail trade and service and other industries engaged in interstate commerce, of eliminating labor conditions detrimental to the maintenance of the minimum standard of living necessary for health, efficiency, and general well-being of workers. The present subsection (b) of section 2 of the act would be relettered as subsection (c).

SECTION 3. DEFINITIONS

Section 3 amends two of the definitions presently included in section 3 of the act and adds to this section of the act definitions of a number of new terms used in the bill.

Subsection (a) amends paragraph (j) of section 3, defining the term "produced." Under the present language of this paragraph, which was adopted in the 1949 amendments to the act, employees are deemed to have been engaged in the production of goods if, among other things, they are employed in "any closely related process or occupation directly essential to the production" of goods. Under the proposed amendment employees would be deemed to be engaged in the production of goods if they are employed in "any process or occupation necessary to the production" of goods.

Subsection (b) amends paragraph (m) of section 3 of the act, defining the term "wage," by adding to this definition standards to enable the Secretary of Labor to determine the fair value of board, lodging, or other facilities customarily furnished by an employer to his employees. Such determinations could be for defined classes of employees and in defined areas and could be based on the average value to the employer or groups of employers similarly situated of furnishing to employees the facilities in question or the average value of such facilities to groups of employees, or on other appropriate measures of fair value. It is specified that such evaluations, where applicable and pertinent, shall be used in lieu of actual measure of cost in determining the wage paid to any employee for purposes of the act.

Subsection (c) adds eight new definitions to section 3 of the act:

A new paragraph (p) would define "American vessel," as used in the act, as including any vessel which is defined as a "vessel of the United States" in title 18, United States Code, section 9, or which is documented or numbered under the laws of the United States;

Paragraph (q) specifies that "Secretary," as used in the act, means the Secretary of Labor of the U.S. Department of Labor;

Paragraph (r) defines the term "enterprise." This term is used in connection with extension of the minimum wage, overtime, and child labor provisions to seven types of large enterprises on an employer basis, as set forth in the discussion of the proposed new paragraph (w) below. The term is defined as meaning related activities performed either directly or through unified operation or common control or otherwise, for a common business purpose of providing goods or services, or the products thereof, or a combination of them, to others, and includes all such activities, whether performed in one or more establishments or by one or more corporate or other organizational units. Under this definition, the activities of the seven specified types of enterprises as employers of employees under the act are to be viewed as a whole in determining whether any such enterprise is engaged in activtities which bring its employees within the scope of the act;

Paragraphs (s) and (t) define the terms "activity affecting commerce" and "employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce." Under these definitions, an employee who is not technically engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce will nevertheless be covered if (1) he is employed by any one of seven types of enterprises defined in paragraph (t) and (2) such enterprise is engaged in an activity affecting interstate commerce, as defined in paragraph (s). Paragraph (s) defines the term "activity affecting commerce" as including any activity in commerce, necessary to commerce, or competing with any activity in commerce, or where the payment of wages at rates below those prescribed by the act, or the employment of oppressive child labor prohibited by the act, burdens or obstructs or tends to burden or obstruct commerce or the free flow of commerce. This definition is substantially the same as and is intended to provide coverage substantially similar to that provided under "affecting commerce" definitions used in the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, and the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, as amended. Paragraph (t), which defines the term "employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce" specifies seven types of establishments to whose employees coverage under the act would be extended by the bill. Under this paragraph coverage is extended on an enterprise basis if the employer is engaged in an activity affecting commerce. This contrasts with the present tests of coverage which are on an employee basis and provide coverage only if the individual employee is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce.

The term "employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce" includes seven types of large enterprises whose sales exceed certain specified amounts based for the most part on current jurisdictional standards being applied by the National Labor Relations Board in determining whether assertion of Board jurisdiction in specific cases would serve the purpose of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended. The employees of such enterprises will be covered if the employer is engaged in an activity affecting commerce. These seven types of large enterprises are as follows:

(1) Any enterprise where the employer has one or more retail establishments if the annual gross sales of such enterprise as a whole are not less than $500,000 or if the sales of such enterprise for resale or to customers engaged in a mining, manufacturing, transportation, commercial, or communications business amount to at least $50,000 annually;

(2) Any enterprise where the employer has one or more service establishments if the annual gross sales of such enterprise as a whole are not less than $500,000 or if the sales of such enterprise to customers engaged in a mining, manufacturing, transportation, commercial, or communications business amount to at least $50,000 annually;

(3) Any enterprise where the employer has one or more establishments engaged in laundering, cleaning or repairing clothes or fabrics, if the annual gross sales of such enterprise as a whole are not less than $250,000, or if the sales of such enterprise to customers engaged in a mining, manufacturing, transportation, commercial, or communications business amount to at least 15 percent of the gross sales of the enterprise;

(4) Any enterprise where the employer is engaged in the business of operating a street, suburban, or interurban transit system;

(5) Any enterprise where the employer is engaged in the business of operating taxis if the annual gross business of such enterprise as a whole is not less than $500,000.

(6) Any enterprise where the employer is engaged in the building and construction industry if the annual gross business of such enterprise as a whole is not less than $50,000;

(7) Any enterprise where the employer has one or more employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce if the annual gross business of such enterprise as a whole is not less than $50,000.

A proviso at the end of paragraph (w) specifies that so-called "mom and pop" shops are not to be covered. The term "employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce" specifically excludes any retail or service enterprise in which the only employees are the owner of such enterprise and a parent, spouse or child of such owner.

SECTION 4. SPECIAL INDUSTRY COMMITTEES FOR PUERTO RICO AND VIRGIN ISLANDS

This section makes changes in section 5 of the act, relating to the appointment of industry committees to recommend the minimum rates of wages to be paid under section 6 to employees in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, so as to give such committees jurisdiction over employees employed by any employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce, as well as over employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce. Under the terms of subsection (c) of section 6 of the act, the same procedures which are applicable to the appointment of industry committees and the issuance of minimum wage orders for employees in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands are applicable to employees in American Samoa.

SECTION 5. MINIMUM WAGES

Subsection (a) amends subsection (a) of section 6 of the act to make the minimum wage provisions apply not only to every employee engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce but also to every employee of every employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce, as defined in paragraph (w) of section 3 of the act, as amended. Certain exemptions continue to be provided for in section 13 of the act, as amended, but heretofore exempt employees will be entitled to be paid in accordance with section 6 of the act, as amended, if they are engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce unless such employees are specifically exempt from the application of such section under the provisions of subsections (a), (d), or (f) of section 13 of such act, as amended.

Subsection (b) amends paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of section 6 of the act by raising the minimum wage under the act from $1.00 to $1.25 an hour.

Subsection (c) amends subsection (c) of section 6 of the act, applicable to the issuance of wage orders for employees in Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands and American Samoa, so that wage orders may be issued not only with respect to any such employees who are engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce but also with respect to any such employees who are employed by an employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce. A proviso is included in this section which specifies that the minimum wage rates applicable to any employee covered by a wage order heretofore in effect for employees in Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands or American Samoa shall be increased by the same number of cents per hour as the minimum wage prescribed in paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of section 6 is increased by the bill. Such minimum wage rate or rates, if less than the rate prescribed in paragraph (1) of subsection (a) as amended, are to be in effect only for so long as and insofar as such minimum wage rate or rates are not superseded by a subsequent wage order issued in accordance with sections 5 and 8, as amended, fixing a higher minimum wage rate or rates, not in excess of the rate prescribed in paragraph (1) of subsection (a).

SECTION 6. MAXIMUM HOURS

Subsection (a) amends subsection (a) of section 7 to make the maximum hours provisions of the act apply not only to nonexempt employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce but also to nonexempt employees employed by any employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce. Certain exemptions continue to be provided for in section 13 of the act, as amended, but heretofore exempt employees will be entitled to be paid in accordance with section 7 of the act if they are engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce unless such employees are specifically exempt from the application of such section under the provision of subsections (a), (b), (d) or (f) of section 13 of the act, as amended.

Subsection (b) amends subsection (b) of section 7 of the act by striking from this subsection the so-called "seasonal industry" exemption contained in clause 3 of this subsection.

Subsection (c) amends section 7 by striking out the maximum hours exemptions applicable to employees engaged in certain specified agricultural handling and processing occupations contained in subsection (c) of such section.

SECTION 7. WAGE ORDERS IN PUERTO RICO AND VIRGIN ISLANDS

This section amends section 8 of the act so that wage orders issued under the act with respect to employees in Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, or American Samoa shall apply not only to employees in such islands who are engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce but also to any such employees who are employed by an employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce.

SECTION 8. CHILD LABOR PROVISIONS

This section amends subsection (c) of section 12 of the act by providing that the child labor provisions shall not only apply to employers engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce but also to employers engaged in activity affecting commerce. Certain exemptions continue to be provided for in section 13 of the act, as amended, but child labor which has heretofore been permitted will be prohibited under section 12, if the employer is engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce unless such child labor is specifically exempt from such section under the provisions of subsection (c), (d), or (f), of section 13 of such act, as amended.

SECTION 9. EXEMPTIONS

Subsections (a) and (b) of this section rewrite and make the following changes in subsections (a) and (b) of section 13 of the act:

(a) The minimum wage and overtime exemptions for employees employed in a local retailing capacity presently contained in clause (1) of subsection (a) have been eliminated. The present exemptions for executive, administrative, and professional employees and for outside salesmen, however, are retained;

(b) Clauses (2) and (3) containing minimum wage and overtime exemptions applicable to employees of retail, service, and laundry, cleaning and repairing enterprises have been eliminated. The new coverage provisions specify the types of retail service and laundry, cleaning, and repairing enterprises that would be covered by the bill;

(c) Clause 5 has been amended to eliminate the present minimum wage and overtime exemptions for employees engaged in packing or other processing of fish or seafood products. Fishing and other occupations which precede packing and processing of such products would, however, continue to be exempt;

(d) The minimum wage and overtime exemptions for employees of weekly, semiweekly and daily newspapers contained in clause 8 have been eliminated;

(e) The minimum wage and overtime exemptions for employees of street, suburban and interurban transit systems contained in clause 9 have been eliminated. The new coverage provisions specify the types of enterprises engaged in the business of operating any such system that would be covered by the bill;

(f) Although overtime exemptions for employees engaged in certain agricultural processing occupations have been eliminated, as explained in the discussion of section 6 of the bill, supra, existing exemptions from the minimum wage and overtime provisions applicable to specified agricultural processing operations in the area of production contained in clause 10 have been retained;

(g) The minimum wage and overtime exemptions applicable to certain telephone switchboard operators under clause 11 have been amended to apply only where the operator is providing telephone service through a telephone switchboard located in the operator's home;

(h) The minimum wage and overtime exemptions for employees of employers engaged in the business of operating taxicabs contained in clause 12 have been eliminated. The new coverage provisions specify the types of enterprises engaged in the business of operating taxis that would be covered by the bill;

(i) The minimum wage and overtime exemptions applicable under clause 14 to employees employed as seamen have been amended to apply only to seamen employed on vessels other than American vessels. A new subsection (g) is added to section 13 of the act, specifying the manner in which the minimum wage and overtime provisions are to be applicable to employees employed as seamen on American vessels;

(j) The minimum wage and overtime exemptions applicable under clause 15 to employees of sawmills employing 12 or fewer employees have been eliminated;

(k) The overtime exemptions applicable to pipeline and trucking employees under clause 1 of subsection (b) of section 13 have been eliminated;

(l) The overtime exemptions applicable to canning of fish or seafood products under clause (4) of subsection (b) of section 13 have been eliminated;

(m) Employees in American Samoa subject to the provisions of subsection (e) of section 13 would be exempt from the overtime provisions under a new clause 3 of subsection (b) of section 13, as amended.

The bill continues the present minimum wage and overtime exemptions applicable to retail establishments that make or process the goods which they sell and to contract telegraph agencies maintained in exempt retail of service establishments where the telegraph message revenue of the agency does not exceed $500 a month. It also retains the minimum wage and overtime exemption for employees employed in agriculture or in connection with nonprofit ditches, canals, reservoirs, or waterways used for supplying or storing water for agricultural purposes. Similarly, the minimum wage and overtime exemptions for employees covered by subminimum wage rates fixed by the Secretary under section 14 of the act for learners, apprentices, and handicapped workers is retained. Presumably the Secretary would proceed promptly to review these subminimum rates upon enactment of the higher minimum wage rate provided for in paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of section 6 of the act, as amended.

The various clauses of subsections (a), and (b) have been renumbered to take account of clauses which would be repealed.

Subsection (c) of section 9 amends subsection (c) of section 13 of the act to make clear that the exemption from the child labor provisions applicable to children employed in agriculture is restricted to children employed in agricultural work which is exempt under clause 4 of subsection (a) of section 13, as amended. This exemption would apply only to children employed outside of school hours for the school district where such children are living while so employed.

Subsection (d) adds to subsection (d) of section 13 of the act a new proviso specifying that the child labor provisions shall not apply to any newspaper delivery employee, other than newsboys engaged in residential delivery of newspapers, if such employee is employed outside of school hours for the school district where the employee is living while he is so employed and the employee is 16 years of age or over.

Subsection (e) adds to section 13 of the act a new subsection (g) which provides that for purposes of the application of the minimum wage and overtime provisions to seamen employed on American vessels, such employees are to be paid not less than the rate which will provide to the employee, for the period covered by the wage payment, wages equal to compensation at the prescribed minimum wage rate or overtime rate, or both, as may be appropriate, for all hours during such period when the employee was actually on duty. This period, however, is not to include off-duty hours within such period which are provided pursuant to the employment agreement applicable to such employee or to periods aboard ship when the employee was not, at the direction of a superior officer, either performing other work or standing by.

SECTION 10. PROHIBITED ACTS: PRIMA FACIE EVIDENCE

This section adds to section 15 of the act a new subsection (c) providing that the provisions of subsection (a) of this section declaring certain violations of the act and other actions of an employer to be unlawful when engaged in by such employer with respect to any employee engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce shall be applicable to every employer engaged in an activity affecting commerce with respect to any employee of an enterprise where the employer is so engaged.

SECTION 11. EFFECTIVE DATE

This section specifies that the act shall take effect 90 days after the date of enactment.

JOINT STATEMENT OF SENATOR KENNEDY, SENATOR MORSE, AND REPRESENTATIVE ROOSEVELT, UPON INTRODUCTION OF MINIMUM WAGE BILL, FEBRUARY 16, 1959

These amendments will correct in part one of the most shocking but least publicized economic and moral crises facing America today—the fact that millions of hard-working citizens cannot earn enough, no matter how many hours they toil, to maintain themselves and their families at a higher level than bare subsistence.

The present $1 minimum wage is even less adequate in 1959 than the original 25 cents minimum was in 1938. Contrary to the expressed intention of Congress 21 years ago, the lowest paid workers have fallen farther and farther behind the average wage earner. Moreover, a smaller proportion of our Nation's work force has wage-hour protection today than had such protection in 1938.

The failure of our national economy to rally as quickly as predicted from last year's slump can be traced directly to a lack of consumer buying power among the lowest paid workers. If a third of the employed wage earners are hard put to meet the cost of food and shelter, they cannot buy enough automobiles, appliances, or houses to put America back on its feet.

It is bad enough that we have fallen behind the Soviet Union in the science of rocketry and ballistic missiles. If we also fall in our economy—if millions of Americans cannot achieve freedom from fear or freedom from want—the impact on world opinion will be greater than a Soviet Union expedition to the moon.

Experience after 1949, when the minimum wage was nearly doubled, and after 1955, when it rose by one-third, proved beyond a doubt that higher earnings for the lowest paid are not reflected in higher prices. We need only cite the studies made in each case by the Department of Labor.

In order to eliminate any misunderstanding about the application of the bill to the so-called ma and pa enterprises, it explicitly exempts all businesses in which the owner and members of his immediate family do the work. The exemption is clear and categorical. We hope it will put an end, once and for all, to this baseless argument against a fair law.

EXTENSION OF WAR ORPHANS EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE ACT

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to extend the War Orphans Educational Assistance Act to cover those presently serving in the Armed Forces and the orphans they may unfortunately leave.

We have heard much in recent days of a tragic flight by a U.S. Air Force plane over a small corner of the Soviet Union, the coldblooded destruction of this unarmed plane, and the probable death of all its occupants. We have heard much of the implications of this incident on our foreign policy, on what Khrushchev thinks, on what Mikoyan thinks, on how and what we heard on radio monitors, on all the pros and cons of our intelligence efforts, airplane flight routes, false radio signals, and other details.

One fact remains; perhaps 17 airmen doing their duty for their country were killed by what we may consider, in this situaton at least, a hostile aggressor, using the weapons of warfare. Our airmen have paid the price of thousands of our heroes, and we have paid them all due honor and respect. But that honor and respect does not discharge the Nation's full obligation to these heroes.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the names of the crew list of the plane which was gunned down. Two members of the crew were from my own State.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Capt. Paul E. Duncan, Bedford, England.
First Lt. John E. Simpson, Austin, Tex.
Capt. Rudy J. Swiestra, Compton, Calif.
First Lt. Ricardo M. Vallarreal, Laredo, Tex.
Capt. Edward J. Jeruss, Rhein-Main Airbase, Germany.
T. Sgt. Laroy Price, Hodgenville, Ky.
A2c. Archie T. Bourg, Morfelden, Germany.
A2c. James E. Ferguson, Hamlet, Ind.
A2c. Joe H. Fields, Cynthiana, Ky.
A2c. Harold T. Kamps, Coleman, Wis.
A2c. Gerald C. Maggioacoma, Everett, Mass.
A2c. Gerald E. Medeiros, New Bedford, Mass.
T. Sgt. Arthur L. Mello, Erie, Pa.
A1c. Robert J. Oshinski, Shamokin, Pa.
A2c. Clement O. Mankis, Point Marion, Pa.
A2c. Robert H. Moore, West Monroe, La.
M. Sgt. George P. Petrochilos, Levittown, Pa.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, let us now look apart from the ceremonials and the words of praise. Let us look at the concrete steps a grateful Government can take to in some small way recompense those beloved by our fallen servants. You may look, but you will not find the recompense. You will not find any compensation to the families of these casualties of the cold war other than a meager social-security annuity and a burial allowance. I submit that this is not even an acceptable measure for legal liability, much less recognition by a humane Government of the supreme sacrifice made in its behalf.

Two of the fliers shot down by the Communists were natives of my home State. But it is not only for the sake of their survivors that I introduce this bill; it is for all the children who may find themselves fatherless because their parents were under our peacetime compulsion to serve in our Armed Forces.

Up to January 1955, if a soldier died in service or from a service-incurred disability, his children, the war orphans, were entitled to assistance for educational purposes, to help complete their education.

This bill I introduce would provide educational assistance for the children of those dying in active military service or by reason of a disability incurred from active military service. We did this before January 31, 1955—surely we are not too niggardly to do it now, since the circumstances are the same.

The bill provides that each eligible child would be entitled to educational assistance for a period not to exceed 36 months, or to the equivalent thereof in part-time training. This assistance would be in the form of a monthly allowance to be paid on the basis of $110 per month on full-time schooling, $80 per month on three-quarters time, or $50 per month on half-time schooling.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks, together with an explanation of the bill showing the amounts to be paid for the education of these children.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair). The bill will be received, appropriately referred, and printed in the RECORD, together with the explanatory statement.

The bill (S. 1050) to provide educational assistance for the children of service men and women who suffer death from a service-connected disability arising out of active military service during the period beginning on February 1, 1955, and ending on June 30, 1963, introduced by Mr. YARBOROUGH, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 1701 (a) (1) of title 38 of the United States Code is amended by striking out "or the Korean conflict" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "the Korean conflict, or the period beginning on February 1, 1955, and ending on June 30, 1963,".

(b) Subsection (d) of such section is amended by striking out "or the Korean conflict," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "the Korean conflict, or the period beginning on February 1, 1955, and ending on June 30, 1963,".

(c) Section 1712 of such title is amended by redesignating subsection (b) as subsection (c) and inserting a new subsection (b) as follows:

"(b) In the case of any person (1) who becomes eligible for educational assistance under this chapter by virtue of the amendments to such chapter made by the Act which enacted this subsection, and (2) who is above the age of seventeen years and below the age of twenty-three years on the date of enactment of such Act, the period of eligibility prescribed by this section shall not end with respect to such person until five years after the date of enactment of such Act."

The explanatory statement presented by Mr. YARBOROUGH is as follows:

EXPLANATION OF BILL

This bill provides educational assistance to the children of service men and women who suffer death from a service-connected disability arising out of active military service during the period beginning on February 1, 1955, and ending on June 30, 1963.

Each eligible child would be entitled to educational assistance for a period not in excess of 36 months, or to the equivalent thereof in part-time training. The assistance would be in the form of a monthly allowance to be paid in accordance with the following:

(a) For a person pursuing a program of education consisting of institutional courses, the allowance shall be computed at the rate of (1) $110 per month if pursued on a full-time basis, (2) $80 per month if pursued on a three-quarters time basis, and (3) $50 per month if pursued on a half-time basis.

(b) The allowance to be paid an eligible person who is pursuing a full-time program of education which consists of institutional courses and alternate phases of training in a business or industrial establishment, with the training in the business or industrial establishment being strictly supplemental to the institutional portion, shall be computed at the rate of $90 per month.

(c) No allowance shall be paid to an eligible person for a period during which he is enrolled in and pursuing an institutional course on a less than half-time basis, or any course described in (b) above, on less than a full-time basis.

The bill contains a savings clause for children who become eligible for educational assistance by virtue of the enactment of the bill, but who are already of school age at the time of such enactment. The effect of the savings clause is to give these persons a period of 1 year from the date of enactment of the bill within which to commence a program of education or training under the bill. After commencement of education or training, these persons would have an additional 4 years within which to complete their educational training.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be allowed to lie on the table for 1 week, so that other Senators who desire may join as consponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF APPROPRIATION BILL FOR SERVICE OF POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, FISCAL YEAR ENDING JUNE 30, 1913

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, for nearly half a century it has been a recognized principle of our Federal law that there should be annual disclosures by individuals or corporations with a substantial interest in any newspaper or other publication using the mails. The reason and design for such legislation is quite apparent. It is to enable the public to be apprised of whose voice is speaking in the particular publication. To implement this policy the law has required that a sworn annual return indicating the names of the individuals or corporations holding 1 percent or more of the total stock, bonds, mortgages, or other securities of the periodical using the mails be filed.

It was brought to the attention of the special committee investigating political activities, lobbying, and campaign contributions, working under Senate Resolution 128 of the 85th Congress, that there has been an avoidance of the spirit, if not the letter, of the law under the existing disclosure requirements.

The bill which I am introducing on behalf of myself and the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] is very short and uncomplicated. It makes two changes in the existing law: First, it requires that any holders of a financial interest substantially sufficient to establish control, whether it is a secured interest or not, must file a disclosure. Secondly, it requires the address of the person or corporation filing the return, for surely the name would be of little value without the address.

I think it is evident from the great number of publications and the enormous increase in their respective costs that they are particularly vulnerable to exploitation by those who seek to control through loans or otherwise. I believe the bill which I am about to introduce will be a step in the right direction to remedy the situation through disclosure as I have outlined.

Mr. President, on behalf of myself and the senior Senator from Arkansas, I introduce this bill, for appropriate reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1054) to amend section 2 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," introduced by Mr. BRIDGES (for himself and Mr. MCCLELLAN), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

NATIONAL HEALTH INSURANCE ACT

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, the 1959 version of what was known in the forties as the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill providing a national health insurance program. I believe that most of my colleagues are aware that this is a measure designed to provide a practical method through which the people of the United States will find it easily possible to meet the currently overwhelming burden of trying to pay for medical care. It is a measure, Mr. President, which is substantially identical in its content to the health insurance title of the bill which I had the pleasure of cosponsoring in the Senate some 14 years ago with our late and greatly esteemed colleague, Senator Bob Wagner, of New York, and the companion bill which was then introduced in the House by the late and respected Congressman Dingell, the father of the brilliant young Member of the House of Representatives who is today introducing a bill identical to mine in the House of Representatives.

I would like to point out to my colleagues, and particularly to the representatives of the press who are present here today, that when we introduced our bill some 14 years ago it was invariably denounced, particularly by the American Medical Association, as—and I quote—"socialized medicine." It is amusing to me—wryly amusing—to notice how even the AMA today encourages the Congress to appropriate funds for some seven going programs, each of which was a part of the early Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill. These programs, which they once denounced as socialized medicine and therefore presumably repugnant to our American way of life, now that they have been in actual operation, most of them for over a decade, have not only proved tremendously valuable to the American people and worthy of the continuing support of the Congress but have even won the support of the American Medical Association.

So well accepted are these aid programs, Mr. President, that I suspect that almost no Member of the Congress, and very few representatives of the press, are the least bit conscious of the fact that they were part of the early Wagner-Murray-Dingell bills. I refer, Mr. President, to programs under which we now provide Federal support, first, for the education of health personnel; second, for the support of medical research; third, for the tremendously valuable and popular hospital survey and construction grant program; fourth, grants for public health aids in rural and other shortage areas; fifth, grants to the States for local health work; sixth, grants for research in child life; and, seventh, grants for maternal and child health and crippled children's services. Each of these programs, now recognized as of tremendous value to the country, was once a part of the Wagner-Murray-Dingell so-called socialized medicine bill.

It is my hope, Mr. President, in introducing that one most important part of the original Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill, its health insurance provisions, that my fellow legislators and the American people—and perhaps even the American Medical Association—will realize the absurdity of trying to prevent enactment of this measure by use of the old, worn-out cliche of socialized medicine which was once attached not only to the proposal set forth in the bill I am today introducing but to all of the other programs now in operation which I have mentioned above. Let the record state very clearly that this bill would not socialize medicine. If enacted, the practice of medicine as we know it need not change at all. The only thing that would change would be the ability of those of our people who need medical care to get it without worrying about its cost.

Socialized medicine means just one thing. It means a system of medicine wherein physicians and dentists and other health personnel are all employees of the Government. That is a system which I, myself, do not advocate

In conclusion, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be set forth in the RECORD, following my remarks, a most informative and interesting article written by Dr. Bruce Cardew, general secretary of the Medical Practitioners' Union, in which he sets forth and proves conclusively the fact that, having now lived with Britain's national health system for 10 years, every segment of British society, including its doctors of medicine, wholeheartedly approves of their system, finds that it is working well, and agrees that it is giving the people of Britain access to far more and to far better care than was theirs before the program went into effect. This article, Mr. President, appeared in the January 31 issue of United Paper, which is published by the United Paper Makers and Paper Workers, AFL–CIO.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1056) to provide a program of national health insurance, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MURRAY, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

The article presented by Mr. MURRAY is as follows:

IN BRITAIN THEY SAY THEIR HEALTH PLAN IS HERE TO STAY

(By Dr. Bruce Cardew)

Last year marked the 10th anniversary of the national health service in our country. Ten years seems a likely period for fair appraisal.

I should think it would be of particular interest to Americans in view of the volume of adverse reporting about the British health service in the United States press.

While it is far from my province to suggest that a British plan serve as a model for an American one, an exchange of views on the economics of health may prove of value all around. Hence, I appreciate the invitation of United Paper to write this article and offer these observations for consideration by trade unionists in the United States.

No one act of the British Labor Government of 1945–50 has been more popular or more widely accepted than the national health service.

Despite the fact its introduction was heralded by the American press in highly critical terms, there is now an overwhelming support for the service among the British people regardless of their political views. No government (conservative, liberal, or labor) would even consider abolishing the service, or indeed, in modifying it seriously in any way.

The various professions, including the doctors and dentists who showed great reluctance to come into the service, are now in it to stay. I would estimate that very few doctors, probably not more than 5 percent, would like to return to the conditions that existed before the service came into being.

Many foreigners, and certainly including many Americans, seem to think that the British national health service is an expensive luxury. These views are refuted by the facts.

In Britain we spend less than 4 percent of our national income on the health service. Comparisons have been made with what other countries spend on health, and certainly the United States of America spends a higher proportion of its national income on providing health for its citizens than does Britain.

Our health service is paid for largely out of general taxation. This means, in effect, that the richer section of the community pays relatively more than does the poorer. Indeed, those who pay no income tax obtain their health service at a very low cost to themselves.

If the cost of the service is averaged out, it comes to about 14 pounds ($40) per head of the population. This includes all hospital care, all family doctor care, drugs, dressings, surgical applicances, dental care, false teeth and even wigs if they are necessary.

If a woman has a baby, she not only has the complete cost met by the service, but also receives a grant toward the cost of the baby's clothes, and so forth.

If an elderly man or woman lives alone and cannot afford to have anyone look after them or cook their meals, the service provides what we call home helps free of charge to go in and care for the old person.

From this you can see that the British national health service is very comprehensive. It not only covers the citizen against every form of medical disability, but it covers all of us, rich and poor alike. The millionaire is as entitled to benefits as is the rank and file trade unionist. Even visitors to our land obtain the full benefits of the health service providing that their need arose at the time of their visit.

The comprehensive character of the national health service has had certain important consequences, particularly for the trade union movement. In many other countries, notably in the United States of America, one of the most important functions which individual trade unions have had to assume is the provision of medical care for their members. In Great Britain, however, the trade union movement has always taken the view that this provision is the proper function of the Government and that the burden of providing it should not fall on the trade union movement.

The Trades Union Congress (equivalent to your AFL–CIO) has also maintained that medical benefits should be financed principally out of taxation and not out of direct insurance contributions by the workers.

In 1946 the Labor government then in office, placed the main financial burdens on the taxpayer, thus insuring that those best able to pay would carry the main burden. Recently the Conservative government increased the modest insurance funds contribution to the service from 40 million to 100 million pounds. Even thus, six-sevenths of the total cost falls on taxation.

Now let us look at the British health service in more detail, particularly with regard to various charges in the American press claiming the service has led to regimentation of patients and practitioners.

First, we should deal with the general practitioner service. Every British citizen, whatever his age, has the right to be registered on the list of a family doctor who will be responsible for visiting him when sick and providing him with all the drugs and dressings he needs. Some 98 percent of the population are registered.

The patient can choose any doctor he wishes and, in the event of a disagreement, can change his doctor by giving a fortnight's notice. The doctor, too, can ask for a patient to be removed from his list.

The family doctor is paid a sum each year for looking after the patient, plus his expenses. This system has certain advantages but it does little to insure that the standards of surgery accommodation are uniform throughout the county, with the result that they vary from good to very poor.

One of the tasks ahead is to raise the general standards of domiciliary medical care. This is not purely an administrative matter. The doctors themselves are keen to better their own standards. A few years ago a College of General Practitioners was formed which is doing a great deal of work to this end.

The general practitioner does his best for his patients within the limits of his own knowledge and equipment. When he is in difficulties he refers his patient to the outpatient department of the local hospital where fuller diagnostic procedures are available. Following outpatient hospital diagnosis, the patient may be admitted to the hospital or referred back to his doctor with advice for further treatment.

The family doctor may also use the health and welfare services of the local authorities. These are quite extensive and include, among others, a complete domiciliary nursing service, a midwifery service and a health visiting service. Domestic home helps are also available to enter the home of the patient and care for him during illness.

Special services are also available for the care of old people. Local authorities are empowered to provide all sorts of special services for the aged. Among these are a meals-on-wheels service which takes hot meals around to patients who are sick; a home laundering service; and the organization of old people's clubs.

In Great Britain the care of the old presents a considerable challenge as their number is increasing year by year as a proportion of the population. Whereas in the beginning of the century we had 6 old people for every 100 of the population, we now have 15, and within the next 20 years we should have 20 per 100.

It is important, therefore, that we should develop our old people's medical and social services not only for humane reasons but so as to keep them healthy and usefully at work as long as they want to stay. This requires a high level of good organization.

Although we are gratified with the achievements of the health service, it must not be thought we are in any way complacent. We know well that it has many deficiencies which can only be corrected slowly. The hospital field is one example. In this respect our country is singularly badly placed. As with our railways and factories, our hospitals were built during the last century. In many instances they are 50 years behind those of other countries. Today we inherit a vast number of ancient hospital buildings which need replacement. Since the war we have gone from one economic crisis to another and have never been in a financial position to invest much capital in hospital development. Britain is, therefore, faced with a tremendous problem of hospital rebuilding, and a start is now being made on this. It will, however, take many years before our hospitals are up to date and worthy of our health service.

There is also a great need to house general practitioners in more modern and better equipped premises. This also takes money and can only be done gradually.

Fortunately there is a growing realization in Great Britain that a health service is not only a wealth consuming service, but a wealth producing service as well. It produces wealth in that it keeps people at work and returns them to work more rapidly. Thus, it has a great part to play in the economy of our country.

During the last 10 years I have read many excerpts from articles on the British National Health Service which have appeared in the American press. Most have been critical and many have given a false picture leading Americans to think our service has not been a success. I would say the opposite is the case.

Nearly everyone in the country uses the service and regards it as a blessing. Very few doctors or patients today would prefer the conditions that existed before the service. It has become part of our national life and it is here to stay.

ADMINISTRATION OF LAKE MEAD NATIONAL RECREATION AREA, ARIZONA AND NEVADA

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague the distinguished junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. CANNON], and myself, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide an adequate basis for administration of the Lake Mead National Recreation Area, Arizona and Nevada, and for other purposes.

The recreation area surrounding Lake Mead and Lake Mojave, bodies of water formed by Hoover and Davis Dams on the Colorado River, is unsurpassed in scenic grandeur. More than 2½ million visitors are attracted to this area each year.

Since its withdrawal by Executive order in 1930 for reclamation purposes, this 2-million-acre area has been beset by administrative problems of control. It has been administered by the National Park Service under an interbureau agreement with the Bureau of Reclamation.

The underlying purpose of our bill is to provide the area with regulations that would bring about more beneficial use of the tremendous recreational facilities. This great area has a plateau section which includes nearly 100 miles of the Grand Canyon and the canyon's mouth, the 155-mile-long Lake Mead, which is the world's largest manmade body of water, and Lake Mojave. In addition, there are many points of geological, biological, and archaeological interest.

This bill introduced by my colleague and myself redescribes the boundaries of the national recreation area, eliminating approximately 139,800 acres from the present gross area of 1,951,928 acres. It is recognized that this is a large acreage, but it includes a rugged region, the principal values of which, apart from the storage of water, are those arising from its use by the national recreation area and collateral uses such as mining and grazing.

Our bill will afford full protection to the water-control projects, at the same time facilitating speedier development of the unlimited recreational advantages. Present regulations governing hunting, grazing, and vacation cabin sites will be continued substantially the same as at present.

Recognition is given to the canyon portion of the Hualapai Indian Reservation within the national recreation area. The Arizona tribe has indicated its willingness to have certain of its lands included, allowing the tribe to participate and benefit from establishment of the area.

Our bill seeks to bring into harmonious adjustment the various activities within the recreation area. Also, it will stimulate greater development of the area's recreational potential, in keeping with the proper demands of the growing populations in Nevada, Arizona, and other Western States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1060) to provide an adequate basis for administration of the Lake Mead National Recreation Area, Ariz. and Nev., and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. BIBLE (for himself and Mr. CANNON), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

PREVENTION OF PERNICIOUS POLITICAL ACTIVITIES—AMENDMENT OF HATCH ACT

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend section 9(b) of the Hatch Political Activities Act of 1939 to eliminate the requirement that the Civil Service Commission impose a minimum penalty of 90 days suspension and loss of one quarter of a year's salary for any violation of the act, regardless of whether it is of a minor or inadvertent nature.

The administration of the Hatch Act over a period of years has clearly demonstrated that this mandatory minimum penalty provision frequently results in an unjust hardship on the Federal employee and a burden on the Government agency which employs him.

The present minimum penalty is unfair to the employee because he must forfeit one-fourth of his annual salary—a large sum if one makes only $3,600 per year—for any violation, no matter how trivial or involuntary. Reference to a few cases decided recently or now pending, will illustrate the type of person upon whom this penalty is falling.

Case No. 1: A Federal employee was a candidate for and elected to the position of election clerk, an office which in most States is nonpartisan. Because the position involved long hours and hard work on election days, and was looked upon in the community as a civic duty, the employee had no opposition and had held the position in several elections prior to becoming a Federal employee. For this infraction the employee had to forfeit one-fourth of his yearly pay and suffer a 90-day suspension.

Case 2: A postmaster, since October 2, 1933, authorized his name to appear in a political advertisement published in a local newspaper in July of 1953, endorsing his son as a candidate for the nomination for county attorney. Prior to the primary he helped string a political campaign poster announcing his son's candidacy from a second floor porch of the building which houses the post office to a point on the opposite side of the street. Penalty: 90 days' suspension; loss of 3 months' pay.

Case 3: A Federal employee announced his candidacy for the office of justice of the peace and was elected to the post. After the election, it was brought to his attention that such activity was a violation of the Hatch Act, and he withdrew and never assumed office. Penalty: 90 days' suspension; one-fourth year's pay.

Case 4: A Federal employee of long standing was elected without opposition in 1947 to the office of township school director, and reelected twice in 1951 and 1957 by write-in votes. He was advised after the 1957 election that that activity might constitute a violation of the act and withdrew. Penalty proposed: 90 days' suspension without pay.

Case 5: A postal employee since October 1946 was a member of a reception committee in 1956 to welcome a former President of the United States as a principal speaker at a political rally held on October 29, 1956. Case pending.

The General Counsel of the Civil Service Commission recommended the removal of this mandatory minimum penalty provision in a letter to the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service dated January 30, 1959, and he stressed the fact that the "harshness of the penalty may also be a burden upon the employee's agency when that agency is denied the employee's services for a 90-day period due to a minor violation."

This same amendment to the Hatch Act was recommended in a report dated December 31, 1958, of the Special Committee To Investigate and Study the Operation and Enforcement of the Hatch Political Activities Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1061) to amend section 9(b) of the act entitled "An act to prevent pernicious political activities" (the Hatch Political Activities Act) to eliminate the requirement that the Civil Service Commission impose no penalty less than 90 days' suspension for any violation of section 9 of the act, introduced by Mr. CLARK, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE ACT, RELATING TO MERGERS AND CONSOLIDATIONS OF BANKS

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], and myself, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill on the subject of bank mergers. I ask unanimous consent that an explanation of the bill, prepared by me, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1062) to amend the Federal Deposit Insurance Act to provide safeguards against mergers and consolidations of banks which might lessen competition unduly or tend unduly to create a monopoly in the field of banking, introduced by Mr. ROBERTSON (for himself, Mr. FULBRIGHT, and Mr. CAPEHART), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The statement presented by Mr. ROBERTSON is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR ROBERTSON

I have introduced a bill to authorize the national banking agencies to regulate bank mergers on the basis of uniform standards involving both banking and competitive factors. It would prevent bank mergers which might lessen competition unduly or tend unduly to create a monopoly in the field of banking.

This bill has been considered by the Senate before. It is the same as S. 3911, 84th Congress, which was the subject of hearings before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee in June 1956, and which the committee reported on July 16, 1956, and the Senate passed on July 25, 1956.

The bill is also the same as section 23 of title III of the financial institutions bill, which passed the Senate on March 21, 1957. This provision was included in the bill reported by the committee and it was specifically considered and approved by the Senate.

The Treasury Department, the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation supported these proposals in the 84th and 85th Congresses, and the Treasury Department has now recommended the bill again.

Many bank mergers have taken place over the past few years, and others are now under consideration. It is unfortunate that, because final action was not taken on either S. 3911 or the financial institutions bill, the national banking agencies have not had uniform and clear authority to regulate or control, on the basis of both banking and competitive factors, all of these mergers which involved national banks, State member banks, and State nonmember banks insured by FDIC. These bills would have given the agencies such authority.

At the present time the situation with respect to bank mergers is both complicated and confused. There are gaps in the controls exercised by the national banking agencies, and even where the power of approval is given, the standards are not clearly spelled out. Uniform regulation under clear standards would be helpful to the public, the banking authorities and the banks.

All bank mergers are subject to sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, but I understand no proceedings have ever been instituted under these sections against a bank merger or consolidation.

Bank mergers by stock acquisition are prohibted by section 7 of the Clayton Act, but, as national banks and members of the Federal Reserve System are prohibited from acquiring stock in other banks, and as this is generally the case under State laws, section 7 means little in the case of bank mergers.

The approval of the Comptroller of the Currency is required for banks (state or National) to merge into a national bank, but no specific standards are set forth in the statute to guide him in his consideration of the application.

No bank insured by FDIC may merge with an uninsured bank without obtaining the permission of FDIC; and no insured bank may merge with another insured bank without obtaining the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, the Federal Reserve Board, and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, as may be appropriate, if the capital stock or surplus of the resulting merged bank will be less than the aggregate capital stock and surplus of all the merging banks. No specific standards are set forth in the statute to control the consideration of these applications.

The approval of the Federal Reserve Board is required before a State member bank may establish a new branch. The Board is engaged in litigation to determine whether this requirement applies to a case where two banks merged, and wish to continue to operate some or all of the branches formerly operated by the two merging branches, and if so whether competitive factors may be weighed.

The bill I have introduced replaces these complicated provisions by a simple rule. Every bank insured by FDIC would have to get advance approval before it could acquire the assets of another bank by merger, consolidation, or absorption through the purchase of assets and assumption of liabilities. This consent would be obtained from the appropriate banking agency, the Comptroller of the Currency for national banks, the Federal Reserve Board for State member banks and the FDIC for State nonmember banks.

In passing on these applications, the banking agency would consider the banking factors specified in section 6 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act—the financial history and condition of the bank, the adequacy of its capital structure, its future earnings prospects, the general character of its management, the convenience and needs of the community to be served by the bank, and whether or not its corporate powers are consistent with the purposes of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act. In addition, the responsible banking authority would be specifically required to consider whether the effect of the acquisition might be to lessen competition unduly or to tend unduly to create a monopoly. The banking authority would be required to consult with each of the other banking authorities, in the interests of uniform standards, and it would be authorized to request the opinion of the Attorney General with respect to the application.

My bill differs from the proposal which has been made by the Antitrust Division of the Justice Department. They would subject bank mergers by acquisition of assets to the provisions of the Clayton Act applicable to mergers of ordinary business corporations, where unrestricted competition is the rule. Unrestricted competition, however, has not been the rule in the banking industry, for many years. The approval of a charter for a national bank by the Comptroller, the admission of a State bank to membership in the Federal Reserve System, and the admission of a State bank to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, are not matters of routine. The financial history and condition of the bank, if already existing, the general character of its management and the convenience and needs of the community to be served must all be considered. And once in business, the bank's activities are carefully regulated by many agencies—the Comptroller of the Currency, the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, and, in the case of State banks, the appropriate State bank supervisor. The Government has a vital interest in the Nation's banks as suppliers of funds, as depositories, and as fiscal agents. Commerce, industry, and private citizens have a vital interest in banks as a source of credit needed for development and growth. Depositors have a vital interest in the safety of their deposits.

All these considerations make it impossible to require unrestricted competition in the field of banking, and make it impossible to subject banks to the rules applicable to ordinary industrial and commercial concerns not subject to regulation and not vested with a public interest.

But, while unrestricted competition in the field of banking would be disastrous, I am also convinced that a measure of control, based on uniform standards involving both banking and competitive factors, is necessary. The Senate Banking and Currency Committee, for these reasons, has twice reported, and the Senate has twice passed, legislation which would provide for control over bank mergers, to be exercised by the responsible and informed banking agencies.

The Senate Banking and Currency Committee, which has jurisdiction over all proposed legislation relating to banking, will be asked to consider this proposal for a third time. I am hopeful that this time constructive legislation on this important issue will be enacted.

REGISTRATION AND PROTECTION OF TRADEMARKS

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the act to provide for the registration and protection of trademarks used in commerce, and so forth.

This is a matter which has been before the Senate Judiciary Committee. In connection with the bill, I submit, and ask to have printed in the RECORD, a short statement, which I also ask unanimous consent to have appropriately referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD, and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1063) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the registration and protection of trademarks used in commerce, to carry out the provisions of international conventions, and for other purposes," approved July 5, 1946, with respect to proceedings in the Patent Office, introduced by Mr. DIRKSEN, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The statement presented by Mr. DIRKSEN was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR DIRKSEN

I have introduced, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the registration and protection of trademarks used in commerce, to carry out the provisions of international conventions, and for other purposes," approved July 5, 1946, with respect to proceedings in the Patent Office.

The proposal, which has the approval of the trademark committee of the Patent Law Association of Chicago, Ill., amends the act providing for the registration and protection of trademarks used in commerce, to carry out the provisions of international conventions, etc., by providing that any person paying the prescribed fee may file with the Commissioner a declaration expressing his intent to use in commerce a particular mark.

It requires the declaration to contain a drawing of the mark and a specification of the goods in connection with which it is intended that such mark be used. It further directs the Commissioner, unless there is a registration or pending application for registration of the same mark, to publish in the official Gazette (a) the mark; (b) the specified goods or services; and (c) the name and address of the declarant.

The bill provides that during the 6 months period immediately following the date the Commissioner has published a mark pursuant to the foregoing, no application for the registration of such mark under the preceding provisions of this section on the part of any person, other than the person whose mark was published shall be acted upon by the Commissioner.

It permits more than one person to file a declaration with respect to a certain mark but prohibits the second and each succeeding publication of such mark from taking place until 6 months after the date of the last preceding publication of such mark, and sets the filing fee at $15.

AREA ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1959

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I also introduce, for appropriate reference, the administration bill dealing with area redevelopment and assistance to distressed areas. The legislation proposed by the administration to establish a program of Federal assistance to areas of substantial and persistent unemployment has been transmitted to the Senate by the Secretary of Commerce, with his recommendation for its enactment. I believe it will provide adequate Federal participation in local efforts to achieve the diversified economy necessary for an area to overcome long-standing difficulties.

In connection with this statement, Mr. President, which will be short, I also submit a statement explaining the purpose of the bill, and dealing with the conditions under which this proposed legislation would function. I also send forward the bill itself. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that these statements be printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks, and that the bill be appropriately referred, but first lie on the desk for some portion of the current week; and I put on notice Senators who may wish to join in sponsoring this proposed legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statements will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1064) to assist areas to develop and maintain stable and diversified economies by a program of financial and technical assistance and otherwise, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. DIRKSEN, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The statements presented by Mr. DIRKSEN are as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR DIRKSEN

Legislation proposed by the administration to establish a program of Federal assistance to areas of substantial and persistent unemployment has been transmitted to the Senate by the Secretary of Commerce with his recommendation for enactment.

I believe that this program will provide adequate Federal participation in local efforts to achieve the diversified economy necessary for an area to overcome long-standing difficulties.

As has been stated by the President in seeking such legislation, there is a recognition of a responsibility of the Federal Government to assist these areas which have not shared in periods of prosperity enjoyed by our country generally. Participation by and interest of the troubled areas and of the States in which they are located, however, provides and should continue to provide the main drive toward overcoming their difficulties by use of local resources including human resources.

Specifically, the proposal would authorize Federal loans on a second mortgage basis to help finance development of lands and facilities for industrial usage, the construction of new factory buildings, or the alteration, conversion, or enlargement of existing buildings for industrial use.

It would authorize grants in the amount of $1.5 million annually for technical assistance including studies to evaluate the needs and to develop potentialities of areas of substantial and persistent unemployment. An equal amount would also be available to assist efforts to decrease the economic vulnerability of towns predominantly dependent on one industry, small towns which could serve as centers for economic diversification of rural areas of underemployment, and rural low-income areas.

Technical assistance on the use of the labor force in areas designated under the proposal would be provided by the Secretary of Labor, and the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare would assist in the vocational training or retraining of such labor force.

Authority would be provided to allow areas of chronic labor surplus certain benefits under existing housing programs including priorities for loans for public facilities and other special considerations for industrial developments.

Fostering, promoting, and development of our Nation's industry and commerce are duties we have lodged with the Secretary of Commerce. These duties are closely related to the new program to be undertaken. The Department of Commerce presently has an Office of Area Development engaged in helping these very communities within the limits of general authority of the Department. For these reasons, the proposal would center responsibility for carrying out the proposed program in the Secretary of Commerce.

Under this proposal, with the guidance of the Secretary of Commerce, there would be focused on the problems of these communities the total coordinated capabilities of all Federal agencies which can make contributions to full use of resources of these areas.

I believe that this proposed program, including the program of Federal loans to State and local development companies which was passed by the Congress in the last session, will provide the incentive and assistance necessary to enable these areas of chronic unemployment to work out their problems and share in the general high level of prosperity of our Nation.

With respect to the adequacy of the loan fund of $50 million to do the job, there are several points that should be made:

First, it should be remembered that this bill is confined to local unemployment areas of long standing that need redevelopment and assistance. These areas are definitely limited in number and are generally well known. Other bills that purport to deal with vast rural areas of low income which become almost regional in nature require a much greater fund to be adequate to serve the needs of this much greater coverage.

A second point is that the administration bill limits the Federal participation to 35 percent of project costs. This is on the legitimate assumption that sound projects can secure 50 percent of their financing from private sources, banks, or insurance companies. The private loans up to 50 percent would have the security of a first mortgage, whereas the Federal loans up to 35 percent would be in a second position. Finally, the communities and States are asked under the terms of the bill to make a third contribution of 15 percent. Other bills which commit the Federal Government to a position of up to 65 percent obviously require double the funds.

A third point is that the administration bill does not provide loans for machinery and equipment. Loans are extended only for the factory building itself. Machinery and equipment loans in most instances would exceed the amounts necessary for the building. Other bills do commit the Federal Government to make loans for machinery and equipment unnecessarily, since special payment terms can be negotiated with manufacturers of such machinery in most instances.

Finally, it is believed that the $50 million revolving fund is adequate in the light of the experience which the State of Pennsylvania has had with a law not too dissimilar from the one which the administration here is proposing. When the experience is translated into national terms, the $50 million fund is certainly adequate to cover the first 7 or 8 years of experience under this act and probably more.

AREA ASSISTANCE LEGISLATION

Purpose: The purpose of legislative proposals in this field is the establishment of a Federal program of assistance—technical and financial—to areas of substantial and persistent unemployment.

Cost: Under the administration bill, authority would be provided for a loan program with up to $50 million outstanding at any one time. Grant programs of technical assistance, including studies, at the rate of $3 million per year, would be authorized. Our preliminary estimate is that the program in its first year would involve administrative expenditures of $1,400,000 insofar as the Department of Commerce, wherein responsibility for the program would be centered, is concerned.

S. 3683 (the Douglas bill of the 85th Cong.) which was disapproved by the President after the last session of Congress, and which presumably will provide the basis for other proposals on this subject, would provide for a $200 million limit on loans outstanding for industrial and rural redevelopment areas; $75 million annually for grants for public facilities; $4.5 million annually for technical assistance; and necessary administrative expenditures.

Based upon our appraisal of the current situation, we are convinced that the amounts requested in the administration bill are adequate to meet current needs. The relative amounts of funds authorized by the two bills are not a true measure of the relative effectiveness of the two proposals. The program is new. It faces a number of problems, such as the effective limitation on the use of Federal funds to further "industry snatching" from one community for the benefit of another. Only experience will demonstrate the funds ultimately needed.

Duration: Neither program has a fixed expiration date.

Conditions imposed on loans: Under the administration program, loans could be on a second mortgage basis and could be for terms of 25 years, and would cover up to 35 percent of the cost of purchase and development of land and facilities including construction or rehabilitation of buildings for industrial use. Interest charged would reflect cost of money to the Government, administrative expenses of the loan program, and a reasonable reserve for probable losses.

Under S. 3683, loans could also be on a second mortgage basis, could be for terms of 40 years, could include machinery and equipment, and would cover up to 65 percent of the cost. The need for these terms has not been shown. Interest rates would be at an artificially low rate—cost of money to the Government plus one-fourth of 1 percent.

It should be noted that the administration proposal would require at least 15 percent of the cost to be provided locally with security therefor to be subordinate to security for Federal loans. Under similar circumstances, S. 3683 would require 10 percent participation by a State or local agency or organization, and 5 percent of the cost would be supplied by nongovernmental sources.

Public facilities: The administration proposal would provide a first priority for loans to these areas for public facilities from the existing $100 million loan fund of the Housing and Home Finance Agency. S. 3683 would authorize $75 million annual grants for these facilities. The greater local participation which is envisioned by the administration proposal is a fundamental policy difference in the two proposals. The aim of the administration proposal is to help communities which are helping themselves.

Criteria: Differences in the criteria used for singling out areas entitled to consideration under the loan program and other benefits of the act show clearly another major difference between the bills. The criteria of the administration proposal are tailored for the sharply defined objective of helping those communities suffering from chronic economic difficulty.

Rural and other areas: Rural areas where there exist the largest number and percentage of low-income families, and a condition of substantial and persistent unemployment or underemployment would be provided a loan program of $100 million by S. 3683. Such an area would also be eligible for grants for public facilities.

Under the administration bill, all areas of the United States would be the beneficiaries of the fully coordinated cooperation of Federal agencies in promoting the most effective use of local resources, in the establishment of new industries based on local resources, and in the expansion of existing industries. Such cooperation is to be provided through technical advice and consultation and, when necessary, through the conduct of special studies.

Further, these agencies, including the Department of Agriculture, would also focus their services on the difficulties of low-income rural areas for the purpose of developing effective ways to increase their income.

Grants of $1.5 million annually for technical assistance, including studies, to decrease the economic vulnerability of towns predominantly dependent on one industry, small towns which could serve as centers for economic diversification of rural areas of underemployment, and rural low-income areas by helping them to develop manufacturing, processing, and other activities calculated to diversify and improve their economies would be authorized.

Rural low-income areas which qualify as areas of substantial and persistent unemployment would be eligible for direct loan benefits described below.

Grants for technical assistance: The administration bill would authorize grants of $1,500,000 annually for technical assistance, including studies evaluating the needs of, and developing potentialities for, economic growth to areas of substantial, persistent unemployment. These grants would be in addition to the grants to rural areas for technical assistance mentioned above.

S. 3683 would authorize a program of technical assistance to be performed by the Government with authority to contract for outside assistance.

Labor and HEW: The Departments of Labor and HEW would provide similar help in the two proposals directed toward better use of human resources and training of the labor force of the areas.

CRITERIA FOR DESIGNATING AREAS ELIGIBLE FOR LOAN PROGRAM UNDER S. 3683 (85TH CONG.)

INDUSTRIAL REDEVELOPMENT AREAS

Twelve percent of labor force unemployed during 12-month period preceding application; 9 percent during 15 months of preceding 18 months; or 6 percent during 18 months of preceding 24 months.

Also, if the Commissioner determines that causes of unemployment are not temporary in nature in an area and there has been unemployment of 15 percent during the 6 months preceding, he may designate such an area as eligible.

RURAL REDEVELOPMENT AREAS

Those rural areas within the United States where there are the largest number and percentages of low-income families and a condition of substantial and persistent unemployment. Considerations shall include: Number of low-income farm families in various rural areas of the United States, the proportion of such low-income families to the total farm families of such an area, the relationship of income levels of the families in such an area to the general levels of income in the United States, the current and prospective employment opportunities in each such area, and the availability of manpower in each such area for supplemental employment.

UNDER ADMINISTRATION BILL

(1) Rate of unemployment in the area, excluding that due primarily to temporary or seasonal factors, is currently 6 percent and has averaged at least 6 percent for the qualifying time periods specified in (2) below; and

(2) The annual average rate of unemployment in the area has been at least:

(a) Fifty percent above the national average for 4 of the preceding 5 calendar years, or

(b) Seventy-five percent above the national average for 3 of the preceding 4 calendar years, or

(c) One hundred percent above the national average for 2 of the preceding 3 calendar years; and

(3) Nonagricultural employment in the area has declined, or has shown a smaller increase than in the country as a whole, during the preceding 5 calendar years: Provided, That no area shall be excluded by the requirement of this subsection if the annual average rate of unemployment in that area for 3 of the last 4 years exceeds 8 percent.

(b) In the case of labor market areas for which appropriate historical labor force data have not been compiled, the Secretary of Labor shall certify as eligible for designation as areas of substantial and persistent unemployment those areas in which the unemployment rate and duration, based on a survey of available labor force data, generally equal or exceed the rate and duration specified above.

SURVEY TO ASSIST IN PROMOTING PRODUCTION OF CONCENTRATED IRON ORE AND STEEL

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senators YOUNG, of North Dakota, HUMPHREY, MCCARTHY, MANSFIELD, MURRAY, MUNDT, and CASE of South Dakota, I introduce for appropriate reference, a bill to direct the Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization to conduct a particular survey in order to assist in promoting the production of concentrated iron ore and steel and for other purposes.

My colleague from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] and I agree that all interested officials in the State of North Dakota on the State level, as well as the congressional delegation in Washington, have been very much interested in finding ways and means of bringing industry into the State of North Dakota. This new proposed plan, which will utilize the vast lignite fields of North Dakota, is a major step in bringing industry to the State of North Dakota and greatly strengthen the economy of the entire State, as well as the States of Montana, South Dakota, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan.

The vast low-grade iron deposits of the Mesabi Range in northern Minnesota, Montana, Wisconsin, and northern Michigan, and the billions upon billions of tons of lignite in the North Dakota, Montana, and South Dakota fields available for surface mining are certain to become of major importance to the future economy of the entire United States and at the same time meet the pressing needs of iron and steel for defense and security purposes and the huge Federal highway program, and other domestic purposes.

The search for an adequate source of suitable carbon for manufacture of glmite explosive which was proposed for use for blasting taconite rock on the iron range led to the conviction that production of char as fuel for the Minnesota, Wisconsin, northern Michigan, and Montana iron mining industries would be feasible only if it was a part of a larger industrial picture. The reduction of aluminum in North Dakota using lignite as a power source had heretofore been competitively unpracticable because of higher transportation costs.

However, this factor will be overcome when industries are located in North Dakota and South Dakota and in the iron range sections of Minnesota, Wisconsin, northern Michigan, and Montana which will provide full loads for hopper railroad cars on both east and west hauls. It is proposed that bauxite be brought from the Caribbean, up the Atlantic Ocean through the St. Lawrence Seaway to the head of the Great Lakes; thence shipped by rail to North Dakota for reduction to aluminum at the fields of low-cost lignite coal.

The back haul could be both lignite char and/or aluminum pigs. The char would be utilized in producing explosives on the iron range, and for the general fuel for the iron-mining industries.

Joint utilization of railroad cars through employment of the same rolling stock (hopper ore cars) for the movement of the combination of fuels and iron and aluminum ores visualizes a complete round trip between North Dakota and Minnesota iron mines of loaded hopper cars of approximately 1,000 miles and points in the States of Montana, South Dakota, Wisconsin, and northern Michigan.

After unloading the bauxite, the ships then would be reloaded with iron ore for shipment to steel industries at Lake Erie ports, and then reloaded with cargoes of products produced from the Great Lakes area which constitutes 42 percent of manufacturing industry of the United States of America for discharge at south Atlantic U.S. ports and Caribbean ports. After discharge of such cargoes the ships would be in the vicinity of bauxite source in the Caribbean for reloading bauxite for the Great Lakes area.

The fact that there will always be full capacity cargo loads for returning aluminum ore ships to the Caribbean provides payloads in both directions and such cargoes will be immediately available for reloading when such ore ships are available for receiving same, means low rate shipping costs for each of the cargoes.

By establishing standard hopper car trains suitable for transportation of the three commodities, the Mesabi iron ore to the head of the Great Lakes, the transportation of bauxite ores to western North Dakota and South Dakota and transportation of lignite from North Dakota and South Dakota to the Mesabi Range to Montana, and other iron ore fields in Wisconsin and northern Michigan makes possible a vast saving in the rail transportation costs of each of the three commodities.

It is further noted that the Mesabi Range iron ore deposits of low grade will be available for production in our domestic steel industries, and that means that this Nation will have available domestic iron ores in unlimited volumes for 200 years ahead for the security of United States as well as for domestic use.

Also, the production of various chemical products and char fuel from lignite coals, when established in combination with aluminum production, iron and steel industry on the Mesabi Range, will be limited only by the market at the Mesabi for lignite char.

Lignite char has about the same B.t.u. content as bituminous coal, and it is very conceivable that char for fuel at the Mesabi Range can be made available for less cost for the production of kilowatts and heat on the Mesabi than can be realized by the use of bituminous coal.

This bill has been drafted directing the Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization to conduct a survey of national significance in the defense and economy of our country, to determine ways and means of affirming and encouraging the production of concentrated ore for steel and its related products from the sources of ore and lignite fuel from the States of North Dakota, Minnesota, South Dakota, Wisconsin, and other areas contiguous to the Great Lakes. Also, to find ways and means of making Great Lakes and St. Lawrence Seaway open the entire year.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in full in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1067) to direct the Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization to conduct a particular survey in order to assist in promoting the production of concentrated iron ore and steel, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. LANGER (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the production of steels and related products are and will be of vital need to the defense and the economy of our country; and

Whereas there is an abundance of iron ore in the Mesabi Range in Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, and Montana; and

Whereas there are extensive deposits of lignite fuels in the States of North Dakota, South Dakota, and Montana which are essential for the future recovery and concentration of low-grade iron ores and further direct production of iron and steel in the States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, and Montana and for other purposes relating to the defense and economy of the country; and

Whereas the transportation facilities afforded by the Saint Lawrence Seaway and the Great Lakes, especially if available during the entire year, and the contiguous railways of the area, will promote a tremendous expansion of the facilities for industries aiding the economy and the national defense of this country; and

Whereas coordination of production and transportation facilities must be generated by effective surveys and studies tending to bring groupings of various industries in the coordination of their common problems: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization is hereby authorized and directed to conduct a survey of national significance in the defense and economy of our country to determine ways and means of affirmatively encouraging the production of concentrated iron ore for steel and its related products from the sources of ore and fuel contiguous to the Great Lakes areas, including means of making the Great Lakes and the Saint Lawrence Seaway available for transportation during the entire year. The Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization is directed to report the result of such survey to the Congress and to make such report public within ninety days after the date of enactment of this Act.

RECODIFICATION OF CHAPTER 19 OF TITLE 5 OF UNITED STATES CODE ENTITLED "ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE"

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER] and myself, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to be known as the "Code of Federal Administrative Procedure." This is the same bill that Senator BUTLER and I introduced in the 85th Congress, 2d session, as S. 4094.

This bill would at its effective date, 180 days after its enactment, supersede the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946. The 1946 act, in the drafting of which the American Bar Association played a major part, was recognized at the time as being, not the final solution of the manifold problems of procedure in administrative legislation and adjudication, and of judicial review of administrative action, but a major step toward solution, which would require reappraisal as its merits and shortcomings became known through experience.

This is one of a number of related bills prepared by the American Bar Association after long and detailed study following the report in 1955 of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government, the Second Hoover Commission, and its Task Force on Legal Services and Procedure. The present bill is particularly closely related to the Federal Administrative Practice Act, S. 932, 85th Congress, 1st session, introduced by the distinguished senior Senator from Missouri for himself and for the distinguished senior Senator from Wisconsin, which would among other things set up an independent Office of Federal Administrative Practice and provide new improved measures for the recruitment, appointment and administration of Hearing Commissioners.

It is, I think, universally recognized that the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946 has accomplished much, and all for the good. But it is equally clear that there is much still to be done before there can be that degree of public confidence in the fairness and responsibility of administrative action on which effective government in the end depends.

The present bill represents the considered and expert judgment of the American Bar Association, in the light of more than a decade of experience under the 1946 act, as to desirable changes in the text of that act. Since its provisions are so numerous and wide in coverage, I cannot commit myself in advance to support them all in detail. I am, though, convinced that the bill's purpose is vital. The widespread conferring of legislative and judicial functions on administrative agencies, justified though it be, calls for the most careful attention to the procedures by which the administrator is to exercise those functions, by which the parties affected are to be given fair opportunity to know and to make their views known, and by which the courts are to be enabled to exercise that ultimate control on which our system of government is based.

I can think of no more important matter for the earnest consideration of the Congress than the subject matter of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1070) to recodify, with certain amendments thereto, chapter 19 of title 5 of the United States Code, entitled "Administrative Procedure," introduced by Mr. ERVIN (for himself and Mr. BUTLER), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NOTICE OF HEARINGS ON CERTAIN NOMINATIONS BY COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I desire to announce that the Senate received today from the President of the United States the nominations of Mason Sears, of Massachusetts, and Benjamin Gerig, of Maryland, to be alternate representatives of the United States of America to the 13th Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations, and some 700 promotions and appointments in the Foreign Service of the United States.

Notice is given that the Committee on Foreign Relations, at the expiration of 6 days, in accordance with the committee rule, will give consideration to these nominations.

NOTICE OF HEARINGS BEFORE ANTITRUST AND MONOPOLY SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, the Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary tentatively plans to begin hearings on Tuesday, February 24, 1959, on S. 838 and S. 839. S. 838 was introduced by Senator O'MAHONEY and S. 839 was introduced on behalf of myself and Senator HENNINGS. The primary purpose of these bills is to supplement the Sherman Act and the Federal Trade Commission Act so as to prohibit automobile manufacturers from engaging in the businesses of financing and insuring automobiles purchased by consumers.

The subcommittee also tentatively plans to begin hearings on Tuesday, March 3, 1959, on S. 716 and S. 1003. S. 716 was introduced by me and S. 1003 by Senator WILEY. The purpose of these bills is to authorize the Attorney General to compel the production of documentary evidence required in civil investigations for the enforcement of the antitrust laws. I understand that Senator WILEY introduced his bill at the request of the Department of Justice. In his economic message to the Congress on January 20, the President recommended that such authority be enacted into law in order that a more effective enforcement program of the antitrust laws might be carried out by the Department of Justice.

Mr. President, the subcommittee also tentatively plans to begin hearings on S. 11 and S. 138 on March 17, 1959. S. 11 was reintroduced on behalf of myself and 24 cosponsors. S. 138 was introduced by Senator CAPEHART. S. 11 and S. 138, in similar if not identical form, have been the subject matter of considerable hearings by the Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee during the 84th and 85th Congresses. The purpose of S. 11 is to amend the Clayton Act so as to partially reverse the decision of the Supreme Court in the Standard Oil of Indiana case which was handed down in 1951. Senator CAPEHART'S bill, S. 138, would basically enact into law the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. President, by virtue of this notice, those persons or parties desiring to be heard in support of, or in opposition to, any of these pieces of legislation should make known their desire by contacting me as chairman of the Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, notified the Senate that, pursuant to the provisions of title 42, section 2251, United States Code, the Speaker had appointed Mr. THOMAS, of Texas, as a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, on the part of the House, to fill the existing vacancy thereon, vice Mr. KILDAY, of Texas, resigned.

The message also notified the Senate that, pursuant to section 712(a)(2) of the Defense Production Act of 1950, Mr. SPENCE, of Kentucky, chairman, had appointed the following members of the Banking and Currency Committee as members of the Joint Committee on Defense Production, on the part of the House: Mr. BROWN, of Georgia, Mr. PATMAN, of Texas, Mr. RAINS, of Alabama, Mr. MCDONOUGH, of California, and Mr. HIESTAND, of California.

FORTY-FIRST ANNIVERSARY OF LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement I have prepared commemorating the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian independence be printed in the RECORD following these remarks, and that following the statement there also be printed an editorial from today's New York Times entitled "Enslaved but Not Forgotten."

There being no objection, the statement and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BUSH

Forty-one years ago the freedom-loving people of Lithuania revolted and threw off the yoke of slavery at Vilna, February 16, 1918.

Two years later, following World Wa. I, a treaty of peace was signed between Lithuania and Russia, July 12, 1920.

There was great rejoicing in Lithuania for the people believed that at last they were free to govern themselves after centuries of Russian aggression and suppression.

Then came recognition as a sovereign and independent state. The United States recognized the Lithuanian Government de jure, July 28, 1922, and to this day continues to recognize the Lithuanian Government as such.

But once again freedom for Lithuania was to be an elusive dream. Despite the conclusion of a peace treaty with that nation, Russia began her insidious aggression against her small neighbor by the usual methods of threats and intimidation. Thus it was in 1940, with the aid of a puppet diet under the thumb of its Soviet neighbor, a made-in-Moscow resolution was passed incorporating Lithuania into the Soviet Union.

It is to the credit of this Nation that the United States refused to recognize this annexation and continues to recognize Lithuania as an independent state with an accredited Minister in Washington with full rights, powers, and privileges.

Recently there was a Soviet visitor to our country—Anastas Mikoyan, Deputy Premier of Soviet Russia. He traveled around our country preaching peace. Upon leaving, he issued a series of statements saying rightly that the people of the United States desired peace. But—he added that it was our President and our State Department which desired to continue the cold war despite all evidence to the contrary.

In his press interviews and on television, Mr. Mikoyan, when asked about the right of the peoples in the satellite countries to free elections to determine their own governments, begged the question or stated they have that right and were exercising it.

Has he and his Government given the people of oppressed Lithuania the right to free elections to determine their own destiny? What is the situation there today? The truth of the matter is that Lithuania is a freedom-loving country—and has been for centuries—but is now occupied by a predatory nation. Ninety-eight percent of the people of Lithuania are non-Communists and are virtual slaves without rights or freedom.

If Soviet Russia, as Mikoyan and others in the hierarchy of Russia so piously proclaim, is an ardent defender of small nations, then I ask, why is she continuing to occupy Lithuania and her neighbors as well as Poland, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Bulgaria, and Hungary whose freedom-loving people she mowed down in cold blood while this same Mikoyan was in Budapest?

It is on deeds, not words, that the judgment of the free world rests.

Because we hold that nations cannot be held in subjugation forever—because we must hold the lantern of hope aloft that the day of freedom will dawn for these suppressed peoples, I introduced on January 20 a Senate joint resolution authorizing the President to issue a proclamation designating February 16 of each year as Lithuanian Independence Day.

Until the day of liberty dawns, in what I hope is the not too distant future—I feel that such recognition will not only keep the plight of Lithuania before the world but will give encouragement to all Lithuanians to keep the flame of freedom burning in their hearts and to know that their friends of the free world have not forgotten them.

It is my hope that my resolution will convey to them that we will use every moral and legal tool at our command to give her the independence for which she longs—and which she has fought so long to preserve—that she may have her independence in fact as well as in law.

When that happy day dawns, all of us will rejoice.

ENSLAVED BUT NOT FORGOTTEN

Forty-one years ago today the little ancient nation of Lithuania proclaimed her independence of Russia. Her neighbors, Estonia and Latvia, also announced their freedom, Estonia on February 24, 1918, Latvia in November. In 1940 all three were again subjugated by Russian troops and compelled to become Soviet Socialist Republics. They have had, therefore, 22 years of freedom and 19 years of servitude.

Even while Secretary Dulles was recuperating on Saturday from his operation, a previously prepared statement over his signature was going out to the press. In this he pointed out that in 1920 Russia had pledged herself "to renounce forever all rights of sovereignty in the three countries" and that she had made a similar promise in October 1939. He speaks from his sickbed, to us and for us, to "assure the people of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia that they are not forgotten." At the same time a proclamation from Governor Rockefeller makes this Lithuanian Independence Day and calls on all of us to join in its celebration.

We do not propose to go to war for the liberation of the Baltic States. Nor do the citizens of those states, still resident there or in exile in other lands, argue for the sort of nationalism that existed between the First and Second World Wars. What they do ask for is political, religious, and cultural freedom. They are as aware as the rest of us that such freedom can exist only in a world of freedom.

In the Baltic countries the path to a better future is still dark, but it is not lost and will not be. The day of the overlords will not last forever. The time will come when the three lost little nations will be able to come out and join us.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, 41 years ago, on February 16, 1918, the Lithuanians broke off all bonds with czarist Russia and established an independent Republic.

It would have been difficult to find another nation more deserving of freedom.

The Lithuanians carved themselves a place of honor in history by setting up a mighty state in the 13th century and maintaining it for 600 years against continuous Teutonic and Slavic attacks.

One hundred and twenty years of ruthless national and religious persecution imposed by Russia in 1795 did not dampen the spirit of resistance, nor did it suppress the desire to live as free men.

The independence period, 1918 to 1940, proved again that the Lithuanians were worthy of freedom. They developed a strong economy, made great strides in education and culture, and earned respect in the international community.

A coldblooded deal between Stalin and Hitler in 1939 not only plunged the world into a terrible war, but also brought an end to the independence of many peoples. Lithuania was occupied by Red troops in flagrant violation of nonaggression treaties.

But we all share the hope that Lithuania again will be free.

It is symbolic that the Lithuanian Independence Day nearly coincides with the birthday of our 16th President, Abraham Lincoln. He was the one who stood for the freedom of all peoples. It was he who denounced Russia for crushing the revolt in Hungary in 1849.

Let me conclude my brief homage to Lithuania with Abraham Lincoln's words:

No man is good enough to govern another man without that other man's consent * * *. Those who deny freedom to others deserve it not for themselves.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, in all the annals of injustice and oppression, there is none more saddening or heart rending than the history of Lithuania.

For seven centuries, all the forces of evil aggression have combined against this little nation in an attempt to destroy it. Successive invasions by Teutonic knights, Tartars, czarist Russians, Communists, Nazis, and finally Communists again have made of Lithuanian history a series of terrible blood baths, each worse than the one before.

It has been Lithuania's special fate that invasion has invariably been accompanied by deliberate, organized programs of mass murder, extermination, and mass deportation that are unsurpassed and probably unequaled in their cruelty and severity.

All of the extremes of brutality, all of the devices of perverted minds, have been loosed against this little nation in a ceaseless attempt to destroy its national consciousness, its religion, its love of independence and freedom.

Yet, through it all, the Lithuanians have steadfastly maintained a religious faith, a national identity, and a yearning for independence that will surely be ultimately rewarded.

Through the ordeals of seven centuries, the Lithuanians have given constant testimony to the fundamental truth that man has an inborn yearning for freedom which cannot be destroyed or expunged.

This fundamental truth, will in the end spell defeat for Communist tyranny, if we keep faith with our ideals. That is the real meaning of this anniversary.

Forty-one years ago today, on February 16, 1918, the Republic of Lithuania proclaimed its independence. Two brief decades of liberty and progress followed to be tragically snuffed out by Communist treachery.

During World War II, the United States pledged, again and again, as a solemn war aim, that the independence of all peoples would be guaranteed.

We proved tragically unequal to the task of translating these guarantees into practical reality. But this failure does not end our moral responsibility to work ceaselessly toward the goal of the four freedoms for all men.

As a Member of the House, I served on the Select Committee To Investigate Communist Aggression which made an intensive study of Communist aggression in Eastern Europe. In the 17 reports of this committee, there is written the complete record of Red infamy, much of the story in direct eyewitness accounts. I wish every American could read these reports.

The Communist world is now engaged in a major campaign to make free men forget the Red atrocities of the past. Through cultural exchanges, good will ambassadors, offers of trade, and soft words, they seek to gain free world acceptance of the status quo in the world today, while they prepare for future aggression.

The passing years have dimmed the memories and stilled the consciences of many in the free world. Wearied of the cold war, anxious to reach accommodation with the Communists, many in important places have begun to urge policies that tacitly accept permanent Red domination of Lithuania and the other enslaved nations behind the Iron Curtain.

This anniversary of Lithuanian independence should remind all Americans that we cannot close the door on Lithuania's just claims to independence without betraying our solemn obligations and denying our own heritage.

I do not believe that the United States will ever abandon our moral commitment to eventual freedom for the satellite nations, and I am proud to add my voice to so many others today in pledging that we will keep faith with the forces of freedom everywhere in the world.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD this morning's New York Times editorial entitled "Enslaved but Not Forgotten."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, today we again remember Lithuanian Independence Day.

Great changes have taken place in the world since Lithuania 41 years ago found her independence—and then lost it. Today we live in an age of missiles and nuclear submarines, an age of television and synthetics. It is an age that bears little resemblance to the world of yesterday. Yet one element has not changed. One element has remained fresh and unspoiled—man's urge for freedom. Today the people of Lithuania and of other captive countries are possessed of the same emotion as that which drove a small lonely group from the familiar rocks of England to find freedom on a strange rock off the coast of Massachusetts.

My colleagues and I are today joining many others in this country in expressions of sympathy and esteem for the men and women of Lithuania who have never accepted their subservient state. I hope that these expressions are not mere platitudes. I hope that they are manifestations of a genuine concern and interest, and that neither political nor diplomatic expediency will cause us to waver in coming to the aid of the people of Lithuania in their pursuit of freedom. If we should hesitate, let us remember William Allen White's words:

> Wherever a free man is in chains, we are threatened also. Whoever is fighting for liberty is defending America.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, for and on behalf of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL], I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement on Lithuanian independence.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BEALL

Today, February 16, we commemorate the 41st anniversary of the independence of the gallant nation of Lithuania.

The opportunity for Lithuania to enjoy an independent and free status within the family of nations was unfortunately limited to a short span of only two decades. In 1940, the Russians annexed Lithuania into the U.S.S.R., as part of the Soviet pattern which followed immediately after World War II. Lithuania was a victim of the cold war.

During its tragically short period of independence, Lithuania held a respected position among the free nations of the world.

Since 1940, when they were annexed, the Lithuanian people have lived a life of horror. Although Lithuania seems sealed behind the Iron Curtain, yet some news filters through. Throughout this desperate period, they have held fast to their ideals. Resistance groups have bravely operated under the gravest hazards. Their resistance has been an inspiration to freedom-loving men and women everywhere.

In this country, Americans of Lithuanian descent have kept the torch of liberty burning. Lithuanian Americans are gravely concerned over the fate of their kin in the old country. These, our friends and neighbors, are grateful for our friendship for their people. They are grateful for our never having recognized the annexation of Lithuania into the Soviet Union. They are grateful for the Voice of America broadcasts to Lithuania in the Lithuanian language.

I think it is fitting, on the anniversary of the declaration of Lithuanian independence, that we in America once again declare our full support for the Lithuanian people in their fight for freedom.

We can never rest until freedom is restored to all people now living in Communist captivity.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, today marks the 41st anniversary of the restoration of independence of Lithuania. It is entirely appropriate to recall the progress made by the peoples of Lithuania in all spheres of endeavor during the years of restored independence from 1918 to 1940, when the brave Lithuanians were forcibly incorporated into the Soviet Union.

Lithuania has contributed since the 11th century to the culture, science, and welfare of European civilization. Her poets, writers, statesmen, and scientists developed a national culture, and its citizenry cherished the traditions of liberty and scholastic learning.

Unfortunately, as we all know, these people live today behind an Iron Curtain of fear and oppression. Few Lithuanians are permitted by their Soviet masters to leave the country, and no visitors from the Western World are permitted to enter this Baltic State.

Yet, we know that the spirit of freedom and liberty still breathes in the hearts of all Lithuanians. The illustrious Lithuanian poet, Maironis—1862 to 1932—aroused the nation with his unmatched verses and inspired all Lithuanians with the love of their country, its language, and its people. He preached, through verse, the gospel of national resurrection, and even today his words continue to be a source of spiritual strength, a battle cry, and a promise of ultimate triumph.

Although Lithuanians are forbidden on this 41st anniversary to sing their national anthem, we are assured that Lithuanians everywhere today will repeat these words of consolation and strength written by Maironis:

> Protect, O Almighty, our beautiful homeland,
> The soil where we labor, where our fathers rest.
> Thy fatherly mercy is boundless and lasting;
> Hear us, Thine own children, long ages oppressed.
> Forsake not our land, All Highest, while the fury rages;
> For Thou art our hope and vision, now and through the ages.

All Americans, not just the Lithuanian Americans, share, I am sure, these sentiments and look forward to the time when Lithuania will, again, take its rightful place with the free nations of the world.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, nearly 19 years have passed since the barbarian hordes of Soviet Russia swept through Lithuania, reducing that small but significant land of freedom to a slave state incorporated in the Communist empire.

Today, however, we commemorate a happier anniversary in the history of Lithuania. For it was 41 years ago today that Lithuania proclaimed her independence.

It is well that we commemorate this event. It is fitting that we recall Lithuania's days of liberty. For the spirit of freedom, the love of liberty, the conviction that Lithuania shall one day be free once more lives on in the hearts of the Lithuanian people today just as it lived through more than a century of Czarist oppression.

Let us remember that Lithuania became a free land four centuries before America was even discovered. That freedom was lost in 1795, only to be regained in 1918. The same Russian imperialism that enslaved Lithuania before holds her in thrall today. The name of the oppressor's system of government is different—but the oppression is just the same, or worse.

Through 123 years of czarist rule, suffering all sorts of hardship, the brave Lithuanian people passed on from generation to generation their national traditions, their love of liberty, their ideal of national freedom and independence. Today's generations are no less steadfast in their determination that Lithuania shall once again know freedom.

No one can tell, precisely, when the Communist colossus will begin to disintegrate—and all captive nations including Lithuania shall once again have the opportunity to breathe free air. But this we do know—that communism contains the seeds of its own destruction. For men are not born to bow to oppression; to accept terror and dictation as their lot in life. Men are born to stand erect; to rule their own destinies.

And sooner or later, whoever stands in the way of humanity's realization of this birthright, must and will go down.

Just in the past few weeks, we have had two interesting examples of how cravenly the supposedly unconquerable lords of the Kremlin fear the truth.

Nikita Khrushchev talked with an American Senator, at length, and at one point made some indiscreetly critical remarks about his partners in international crime, the Communist overlords of China. The Senator, who had taken careful notes, reported what Khrushchev had said—and Khrushchev brazenly denounced the Senator as a liar. All the world knows, of course, who the real liar is.

And then Anastas Mikoyan, Khrushchev's second in command, blandly declared during his visit to this country that the crash of an American airplane in Soviet Armenia was merely a routine aircraft accident. Shortly thereafter, we released tape recordings of the radio conversations between Soviet fighter pilots which proved beyond a doubt that this unarmed American plane, which had wandered off course, had been deliberately shot down in as brutal a murder as you will find anywhere in the record of Soviet infamy.

Now, of course, Moscow is denouncing these tape recordings as fakes, and claiming that we are liars. But all the world knows full well who the liars are.

No nation which must resort to falsehood as an instrument of high policy, that must enslave people in order to control them, that feels impelled to use mass murder can possibly survive. The history of tyrants is written in blood, in infamy and flames, and always, in the end, in self-destruction.

All over the world, at Quemoy, in Lebanon, in Jordan, and on many other fronts, the Communists have been learning that the days they could overrun and trample other peoples have long since passed. American policies of firmness and strength, American cooperation with her allies, stand as a bulwark that has checked the tide of Communist expansion. Slowly now, but someday soon more quickly, we will see the tide of communism beginning to recede.

Communist political strength in Italy and France, for example, has faded to a shadow of its former menace. Guatemala has been freed of the Communist yoke. Unrest behind the Iron Curtain, notably in Poland, Hungary, and East Germany, show how implacably the Communists everywhere are detested.

So in commemorating today the anniversary of Lithuania's independence, we engage in no futile exercise, no pointless nostalgia. Rather, we look confidently to the brighter future that must come to all brave people who remain steadfast to the principles of the brotherhood of man under the fatherhood of God.

I glory in the fact that the United States has never recognized the illegal seizure of the Baltic States by the Soviet Union. Thus, as we join in this observance of the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian independence, let us remind the world that this great Nation continues to regard Lithuania, Estonia, and Latvia as sovereign nations, looking to the day when they will again be as independent in fact as they are today in the hearts of their peoples.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, today is the 41st anniversary of the independence gained by the people of Lithuania in 1918 after more than a century of struggle. American citizens contributed to that struggle and our Government promptly recognized Lithuania as a sovereign nation. The world watched with admiration for the next 22 years at the transformation which occurred as these people emerged from the conditions which years of tyranny had forced upon them.

But this little land was in the way of the German and Russian juggernauts during World War II and by 1944 a Russian reign of terror forced Lithuania into the Soviet Union. Then these war-ravaged people were subjected to purges, deportations, and forced labor of typical Communist savagery.

Commemorative occasions like this one serve to call attention again to the fact that the United States does not recognize the seizure of Lithuania by the Soviet Union and has no intention of changing its position about this act of tyranny. Our statements in the Congress are a reaffirmation of this Nation's desire eventually to see all captive lands of the Communist bloc free to choose their own forms of government. Let us hope that our words find their way back to the captive peoples and give them heart to continue their never-ending battle to regain their national dignity and personal freedoms.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, today is the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian Independence Day.

On this occasion it is fitting that we who are blessed with the heritage of freedom pause for a few moments to consider the present plight of 3 million Lithuanians now behind the Iron Curtain, and to express our fervent hope that one day Lithuanians and other suppressed peoples may rejoin the free nations of the world.

Surely, few nations have suffered so terribly at the hands of oppressors. Tragically, Lithuania had only a period of 20 or so years of freedom. Partly with American assistance, Lithuanian patriots declared their national independence from czarist Russia in 1918. During the years between the two World Wars the young nation grew and flourished. Its ties with the United States were close. Then, in the dark days of World War II, Lithuania, like the other Baltic States, became the helpless victim first of Nazi and finally of Soviet occupation.

The United States does not recognize the forcible incorporation of Lithuania and the other Baltic States into the Soviet Union. By this policy, we express through diplomatic channels our indignation that the dream of freedom of a whole nation should be snuffed out by a ruthless conqueror.

Because the human channels between this country and Lithuania are blocked by rigid censorship, we can only hope that on this day the messages of the free world will somehow reach the captive Lithuanian people.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, the present situation in Lithuania is not only of grave concern to Lithuanian Americans, but to all Americans, for the country whose independence was reestablished on February 16, 1918, is now behind the Iron Curtain, with travel between Lithuania and the United States sharply restricted and communication difficult.

The Lithuanian people have great cause to be proud of their nation and have cause to be proud of the indomitable Lithuanian spirit still going forward today under foreign domination. Lithuanians and Americans look forward to the day when that nation will take her place in the family of independent, freedom-loving nations. The prayers in the U.S. Senate today will be echoed throughout the free world and silently felt by those who are not free to voice their prayers. May they be granted that freedom once again.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement which I have issued commemorating the 41st anniversary of Lithuanian independence, proclaimed on February 16, 1918, after her people had endured terrible suffering for many generations.

I believe that we, as American citizens and as U.S. Senators, should reflect upon the plight of the Lithuanian people today, once again suffering under the heavy hand of an aggressor—Russia.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BRIDGES

Forty-one years ago on February 16, 1918, there was great rejoicing in Lithuania. After centuries of oppression, invasion, and cruel tortures of minds and bodies, the peoples of Lithuania proclaimed their freedom.

Acquiring statehood in 1200 A.D., Lithuania's historical record was one of individual liberty, of culture, of freedom of religion, and of the press. These freedoms and culture first came under the Nazi heel of oppression and then were followed by Russian domination. Despite all this, the flame of liberty never flickered in the hearts and ideals of the Lithuanian people.

Lithuania, during the Middle Ages, was a powerful nation. She turned back the warring Germans, Mongols, and Tartars successfully. Finally, in 1795, she lost her freedom to Czarist Russia and from that date to 1918 she constantly defended herself against Russia and Germany in an effort to regain her freedom.

When that day of glory came, Lithuanians everywhere thought that the terrible yoke of slavery had been removed forever. On that February day in 1918 the United States, Russia, Germany, and other nations recognized Lithuania. The Russians gave up all claims on her.

The few short years of her liberty once more gave to the world her age-old culture and the fruits of her industry. No one dreamed that the flame so recently rekindled would once more be extinguished by the treacherous act of Soviet Russia.

The occupation of Lithuania by Red Russia was in direct violation of the treaty of 1926—in direct violation of the peace pact, the nonaggression pact, and the mutual-assistance pact with Russia which guaranteed Lithuanian independence—of Russian noninterference in the domestic, social, and economic order of that country. That treaty was never disavowed and legally it is still in force between Lithuania and Soviet Russia.

As we have since found out, treaties and pacts mean nothing to Communist Russia and by the violation of this treaty the free world knows that there is vain hope of a peaceful coexistence with Soviet Russia for any state which is helpless against her aggressions.

It is only one more example of the continuous disregard of Red Russia's solemn international commitments and agreements. Not only Lithuania, but all the small Baltic States which concluded such treaties with the Soviet Union have now been forcibly incorporated into Red Russia.

It is to the everlasting credit of all the free nations as well as our own United States that this forcible incorporation has never been recognized. Instead this aggressive act has been denounced for what it is—a brutal taking over of smaller, more helpless nations in direct disregard for international law and the commitments of Soviet Russia itself.

Since the illegal and tyrannical incorporation of a once free State has taken place, what are the conditions? Today, in Lithuania hundreds of thousands of Lithuanian men, women, and children have been annihilated or deported under the guise of volunteer labor to Soviet Russia to build Soviet industries. Few Lithuanians are permitted to leave their country except to be deported to Soviet slave-labor camps. Visitors are not allowed in to see the appalling conditions of this once free nation.

That those Lithuanians left in that unhappy country—only half of the 3 million population before annexation—may know that they are not forgotten, the Voice of America broadcasts messages to them in their own language.

At every opportunity, this Nation exposes the real motives behind any Soviet so-called peace offensive, for by the exposure of such actions as those they have taken against Lithuania and other countries with whom they had solemn treaties and pacts under international law, the true face of Russia is revealed.

Freedom cannot always be repressed. History illustrates that tyranny contains the seeds of its own destruction.

I join my prayers and hopes to those Lithuanians whose cultural attainments, whose energies and skills have added so much to the richness of our own Nation, that the dawn of a new day of liberty and justice for their captive country and peoples will not be long in coming—that Lithuania will once more take her proud place in the family of free nations.

THE COMING CRISIS IN GERMANY

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, last Thursday I addressed the Senate on the coming crisis in Germany. The remarks precipitated a considerable amount of editorial and other comment in the press.

I am grateful for the reactions, Mr. President, whether they express agreement with my observations, as some do, or disagreement, as do others. As I noted in my speech last Thursday, "What I suggest may not be valid in the light of the greater understanding of others. It is one Senator's views based on what he has read, what he has heard, what he has tried to reason. It is, in short, the course which suggests itself to me on the basis of the understanding which I have been able to draw out of the confusion and complexity of the German situation. I can be wrong and I stand ready to accept a better illumination of the problem through discussion and debate in the Senate."

The flood of comment on my remarks Mr. President, persuades me that the need for the remarks was very real. What matters most is not whether what I said is approved or disapproved in whole or in part. What matters most is that there be a full discussion of this situation, which, obviously, contains within it the seeds of a world-shattering war.

We have needed this discussion, which is now beginning to gather momentum. We have needed the outspoken thought—the deepest thought—of American citizens on this vital issue. We have needed it for a long time. The hour is already late. If my remarks have helped to pull the plug which has kept this thought bottled for too long then they will have served their purpose.

That, may I say, was the sole objective of my remarks. I regret that, in some quarters, the nine points which I enumerated have been labeled a "program" or a "plan" for Germany. I, myself, described these points as my personal view of the essentials of a sound Western policy for the coming crisis in Germany. Between the essentials of a policy and the policy itself there is a large area of detail which must be filled in the light of the actual problems involved in seeking solutions. This is the area of give and take, of mutual concessions.

Believe me, Mr. President, I do not underestimate the enormous task of those who must carry on these negotiations with the Communists. It seems to me certain, however, that the chances for the success of these negotiations will be enhanced if we have clearly in mind, before they begin, what is, and what is not, essential to the nation and to the survival and strengthening of freedom in the coming crisis.

Let me say again, most of the raw material, the basic source for my remarks, is to be found in the daily press which I am in the habit of reading. I have in my hand, Mr. President, various extracts from the press, as well as a sampling of editorial opinion, both favorable and unfavorable, on my speech of last Thursday. I have arranged these extracts to coincide with the nine essentials of a sound Western policy on Germany which I listed in my remarks last Thursday. I ask unanimous consent that these press extracts be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the extracts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE BERLIN MANEUVERS

(By Walter Lippmann)

The most likely explanation of what the Soviet government is up to in Berlin is, it seems to me, to make the West Germans more willing to deal with the East Germans. The fact of the matter is, of course, that the two sets of Germans are already negotiating at what is called the technical level, as the trade agreement announced on Friday reminds us. The Soviet government's policy calls for a broadening of these negotiations with a view, eventually, to a political agreement for a limited reunification of the two German states.

When I was in Moscow in October I had a talk with the Foreign Minister, Mr. Gromyko, and when we got to the German question, I asked him what was the Soviet view of how the Germans could be reunited. Without hesitation he replied that this could be done only by a "confederation"—he was speaking English—in which each of the two German states could retain its own social institutions. Like Mr. Khrushchev, whom I had seen the day before, Mr. Gromyko maintained that German reunification by confederation would have to be brought about by negotiation between the two Germanys.

The advocacy in Moscow of a German confederation seemed to me very significant in view of the fact that last March, when I was in Bonn, I had heard the same thing in so many and in such high quarters. The State Department, to be sure, continues to repeat the old official formula that Germany should be reunited by free elections in which, of course, the Communist regime would be demolished and East Germany would be absorbed into the West German state. But I doubt whether there are many responsible men in West Germany who would want Germany to be reunited in this way, even supposing that the Russians would permit it.

For the two Germanys have developed very differently and the attempt to integrate them would now be enormously difficult. It would be a heavy burden for the West Germans and very probably there would be considerable resistance to it in East Germany. There are other reasons why few responsible West Germans wish to have integration in a unified state. For integration would change radically the balance of religious forces and of the political parties.

Seen realistically, and not through the fumes of the official formula, the alternatives are, on the one hand, the formation of some kind of dual state and, on the other hand, the continuing partition of the German nation.

I read the news of the Berlin maneuvers against this background. Mr. Khrushchev, who is nobody's fool, is certainly aware that there is a strong and growing sentiment in West Germany in favor of expanded negotiations with East Germany. There is already a lot more talk among the two sets of Germans than the official policy of non-recognition contemplates, and there is no doubt at all that there would be still more talking, were it not for the respect and the fear in which Dr. Adenauer is held.

So the Soviet idea of negotiations leading to conferedation is one to which the West Germans are by no means unreceptive. When Dr. Adenauer leaves the scene, the idea has an excellent chance to become a live issue. Mr. Khrushchev is one who likes to ride the waves of the future.

There is, of course, no way of telling what will be the immediate course of the maneuver in Berlin. But it would be surprising indeed if the Soviet Government, though it withdrew its own forces, did not keep the East German Government under strict control. For it is committed to defend the East German Government if it is attacked, and that makes it reasonably certain that Moscow will restrain the East Germans from doing things which might provoke an attack. There is no reason at all to suppose that Moscow thinks that on the German question the United States is a "paper tiger."

I do not think, therefore, that the Soviet objective is to blockade us and force us out of West Berlin. They know that would mean war. Their objective, I believe, is to demonstrate to the West Germans in particular that the Soviet Government has, and that the Western allies do not have, a realistic and reasonable solution of the German question.

You cannot, the old saying goes, beat a horse with no horse. The Soviet idea of confederation is a horse, perhaps a poor horse, but unmistakably a horse on which a growing number in both Germanys would be willing to place their bets.

But our idea of free elections to be followed by the integration of East Germany into the West German state is no horse at all. For one thing, the Russians will not agree to free elections. For another, the West Germans do not want integration. And very probably, moreover, a very large number of East Germans, who are socialists though not Communists, also do not want integration and would fight against it.

Lacking a policy of our own for the unification of Germany, we have become hysterically attached to the status quo. It often looks as if we were not quite sure of the distinction between hardening of the will and hardening of the arteries.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Dec. 1, 1958]

THE BERLIN TRAP

The latest Kremlin proposal on Berlin, though doubtless intended to confuse the Western enemy, is actually a transparent trap which the Western Powers are most unlikely to fall into.

Originally the Russians said they were going to turn over their control rights in Berlin to the East Germans, and they implied they were going to do it immediately. Now they say they won't do it for 6 months, and if the Western Powers will just be reasonable everything can be worked out amicably.

By being reasonable the Soviet mean the West should agree to pull out of the city and make West Berlin a free city, its freedom guaranteed by the Soviet puppet state of East Germany plus, perhaps, United Nations observers. In other words, they are merely asking the West to abandon Berlin to the Communists, and the West is not about to buy that.

But maybe it would be useful to try to explain why American, British, and French firmness—refusal to be driven out of Berlin by pretext or force—is the only possible policy in this situation.

This newspaper questioned the U.S. position regarding the other two recent international crises, Lebanon and Quemoy. Lebanon affords no parallel with Berlin, because, among other things, it involved no confrontation of American and Communist troops. Quemoy, however, might seem an almost exact parallel—like Berlin an outpost in a Communist-dominated area, and a place where American and Communist forces could clash. The Communists themselves make the analogy.

And it is true that if the Chinese Communists had actually tried to invade Quemoy, instead of just shelling it, the United States probably would have had to help the Nationalists repel the invasion. Our point, though, was that it was dubious strategy for the United States to become so deeply committed to a purely peripheral position of no value to the defense of Formosa, and we questioned whether such a place was worth a major war. It would have been a different matter if Formosa itself were under attack.

That, we think, is the big difference between Quemoy and Berlin. Berlin is not peripheral. It is the very heart and focus of the Western position in Europe. Without doubt the United States and its allies were foolish not to have taken Berlin before the Russians could get there in World War II, foolish also ever to have assumed that the city could be run on the basis of cooperation with the Soviets. But all that milk was spilled long ago.

To abandon Berlin now would be to crumble the moral foundations of Western policy, with serious practical consequences for West Germany and West Europe. If the West were not to stand in Berlin, the very microcosm of the cold war, then it is indeed hard to see where it should stand or why we are spending $40 billion a year on the Pentagon.

Moreover, it is possible that firmness has already paid a dividend. Difficult though it is to interpret Soviet behavior, the Russians have at least put off a showdown for half a year, and that has the earmarks of retreat. The West can use that time to good advantage. It can expose the fraud of the Soviet proposal on Berlin and it can also demand that the Russians agree to the unification of Germany through free elections in both parts of the divided nation. Even though nothing is likely to come of that demand, its repetition could serve to make the Kremlin uncomfortable.

Then if the Soviets resort to force come next June, the West will have to stand up to that too. It is more probable, though, that firmness will pay off again, and that the Soviets will not choose to start a world war that soon.

In any case, we can be thankful that the Berlin issue is not smudged with doubts as were Lebanon and Quemoy. This time the issue is as clear as it is basic.

ON SEIZING THE INITIATIVE

(By Walter Lippmann)

At this point in the NATO Conference in Paris there is a deadlock between Russia and the Allies on all aspects of the German question. We refuse to discuss Berlin except as part of a discussion of the two Germanys. Khrushchev insists that we should discuss Berlin but not the two Germanys. Only the two Germanys, he says, can discuss the future of Germany. Everybody on both sides is standing firm. But, as things are now, the initiative in the next moves is in Khrushchev's hands. It is the loss of the initiative which we should take very seriously.

For having the initiative, he is able to maneuver, making all sorts of small but resounding moves, none of them important enough to justify a forcible reply by the West. Suppose, for example, that he begins by ending the Soviet military occupation of East Berlin. It will be impossible for the West to demand that the Red army reoccupy East Berlin. We cannot be in the position of insisting that the Red army occupy some territory from which it is willing to withdraw. Suppose Khrushchev turns over his powers to the East German Government, and we find that as our trucks arrive at the check points, there is waiting for us there, instead of a Soviet official, an East German official to look at the documents and to stamp them so that the trucks can proceed. Just as we cannot say to the Russians that they must keep their army in Berlin, so we cannot say that we will not allow our papers to be stamped by an East German official, if he is doing nothing to interfere with our free access to West Berlin.

Because the Russians have the initiative, they can use cat-and-mouse tactics at Berlin, and, without any overt act of violence, they can confuse and weaken the whole position of the West.

The Adenauer-Dulles policy is purely defensive, and in a diplomatic struggle as in warfare itself, a defensive strategy without the prospect of a breakout, is demoralizing.

What is more, the policy of standing pat on the German question—which is in fact the policy of Dr. Adenauer and Mr. Dulles—is very dangerous. For there is the ever-present possibility of disorder and uprising in East Germany, and a high probability that the West German forces would then be sucked in, bringing NATO and the Soviet Union to an open clash.

I think it likely that the fear of such a crisis in Germany is the main, not the only, reason why Khrushchev has posed the Berlin problem at this time, that is to say before all the problems of West German rearmament have been definitely settled. It is true, as so many say, that West Berlin presents an annoying contrast to East Berlin. It is also true that this contrast might help to provoke the kind of uprising in East Germany which might be uncontrollable.

We in the West have an interest in maintaining our presence in West Berlin. On the ground of our honorable commitments, on the ground of our political interests, on the ground of general European security, we have to maintain our presence in Berlin in order to make sure that Berlin becomes again the capital of a reunited Germany. But we have an interest, also, in getting a settlement of the whole German question before there is in East Germany a popular outbreak which could lead to a great war.

To protect these interests we need to regain the initiative, and instead of reacting to Khrushchev's actions we need to compel him to react to ours. There is a way to do this. But it involves, as any bold forward strategy does, risks. The initiative can be regained by challenging Khrushchev to show that he will in fact permit the two German governments to negotiate a plan of German reunification. He is always saying that this is what he wants. But is he prepared to go through with it, if, instead of rejecting his offer, we took him up on it?

What are the risks of such a move? Perhaps the greatest risk, which may for the time being be too great a risk, is that it would damage severely Dr. Adenauer's prestige in Germany. He has been ardent in opposition to the idea of a negotiation by the two Germanys. But just under the surface, the idea has wide support in West Germany, even in his own party, even in his own government. Yet he is almost certain to resist the idea to the end, and the United States is too deeply committed to force such a change of policy on the grand old man.

Nevertheless, if there is any other way of dealing with the German question, which includes Berlin, I wish somebody in authority would say what it is. Everybody knows that the two Germanys cannot now be integrated by the old formula of free elections, not only because the Kremlin will not permit it but also because neither of the two Germanys is willing to accept the troubles which integration would now cause.

There is reason to doubt whether Russia, if it were put up to her, would in fact agree. If Russia does not agree, we would at least have the initiative and the preponderant moral influence in central Europe. If she did agree, there is no reason to suppose that the West Germans, with their greater numbers and greater wealth and power, are incapable of negotiating successfully with the East Germans.

[From the New York Times, Dec. 3, 1958]

BERLIN: A WESTERN PROGRAM

The Soviet threat to drive the Western troops out of Berlin presents the Western powers not only with a challenge but also with an opportunity.

The challenge has been promptly rejected. The Soviets are on notice that the Western powers will stand on their rights and honor their commitments. These commitments call for the defense of free Berlin.

But the rejection of the challenge is not enough. Berlin is only part of a much larger problem, called Germany, and the German problem itself involves not only German reunification but also European security, armament control and the security of the Western World. The "close link" between these interdependent problems was readily acknowledged at the Geneva summit meeting meeting and no proposal for a solution in Berlin can ignore it.

It is in this respect that the Western Powers now have an opportunity to take the initiative by working out and presenting a solution that will commend itself to the decent opinion of mankind. The West has of course, already done much along this line, but usually only in general principles or piecemeal, which made it easier for the Soviets to reject the Western proposals. What is needed is a broad, comprehensive and fairly detailed program covering all the related fields, a program which will tie the loose ends together and present a concrete working and negotiating basis, even to the point of draft treaties.

Such a program must, of course, meet two essential conditions. It must be in accord with the principles of freedom which are incorporated in the United Nations Charter. It must also be agreed upon by all the Western Powers, which are allied but do not always see eye to eye on all things. That is a formidable task. But the task should not be beyond Western statesmanship, and the rise of West Germany as a new postwar factor in the European balance of power might well permit a new approach to the problem.

UNITED STATES HAS 21 SOLUTIONS FOR BERLIN CRISIS

(By John P. Leacacos)

WASHINGTON, January 24—Under the spur of the recent visit of Soviet Vice Premier Anastas I. Mikoyan, the U.S. State Department has come up with at least 21 variations for a Berlin solution, a highly placed source told the Plain Dealer today.

The American theoretical alternatives will be thrown into a pot with French, British, and West German ideas as the Western allies start serious preparations for eventual negotiations with the Soviets. There also will be suggestions from the other 11 NATO members.

The practical outlook—with emphasis on the "practical"—for the working diplomats is as follows:

First, what can be done on a new status for West Berlin or for all Berlin, depending on how much "give" the Russians show across the conference table.

The irreducible United States points are a truly independent status for the city and guaranteed access of supply.

All the allies are agreed on the need to talk to the Soviets. The question is: How?

Even the West Germans, always fearful that something may be done behind their backs. appear to agree that the West must move off dead center and show, if nothing else, a new presentation on the problem of Berlin and German unification.

Second, what to do if the Soviets stay tough and do turn over their functions and responsibilities to East Germany.

Then, there would frankly be hell to pay. The allies are widely divided. Indeed, there is no firm plan among any of the Big Three (plus Bonn) on what to do if the Russians call the Western hand.

The Americans alone are determined not to quit Berlin except in a legitimate deal. The British are cautious and think above all of their coming election and a victory for the Macmillan government.

The French are simply waiting till Gen. Charles de Gaulle makes up his mind as to the historic thing to say.

The United States and Britain fear de Gaulle may gang up with the Germans for a special solution. De Gaulle wants intimate German participation in expansion of the French African economy; in short, he offers Germany colonies in Africa which she lost in World War I.

GERMANS FACE FACTS

The Germans realize they cannot stay rigid forever. They must help originate new proposals for the fate of what, after all, is their own country. The trick is to maintain postwar Germany's Western orientation. This is what Chancellor Adenauer is most inflexible about.

But Adenauer, as he advances into the eighties, is a source of deep anxiety to the Americans. Confidential reports say he can work only 2 hours a day at his urgent tasks. Skepticism grows as to what influences may surround him. Some suspect that German egos may, in the end, be won over by Russian wooing to creat a combine that could dominate the world.

In the State Department, differences of opinion exist on the middle level of technical experts. No consensus of top staff recommendations has been reached, Secretary of State Dulles has given no one a tipoff as to what he really thinks.

CHANCES LOOK SLIM

What Dulles tells ambassadors who call on him is this:

The West will have to talk to the Russians. But there is very little "hard data" to make a deal within Europe. Yet an attempt will have to be made.

The room for maneuver is over Germany and Eastern Europe.

Maybe not a permanent German solution, but perhaps interim steps. Take confederation, the Soviet notion, for instance.

Some common denominator has to underlie any joining of East and West Germany, common currency, army, commerce, or foreign policy. What should it be—and for how long?

Though some U.S. diplomats veer from the prospect of plunging into debate over details with the Soviets, a growing body of senior opinion today says that a grassroots Missouri-type of mule trading is inevitable.

WHAT PRICE TO PAY?

Westerners also tend to leave the issue of Eastern Europe alone because of the known intransigent Soviet stand. But the Russians by open implication always bring it up, as in the Rapacki plan for denuclearizing and/or demilitarizing all central Europe. To the Moscow Reds, Germany and Eastern Europe are always one strategic package.

In the end, the issue boils down to this, as one eminent diplomat expressed it:

"We have a strength in our hand in West Germany. The Russians have a weakness on their hands in Eastern Europe. Giving in for a demilitarized Germany is too high a price to pay for a liberated and neutral Eastern Europe."

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Feb. 10, 1959]

BERLIN: CONCESSIONS MUST MATCH

So far as public statements can go, the result of Secretary Dulles' trip to Europe seems to be agreement on a proposition which should have been obvious—but which in practice needed serious emphasis.

This is the point stressed by Chancellor Adenauer that on the questions of Berlin or the future of Germany there can be no concessions by the West without corresponding concessions by the Soviet Union.

Put the other way around, this means that the Western Powers are willing to negotiate but that they refuse simply to cave in where the security of Berlin is concerned. The visit of Mayor Willy Brandt of West Berlin to the United States gives Americans a fresh sense of the importance of keeping alive communications with that redoubt behind the Iron Curtain. He has pointed out graphically how the Communist proposal for a "free" city would "free" it of its freedom.

Moscow proposes to turn over to a Communist puppet government the Soviet functions in control of transport in East Germany. If the West is to assent to this modification of postwar agreements there should at least be guarantees of corridors the East German regime will respect. Indeed, if Britain, France, the United States, and West Germany are to deal to this extent with the pseudo-government in East Berlin, it should be only to obtain resultant gains for freedom of travel and trade through all East Germany.

The old confrontation of positions between East and West over German reunification may well end again in deadlock even if there are negotiations over Berlin. Moscow insists on confederation of unlikes in the East and West German Governments, which would be a sellout of self-determination from the Western point of view. And Moscow has not come up with any substitute for the Western formula of free elections—which it dare not accept.

If discussions in a four power East-West conference should extend to reduction of military establishments in central Europe, the rule of two-way rather than one-sided concessions should certainly apply. Soviet spokesmen repeatedly advocate that Germany should be demilitarized and possibly placed under enforced neutrality.

Germans themselves have a right to a voice in matters of their own military and foreign policy. But it is possible to assume that West Germany would be willing at least to renounce nuclear arms in return for denuclearization of a corresponding area east of the Elbe River line. To be comparable in population and industrial potential the Soviet-bloc area in such an atomic ban should include not only East Germany but also Poland, Czechoslovakia, and possibly Hungary.

These are enough examples to illustrate the meaning and importance of two-way rather than one-way concessions. A further word of warning is in order, however.

Even if bargaining should go so far as to encompass a drawback of ground troops from a central European buffer region, the free world should not infer a relaxation of tensions that would permit them safely to relax their military preparedness. The rocket-rattling speeches of Premier Khrushchev and Marshal Malinovsky at the recent party congress in Moscow make it abundantly clear that expansion is still a tenet of communism.

WEST READIES REPLY TO SOVIETS—"FLEXIBILITY" SPELLED OUT

(By Neal Stanford)

WASHINGTON.—While the West's position on Berlin, Germany, and European security are "flexible" this term must be spelled out carefully.

Evidences of flexibility are, in fact, more important than they first seem.

By agreeing to have Poland and Czechoslovakia join in certain talks the West recognizes the Soviet claim to parity in East-West negotiations.

By agreeing to East Germany's presence at any talks having to do with Germany (along, of course, with West Germany's presence) the West gives a certain de facto recognition to that Soviet satellite.

RESPONSIBILITY SPELLED OUT

By agreeing to discuss anything on these issues that the Soviets wish to raise (assuming, of course, reciprocity), the West agrees to give serious consideration to the Soviet-backed Polish Rapacki Plan for a nuclear-free zone in Europe and various schemes for thinning out forces in that area.

It is the West's position that Berlin and Germany's future is only the responsibility of the Big Four—and of course Germany itself.

Thus if a Big Four foreign ministers' meeting were to be arranged sometime in late April or May there would be East-West parity when talks centered on European security but the old 3–1 representation when Berlin and Germany were the order of the day.

As was anticipated, the Western note now being prepared will reject Moscow's proposal to make West Berlin a "free city." Except that the West is opposed to any such idea it might try to win a certain propaganda advantage by countering that if Berlin is to be a "free city" then it should include both East Berlin as well as West Berlin.

The Soviets have already gone on record as unalterably opposed to putting their sector of the city into a "free city" plan.

GENEVA OR VIENNA?

Moscow had proposed that this possible East-West conference be held either in Warsaw or Prague. The West is going to counter with proposing it meet either in Geneva or Vienna, with Geneva the first choice.

The deadline toward which all this negotiating points is May 27, the date on which Moscow warned it would turn over administration of the corridors to West Berlin to East Germany unless some steps had been taken by East and West to settle their differences by then.

By that time U.S. Secretary of State John Foster Dulles fully expects to be back at the helm at the State Department. His confinement at Walter Reed Hospital is variously expected to range from 4 to 6 weeks. That means he would be back by April and ready to lead any mission to Europe.

Also, it is recalled the Secretary made clear that he expected to spend much of his time at the hospital working on the German and Berlin questions. In other words the plans, the preparations, the spade work, will be continued. And the President and his Secretary are expected to be in frequent communication during this period.

RUMORS ACTIVE

But despite full official expectation that the Secretary will emerge from his operation and hospital stay, rumors continue to fill the capital of his possible resignation or a change in his status. One change that he himself might welcome would be to continue as the President's chief foreign policy adviser as Secretary but let others (i.e., Christian Herter and C. Douglas Dillon) take over the administrative chores and lesser diplomatic assignments.

Now that East and West are moving toward diplomatic discussions of these basic issues—Berlin, Germany, European security—even Secretary Dulles' major critics are rallying to his defense and going so far as to suggest he is now really indispensable.

As one of them, Walter Lippmann, said this week in his syndicated column: "There have been times in the past when things were at the end of a chapter, and he could with grace and dignity have made way for a younger man. But not just now. This is a period when things are moving toward a climax, after which the world may be very different, and he himself is at the climax of his career."

[From the New York Times]

TO REUNITE BERLIN—A FREE CITY, CAPITAL OF AN ALL-GERMAN CONFEDERATION, ENVISAGED

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

Premier Khrushchev has proposed that West Berlin be made a free city without foreign troops. May I suggest that in dealing with this development American spokesmen refrain from returning the eternal negative and advance some constructive, positive ideas of their own? Why not urge that all of Berlin, West and East, be converted into a free city with a United Nations police force and guaranteed communications by land, water and air with West and East Germany.

East Berliners work in West Berlin. West Berlin gets some of its electricity from East Berlin. An urban railway, part subway, part elevated, connects the two segments of the city. Even today movement between them is relatively unhindered. There is every reason to make the city whole again.

Such a reunited free Berlin might become the capital of an all-German confederation. Moscow and the East German Communist Government have repeatedly demanded this confederation. The West German Government of Dr. Adenauer has as often rejected it on the ground that there can be no union with the U.S.S.R.'s East German puppet state.

Moscow, moreover, insists that in the two-Germanys confederation East Germany be allowed to retain its social achievements, by which the Kremlin undoubtedly means nationalized industry, a one-party system, labor discipline without effective trade unions, etc.

FUTURE OF EXPERIMENT

I recognize the incongruity and practical difficulty of marrying the West German elephant with 50 million inhabitants to the East German seal with 17 million. Nevertheless, the experiment might succeed. West Germans could enter such a strange association with full confidence. It would not be long before East German workers would ask for free trade unions.

Instead of standing firm on free elections as a condition for German reunification—something Moscow has often rejected—why not reunify first in the faith that democracy is so attractive and compulsive, especially to people who have lived under a dictatorship, that the East Germans will soon find a way of forcing their masters to agree to free elections? I have no fear that the Communist handful in East Germany, even with Russian encouragement, could swallow the West German giant.

CREATION OF COUNCIL

I can imagine how the proposed all-German confederation would work. There would be no need for Dr. Adenauer to meet or consult with the leaders of East Germany. West and East Germany would continue to function as before in their respective capitals. But a new confederal council would be created in reunified Berlin consisting of West and East Germans to deal with all-German trade, travel, post, telephone and telegraph communications, the free entry of newspapers and other printed matter, radio broadcasts and similar questions.

In time a single stable currency might be established for both parts of Germany, the assumption being that the good would drive out the bad. Ultimately, Germany might achieve reunification on this installment plan faster than if we wait for an agreement among the great powers.

As part of the bargain for a free reunited Berlin and a two-Germanys confederation West Germany might recognize the present western boundary of Poland and establish diplomatic relations with the Gomulka regime. This would serve other desirable ends. Once these steps had been taken, a favorable climate would be created for further negotiations on armaments.

No surrender on West Berlin is a necessity, but it is not the ultimate and only wisdom. Firmness without flexibility is sterile and could be dangerous. It seems that Moscow is ready to negotiate, else Mikoyan would not have come here and acted as he has. America should have a counterplan.

POLICY FOR BERLIN—REPLACEMENT OF ALLIES BY BONN IN WESTERN SECTOR PROPOSED

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

While your editorial of January 28 is thought provoking, this writer is unable to agree with your basic approach—that the Berlin impasse must be solved within the context of a general settlement with the Soviets on Germany or even on Europe. By contrast, he feels that what may be attainable at this time is a limited agreement on Berlin alone. If successful, it may decontaminate the atmosphere and open the way to a more comprehensive rapprochement. American policy should proceed on the following assumptions:

The reunification of Germany on Western and Bonn terms—free elections in both parts for the creation of an all-German democratic government, conclusion of a peace treaty with Bonn, and united Germany's freedom to remain in the Western military alliance—is impossible at this time. Consent to the establishment of a dynamic nation of 75 million people, equipped with nuclear weapons, would be suicide for the Soviets. Confronted with a militarized Germany pressing for the rectification of her borders mutilated by defeat would permanently rally the Poles and the Czechs behind the Soviets.

BONN'S CLAIM

The claim of the Bonn government, endorsed by the West, to represent all of Germany and to derive therefrom the right to ignore the existence of the German Democratic Republic, a going concern as a state, if not without moral justification, is utterly unrealistic.

In view of these hard realities the only feasible policy of the West can be that of letting the two German segments work out their own solutions. For the time being their socioeconomic divergences may render a genuine confederation impracticable and call for gradualism. Cooperative working agreements have been in force between them for years on many technical matters.

If, for the time being, a global settlement of the German issue is beyond realization for breaking the Berlin impasse, two approaches may merit attention. In each case the overriding consideration must be the preservation of the freedom of the courageous West Berliners.

One would be to expand the Soviet proposal of establishing a free city of Western Berlin. Such a regime, comprising all of Berlin could be created under United Nations auspices and supervision, and the allies would withdraw. Appealing as this proposal may seem at first, the disastrous experience of the Free City of Danzig under the League of Nations is too discouraging to recommend a repetition.

TRANSFER OF RESPONSIBILITY

The other contingency consists in the transfer of the responsibility for Western Berlin from the allies to the Bonn government, where it rightfully belongs, and the replacement of the allied by Western German military forces. This operation of changing the guard, underwritten by the four powers and the two German governments, should be based on ironclad guarantees for free communication with the West.

The obvious dangers inherent in this proposal should not be minimized. They are counterbalanced, however, by their advantages in the long run. The Soviets may even be willing to consent, as the price for the allied withdrawal from Berlin, to the inclusion of Eastern Berlin in the government of Greater Berlin. The Bonn government may find it to its advantage to drive a wedge into the Iron Curtain and, by establishing workable contacts with the eastern regime on a limited field, develop Berlin into a testing ground for further political cooperation on a larger scale.

Obviously this bold proposal calls for the abandonment of frozen thought pattern and sterile legalisms in both Bonn and the West. On the part of Dr. Adenauer it will require a statesmanlike reappraisal of his orientation. The Berlin situation is bound to become more untenable. Time is working for the Soviets.

BONN STUDIES PARLEY CALL BY MANSFIELD—GERMANY PAYS CLOSE ATTENTION TO BID FOR ZONE TALKS

(By Bynum Shaw)

BONN, February 13.—Senator MANSFIELD'S nine-point program for the reunification of Germany through direct negotiations between the Bonn Republic and the Communist Pankow regime stirred up great interest here today.

Heretofore the average German has not paid a great deal of attention to reunification proposals made outside the administration in the United States, but MANSFIELD'S ideas were given front-page play in the newspapers here and set off discussions even in the beer halls where many Germans read them.

Officially the Adenauer government declined to comment, saying only that the plan would be given careful study, but in office after office from the Foreign Ministry to defense headquarters there was an air of concern.

RATED AS IMPORTANT MAN

A high-level source explained the attitude. He said that, while MANSFIELD'S ideas do not parallel those of the Bonn Government, "We think he is a very important man."

The implication was that Bonn is afraid that proposals with which it does not agree may become a part of American policy.

The spokesman pointed out that one requirement of MANSFIELD'S plan, negotiations between East and West Berlin for unified municipal services, have been going on for some time.

Since 1949, he said, technical contacts have been required for the operation of the city's underground and elevated transport system, which is operated by the East Germans but circles through both sections of the city.

BRINGS IN WEST MARKS

The transport system which nets valued West marks for the East has operated without restriction and the West Germans have contributed trackage and spare parts which were scarce on the Communist side.

There also have been negotiations over the supply of electricity and gas, but the availability of these utilities more often has been subject to Communist whim.

Bonn sees that as one of the weak points in the Mansfield plans. It would assume the Communists are ready to negotiate in good faith and Bonn maintains that is false assumption.

Another official said "It looks like everybody has plans. We cannot comment on them all."

SEEN AS GOOD SIGN

Socialist spokesman studying the Senator's proposals said everybody has a plan except the Adenauer government. He said that while his party cannot agree with every point MANSFIELD makes, it is taken as good sign that Americans are thinking deeply and seriously on the German problem.

The Free Democrats agreed that negotiations on reunification should start immediately. Ultimately, they said, unity must be achieved by the people directly.

Press comment on the nine-point plan ranged from skeptical to denunciatory. The Frankfurter Neue Presse declared "It would be very bad if MANSFIELD'S naive and simplified views prevailed in U.S. foreign policy.

Dortmund's Ruhr Nachrichten called some of the Senator's points sensational and dangerous. A Berlin paper, Der Kurier, said MANSFIELD'S patent recipe was a rather dubious program.

The major papers, however, did not carry editorial comment. They were still too busy studying the plan.

ENVOYS TO SOVIET WARY OVER BERLIN—SERIOUS CONSEQUENCES SEEN IN KHRUSHCHEV PLAN FOR EAST GERMAN CONTROL

(By Max Frankel)

Moscow, November 11.—The declaration by Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev that the Soviet Union would turn over its remaining occupation functions in Berlin to East Germany set off hasty activity in Western embassies here today.

Diplomats thought it was only a matter of time before the Soviet Government took formal steps in line with the Premier's announcement. Mr. Khrushchev said it was time for Moscow to renounce that part of the Potsdam agreement of 1945 that provided for a four-power military occupation of Berlin.

He suggested that the United States, Britain, and France also relinquish their occupation of West Berlin.

In any event, he declared, the Soviet Union will go ahead with its plans to put the East Germans in full command of their capital. Then if the West still has any interest in Berlin "let them themselves reach agreement" with East Germany, he said.

CRISIS IN WEST CALLED AIM

The plan was seemingly designed to cause at the least a diplomatic crisis in Washington, London, and Paris, since the Western Powers do not recognize East Germany and have refused to deal with it.

Diplomats here saw the planned Soviet move as a serious and daring step. It would force the West to choose between dealing with the East German Communists and encountering increasing difficulties in efforts to maintain United States, Britain, and French garrisons in West Berlin.

Mr. Khrushchev contends that all of Berlin is properly the capital of East Germany. The civilian and democratic government of West Berlin could not readily survive the withdrawal of Western occupation forces, it is generally recognized here.

Mr. Khrushchev's speech was not solely a demand for a joint four-power agreement to end the occupation of Berlin, Mr. Khrushchev said:

"It seems that the time has come for the powers signatory to the Potsdam agreement to give up the remains of the occupation regime in Berlin and thereby make it possible to create a normal situation in the capital of the German Democratic Republic [East Germany].

"The Soviet Union, for its part, will hand over to the sovereign German Democratic Republic the functions in Berlin that are still held by Soviet agencies," Mr. Khrushchev went on. "This, I think, would be the correct thing to do.

"Let the United States, France and Britain themselves build their relations with the German Democratic Republic, let them themselves reach agreement with it if they are interested in any question concerning Berlin."

Mr. Khrushchev said this would amount to a renunciation by Moscow of a part of the Potsdam agreement and he went to great lengths to justify the breaking of what he termed "out-of-date" commitments.

A number of basic questions about Soviet intentions in Berlin were left unanswered by Mr. Khrushchev. These were the subject today of extensive conferences among Western diplomats and also of an hour-long conversation between Andrei A. Gromyko, Soviet Foreign Minister, and Dr. Hans Kroll, West German Ambassador.

Diplomats thought it highly unlikely that the Western capitals would alter their often-expressed aversion to any dealings with East Germany. Their position in West Berlin, however, could become endangered if East Germany chose to exercise its full authority in East-West dealings in Berlin and over the highways, raillines and air corridors linking West Berlin to the rest of West Germany.

But even without ordering the Western Powers out of Berlin, East Germany, once given full control by Moscow, would be in a strong position to demand official dealings. There are hundreds of housekeeping details in Berlin that require East-West cooperation. Furthermore East German guards and officials may assume control over all the routes between Berlin and West Germany.

By refusing to deal with East Germany the Western Powers might be deprived of any or all of the access routes to Berlin. The city sits like an island 100 miles inside East Germany.

BERLIN AIRLIFT RECALLED

During the Berlin blockade 10 years ago, the Western nations were not seriously challenged on the right to fly into West Berlin. As a result, they kept their half of the city supplied with food and fuel from June 1948 to May 1949. At that time, in addition, the Soviet Government remained an interested party and finally agreed to negotiate a settlement of Berlin's status.

But the Soviet Government now proposes to refer all disputes to the "sovereign" East German Government. Diplomats here seemed seriously concerned with the date of the proposed Soviet moves and the extent of the planned changes.

They were eager to learn just how far the East German Government would subsequently go to make its presence felt. Three times in his speech yesterday Mr. Khrushchev warned the West not to resort to force in reply to the Berlin switch. Any attack on East Germany would be considered an attack on the Soviet Union, he said.

Diplomats were curious about the timing and manner of the Soviet announcement. Mr. Khrushchev spoke yesterday at a mass rally of friendship for a Polish delegation headed by Wladyslaw Gomulka. The Polish leader, who had been denouncing the West Germans during his 17-day sojourn here, promptly supported Mr. Khrushchev's plan for Berlin.

There were, however, no readily available answers for the diplomats. They sent off messages with their own assessment of the potential gravity of the situation. Dr. Kroll's interview with Mr. Gromyko had been previously scheduled, but he tried to get more details on the Soviet plan without success.

U.N. WEIGHS ITS ROLE IN BERLIN SETTLEMENT—ALTHOUGH SOVIET HAS SUGGESTED PLACE FOR WORLD ORGANIZATION, DIRECT TALKS ARE INDICATED—WAR THREAT IS BIG FACTOR

(By Thomas J. Hamilton)

Nikita S. Khrushchev opened the current war of nerves with his speech last November demanding the withdrawal of the Western Powers from West Berlin. This was followed by a series of notes calling for the establishment of West Berlin as a free city, for the confederation of the two Germanys, and the conclusion of a peace treaty under which Germany, whether united or not, would be neutralized.

The Soviet Union's possession of nuclear weapons makes the situation far more dangerous than on the occasion of the Soviet blockade of Berlin in 1948 and 1949.

The Soviet Union raised the blockade in May 1949, after it recognized the success of the allied airlift. Although the negotiations were conducted at the United Nations by Dr. Philip C. Jessup of the United States and Jacob A. Malik of the Soviet Union, the American atomic monopoly, not action by the Security Council, was responsible; a Soviet veto had killed a resolution requesting it to end the blockade.

It may be assumed therefore that once the United States, Britain, France, and West Germany agree upon a policy, they will propose direct negotiations. In other words, the matter would be placed before the United Nations only as a last resort.

Although the Soviet Union still holds, as it did before, that the unification of Germany is exclusively a matter for negotiation between the two German Governments, its proposal for a German peace conference may indicate a softening of this position. Certainly it would seem to open the way, after much haggling, for the participation of the great powers in all phases of the German question.

UNITED NATIONS ROLE

If an agreement can be reached on Berlin, the services of the United Nations would certainly be needed. The Soviet note to the United States, November 27, suggested that the four occupying powers, together with West Germany and East Germany, guarantee the status of West Berlin as a free city.

"On its part, the Soviet Union would have no objection to the United Nations also sharing, in one way or another, in observing the free-city status of West Berlin," the note added.

Although Anastas I. Mikoyan had a talk with Secretary General Hammarskjold during Mr. Mikoyan's visit to New York, the Soviet First Deputy Premier did nothing to clarify this vague suggestion. It is so vague, in fact, that it could mean almost anything, it might even be an indication that the Soviet Union might allow some of the 10,000 Western troops now in West Berlin to remain in the free city as United Nations observers.

However, the Soviet Union's acceptance of such an arrangement could certainly be obtained only after the hardest kind of bargaining. Even so, West Berlin could be strangled at any time that the Soviet Union decided to cut the city's communications with West Germany.

It is doubtful, therefore, whether the Western Powers would agree to a free city even if East Berlin were included in the arrangements and some Western troops were allowed to remain.

DANZIG RECALLED

Past efforts by international organizations to guarantee free cities do not offer any encouragement. The League of Nations had placed the free city of Danzig under its protection, but this did not avail against Hitler.

In 1947 the responsibility of maintaining the free territory of Trieste, which consisted not only of the city but of a fairly substantial hinterland, was assumed by the Security Council at the request of the four great powers. However, the Council was never able to agree upon a governor, and its guarantee became a dead letter when the Western Powers divided the free territory between Italy and Yugoslavia.

This record, however, is no argument against United Nations consideration of the fundamental question of separating Soviet and Western forces in Germany and the rest of Eastern Europe.

A nuclear-free zone, to be composed of West Germany, East Germany, Poland, and Czechoslovakia, was suggested by Adam Rapacki, the Polish Foreign Minister, in a speech in the General Assembly in October 1957.

Obviously, the Rapacki plan could not have been presented without the consent of the Soviet Union, and it conforms with the Kremlin's unsleeping determination to prevent West Germany from acquiring nuclear weapons.

POLAND PERSISTS

But there are grounds for belief that the Poles were and are just as worried about the presence of Soviet atomic weapons on their side of the line.

The original version of the Rapacki plan was unacceptable to the West, since it would have forbidden the use of nuclear weapons in West Germany while permitting the Soviet Union to maintain its 22 divisions in East Germany.

Mr. Rapacki responded to these criticisms by revising his plan last November. The first stage of the revised plan would permit the United States and the Soviet Union to maintain their existing nuclear arms in the zone, but deny them to the local powers.

In the second stage the interdiction of nuclear armaments in the central European zone would extend to the United States and the Soviet Union, who would also thin out their conventional forces. It may be anticipated that the Soviet Union not only will propose the incorporation of this plan in any German settlement but will also submit it to the General Assembly next fall.

REVISED PLAN

As now revised, the Rapacki plan offers advantages and disadvantages for both the Soviet and the Western coalition. Both sides would benefit if the danger of an incident between the two superpowers could be reduced. Both would benefit if there was assurance against the emergence of a too powerful Germany.

However, this would have corresponding disadvantages for the United States and the Soviet Union. If the Russians should thin out their forces in Eastern Europe, they would find corresponding difficulty in holding down the satellite regimes there. As for the United States, the denial of nuclear weapons to West Germany, together with the shrinking of the Atlantic Alliance's conventional forces, would require a revision of the basic strategy that produced the original decision to arm West Germany.

The Rapacki plan conforms with the growing trend toward disengagement that has been championed by George F. Kennan and by the Socialist parties in Britain and other European countries.

POINT 4

FOREIGN AFFAIRS—LET'S NOT FENCE OURSELVES IN BERLIN

(By C. L. Sulzberger)

PARIS, January 30.—The Western Powers have been taking their own good time about defining their views on Berlin. This is wise because the problem is extremely serious. Any misjudgment of Soviet intentions or aspirations could have disastrous consequences just as any failure by Moscow to comprehend our own intentions and aspirations would be equally grave.

It is apparent that discussions among American, British, and French experts have produced considerable divergences on how the gathering crisis should be met. One faction—ardently supported by Bonn—insists we should simply not recognize Russia's right to change the prevailing situation by unilateral action and that, therefore, we should prepare to defend the existing status quo by military means, if necessary.

It is argued that the West must insist by force, should that be required, on its legal rights to supply Berlin along the overland corridors guaranteed by the original accords worked out with the Soviet Union. Were we to demand a continuation of the present system but to rely only on another airlift, it is pointed out that new electronic devices could jam navigational instruments and gradually whittle down the value of such an airlift.

THE FUNDAMENTAL ISSUE

This kind of talk, reasonable in terms of pure logic, tends to avoid the fundamental issue. That issue is not whether the Russians have the right to modify an international agreement and whether we should, if need be, fight to preserve its sanctity. The issue is really whether, in our own interest, we desire to maintain for an indefinite period a situation which is both awkward and embarrassing for ourselves and our allies.

Too often we automatically oppose any novel Soviet proposition and certainly when the Russians suggest changes they generally find acutely cumbersome ways of doing so. Thus they turned their Berlin proposals unnecessarily into an ultimatum. A great fanfare had to be sounded to prove it wasn't—which may or may not be true.

But if we try to isolate acceptable aspects of the problem as presented we can find much that should suit our policy. It seems strange to hear arguments that we must go to war in order to keep Soviet troops in East Berlin. It is equally strange to insist that supply shipments bound for that city can be checked by Russian officials but we must fight if they are checked by East German officials.

If Moscow is interested in "Germanizing" Berlin by ending its occupation, we should be pleased. Cannot we accept that essential idea as a basis for discussion and announce our wish to replace allied Berlin garrisons with West German garrisons when Soviet troops pull out?

BONN'S RIGHT TO PROTECTION

The Bonn Government is a full member of NATO. It has every right to insist on allied protection. West German NATO troops could therefore protect free Berlin as effectively as American, British, and French troops.

If Moscow acts unilaterally by turning over its prerogatives to East Germany, we should do likewise with West Germany, granting it authority over the air and land corridors which assure access to Berlin. Today, with allied garrisons there, all NATO would be obliged to assist in defending against Communist armed intrusion. Bonn would be entitled to exactly the same assistance if its soldiers replaced ours.

Nor should Bonn object to dealing with East German officials at corridor checkpoints, an embarrassment Washington wishes to avoid. West Germany deals officially with East Germany every day and has extensive commercial accords.

To this basis for negotiation we might add the condition that the Soviet Army should withdraw to an agreed perimeter of perhaps 50 miles from Berlin. That could not possibly affect Moscow's security position. But it would eliminate an element of potential provocation.

We clearly hope to make Berlin only one item on the agenda of East-West parleys that are almost certain to develop. We want to raise again the entire issue of German unification. But we cannot get into such a meeting without at least some positive idea for improving the uncomfortable Berlin status quo.

This approach was first presented in this column last December 10. It is repeated to stress the folly of possibly boxing ourselves into an untenable position before negotiations. Change is desirable in Berlin. Such change need not be disadvantageous.

KHRUSHCHEV RAISES QUESTIONS

[From the New York Times, Dec. 1, 1958]

Stripped of its verbiage and its propaganda lies, the Soviet note on Berlin was an effort to undo a complex bargain reached in 1944 and 1945 by the wartime allies who defeated Hitler.

Premier Khrushchev would like to end that part of the bargain which he does not like: the existence of a West Berlin as an island of freedom guarded by Western troops inside the Communist bloc. By this effort, however, he calls into question the entire bargain, opening again for reexamination not only the status of Berlin but all the related matters. If we look into these related matters we may wonder whether Khrushchev is being wise, even from a Soviet point of view.

One part of the Berlin bargain is certainly the actual exchange of territory in early July 1945, which first made it possible for Western troops to enter Berlin. In exchange for what is now West Berlin, British and American troops retreated westward from the Elbe River and turned over to Soviet occupation Thuringia and the adjoining rich area of central Germany. When Khrushchev raises the question of ousting Western troops from Berlin, he implicitly raises the related question of ousting Soviet and other Communist troops from Leipzig, Erfurt, Halle, Weimar, and the other cities and rural areas which were first militarily conquered by Western troops and surrendered to Soviet control only as part of the Berlin bargain.

But the matters at stake go far beyond merely central Germany. The Berlin bargain was implicit in the deliberations at the Potsdam Conference. There the West agreed to the temporary administration of eastern Germany by the Polish state and promised to support the permanent incorporation into the Soviet Union of northern East Prussia, now known by the Soviet name of Kaliningrad Province, but originally the Koenigsberg area.

If Khrushchev can unilaterally renounce the Berlin part of the bargain, what reason exists for the West to support the Soviet position in Kaliningrad or the Polish interest in the Oder-Neisse line? The answer is obvious: no reason at all.

Speaking for President Eisenhower at Augusta yesterday, Secretary Dulles made it clear we have no intention of abandoning the people of West Berlin. In addition, Secretary Dulles apparently looks forward to discussing the entire German issue first with our allies and eventually with the Soviet Union. Regardless of the outcome of these discussions, the present outlook is that the Soviet effort to force us to abandon Berlin will intensify over the weeks and months ahead. We suggest that before such pressure, with all its incalulable consequences, is intensified, Khrushchev and his advisers might do well to take another look.

Already it is clear that there are farsighted elements in Warsaw who have glimpsed the possible consequences for Poland of this Berlin adventure. Are there not similar farsighted people in Moscow who can see that one possible alternative to maintaining the Berlin status quo is an effort to redraw the boundary lines in Europe so as to restore the situation of, say, August 31, 1939?

[From the New York Herald Tribune, Feb. 10, 1959]

ON FLEXIBILITY

(By Walter Lippmann)

The new word in Western diplomacy is "flexibility." It has become fashionable because just under the surface of the official formulae there is going on in Washington, in London and in Bonn a reappraisal of the German problem. It is a wholly false picture of what is going on to suppose that the issue in this reappraisal is between surrendering and standing firm, between appeasement and principle, between being soft and being strong.

The real issue, to which the reappraisal is addressed, is whether to stand pat on positions that have become untenable or to move to new positions from which the Western allies can recover the political initiative.

Let us take Berlin for a concrete example, remembering, of course, that it is only the focal point of the whole larger German problem. At present there are two streams of traffic between West Berlin and West Germany. One, which is much the larger, is civilian traffic. This traffic is regulated by an agreement between the West German Government and the East German Government and it is by this traffic that the civilian population of West Berlin lives and does it business. The other traffic is military. It is between the British, French, and American forces in West Germany and their garrisons in West Berlin. This traffic is regulated by Allied agreement with the Soviet Union.

Moscow has now said that if there is no other negotiation about the status of Berlin, it will on May 27 turn over to the East German Government its authority over the military traffic. If this is done, it will mean that at the checkpoints on the highways and railroads and canals Allied military traffic will be met by East German rather than by Soviet officials.

The immediate and specific questions about Berlin are (1) what will we do when we meet these East German officials; and (2) what will the East German officials do about our military traffic?

This is where the difference between an inflexible and a flexible policy shows itself. The inflexibles say that we do not recognize the East German Government, and that we cannot, therefore, allow them to have anything to do with our traffic to Berlin. The flexibles reply that as long as no one interferes with our traffic to Berlin, it does not make any difference whether the official who stamps the papers wears an East German or a Soviet uniform. They add that if Dr. Adenauer can allow East German officials to stamp his papers for the civilian traffic, he is in no position to insist that President Eisenhower be more inflexible than he is himself.

In speculating about the use of force to keep open access to Berlin, the first question to be decided is whether we ought to be ready to go to war if we meet an East German official at the checkpoints on the highway. Do we fight because the official who wants to see the papers carried by the truck wears an East German uniform, or do we fight if he closes the highway? The flexibles say that a blockade of West Berlin is a fighting matter but that whether the official is East German or Soviet is not a fighting matter.

The flexibles say, moreover, that to announce you will fight about the official at the checkpoint is not a strong policy but a foolish one, and because it is foolish, it is weak. It is weak because the people of the Western World cannot conceivably be united to fight a world war on such an idiotic issue.

As we know, the mayor of West Berlin, the highly esteemed Willy Brandt, can be counted among the flexibles. He has suggested that the East German officials might be recognized as "agents" of the Soviet Union. An easier, and as good a way, to accomplish the same result would be to ask a Soviet guarantee of access to West Berlin until a new status can be arranged by negotiations covering the two Germanys and the two Berlins. What we want is that West Berlin should not be blockaded and strangled and that Berlin should become again the capital of a reunited Germany.

This flexible position is a strong one. We stand firm on the substance, which is that West Berlin is not to be blockaded. We are indifferent to the formalities which do not matter as long as access to West Berlin is open. We keep alive our real objective, which is not to maintain West Berlin as an island within East Germany but to restore its status as the capital city to which all parts of Germany must have equal access.

It may well be that the Soviet Union will refuse to guarantee access during the period, which would have to be a long one, when the whole German problem is being negotiated. If that is what happens, the Soviet Union will find itself in a dangerous position. It will have given the East Germans a free hand to impose a blockade, which would be an act of war, and it will be committed to come to the defense of East Germans if they provoke a war.

This is a much bigger gamble than Moscow has ever taken before, and we need not jump to the conclusion that it will take the gamble now.

POINT 5

[From the New York Times, Dec. 13, 1958]

WESTERN BIG THREE'S RIGHT OF ACCESS TO CITY HINGES ON ORAL ACCORDS ONLY

(By Hanson W. Baldwin)

The Western Allies' access to the present corridors to Berlin, which lie entirely within East Germany, is based on only an unwritten agreement among the military commanders after World War II. On the other hand, the presence of the Western Allied troops in Berlin—in fact the status of Berlin as a political island in a Soviet Communist sea, or a special occupation area to be shared by the Soviet Union, Britain, the United States and France—is specifically provided for in the written agreements reached prior to Potsdam.

After the failure of the Soviet attempt 10 years ago to blockade Berlin, which ended in May 1949, a Council of Foreign Ministers of the four powers, meeting in Paris that June, in effect reaffirmed the right of four-power occupation and joint administration of Berlin.

ZONE RESPONSIBILITY

The four powers, the Soviet Union included, agreed that each in its zone would "have an obligation to take the measures necessary to insure the normal functioning and utilization of rail, water and road transport" between the Eastern and Western zones and between the zones and Berlin. There was not, however, any specific written delineation of the military corridors to Berlin, which had been arranged informally in 1945 by Gen. Lucius D. Clay for the United States.

Thus the Soviet authorities have taken advantage of Western oversights or mistakes to cloak the blockading of Berlin—imposed in 1948 and now threatened again with pseudo-legalism. But the Russians have gone beyond blockade and have claimed, starting in 1948, that Berlin is part of the Soviet Zone and that the Western Powers do not have the same status in Berlin as the Soviet Union.

Today, therefore, the United States is gathering once again the somewhat bitter fruit of its wartime naivete.

Berlin is 76 airline miles from the nearest point in Western Germany. The city itself is the hub of a large network of rail and highway communications leading to the West. The population of West Berlin and the city's economy are supplied entirely from the West in the matter of food, fuel and raw materials.

MEANS OF DELIVERY

Only about 0.1 percent of West Berlin's needs is delivered by plane; 28.3 percent is sent in via canals and waterways; 34.9 percent by rail, and 36.7 percent by highway, according to the West German Embassy in Washington.

But the Western military garrisons in Berlin have a far more limited supply access. The oral agreements reached by General Clay and perpetuated, with interruptions, until today cover only three air corridors from Hamburg, Bueckeburg-Hanover and Frankfort to Berlin, one rail line from Helmstedt to Berlin and one highway from Marienborn to Berlin.

And, as the Russians have demonstrated, they can and do interpret the oral agreements of 13 years ago as they please. The security of the supply routes to the United States garrisons in Berlin depends far more upon the power the United States is willing to use to keep them open than upon solemn legal agreements.

BONN TO IMPROVE ARMY READINESS—BERLIN CRISIS RESULTS IN NEW EMPHASIS ON SHORT-TERM COMBAT POTENTIAL

(By Arthur J. Olsen)

BONN, GERMANY, February 10.—The West German Army was reported today to have been ordered to improve its state of readiness this spring.

The orders were issued as a result of a recent reappraisal of Bonn's military buildup schedules in the light of the intensified political struggle between the Soviet Union and the West over Berlin and Germany. The result is a new emphasis on short-term combat potential.

The Defense Ministry does not expect the Soviet challenge of the Western position in Berlin to come down to a test of force. Lt. Gen. Adolf Heusinger, inspector general of the armed forces, is reported to have told his senior staff officers last week that political developments had nevertheless affected existing plans for a gradual buildup of the half-grown West German Army.

These plans call for the creation of 12 divisions fully equipped and at prescribed strength by 1961. The new approach will emphasize increasing the capabilities as combat units of the five divisions now in existence.

It is these divisions, already assigned to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization command, that are to be strengthened in the next 3 months.

Ostensibly they are "combat ready" and at the disposal of Gen. Lauris Norstad, the Allied supreme commander; in fact, they are under strength and short on equipment.

The immediate effect of the new approach in the Defense Ministry would be a speedup of deliveries of weapons, equipment and division quartermaster supplies, according to military sources.

There is no sign that the army is planning to alter the present manpower rhythm, which keeps divisions fluctuating predictably between 60 and 75 percent of rated strength, that is, between 7,000 and 8,000 men.

The rhythm is fixed by the quarterly call-ups of conscripts, who make up about half of the division's manpower. After 12 months' service drafted soldiers are mustered out and division strength falls until new troops come out of the recruit camps a few weeks later.

The limited shift in Bonn's military planning, which Defense Ministry spokesmen decline to confirm publicly, is understood to be a consequence of the Berlin crisis. For the first time since the first months of the Korean war a political dispute has evoked hard thinking on the possibility of military conflict in central Europe.

Staff studies are understood to be under way at General Norstad's headquarters on various military situations that might conceivably arise from the Berlin situation.

How far the tightening the Allied and West German defense posture will go will be determined by developments between now and May. The end of that month is the time when the Soviet Union proposes to turn over its occupation rights in Berlin to the East German authorities.

STATE OF THE NATIONS: DULLES GOES SHOPPING

(By Joseph C. Harsch)

John Foster Dulles' current tour through the Allied capitals of Western Europe differs from previous tours in one important respect.

Previously he has either been trying to sell something to the other Western Allies which they did not want to buy or to discourage them from doing something they very much thought they wanted to do.

In this case, for a change, Mr. Dulles and the Western European allies are in the same boat. Not one of them really wants to change the old stock Western policy on Germany, but all recognize that it is hopelessly out of date and that they are forced by circumstances beyond their control to come up with some new ideas.

This is an agonizing reappraisal trip, agonizing equally for all. It would be so much simpler to drift along with the old formula of "reunification of Germany with free elections," because all knew that Moscow would never agree to the formula and that therefore it meant, in fact, continuation of the division of Germany at the Elbe. This is precisely what all Western foreign offices consider the least objectionable condition for Germany.

But times have changed. Like it or not, Moscow has reopened the German question, and it is merely a fact, no matter how unpalatable, that it cannot be bottled up again inside the old formula. It may take months or years before a new status quo acceptable to all is devised, but not even a Metternich could put the old pieces back together again.

Mr. Dulles has perforce gone this time neither to sell nor unsell, but to exchange ideas—to hope that out of the collective-idea centers of the West some new policy can emerge which will at least be no more undesirable than the old.

The question of a new policy on Germany ceased to be academic and became imperative from the day Nikita S. Khrushchev announced his intention to withdraw Soviet troops from East Berlin. Mr. Dulles' subsequent admission that there might be other ways than the road of free elections toward reunification stands as the official recognition in the West that the process of rethinking the German problem has begun.

But where do we go from here?

We must start with a realization of the reasons why the existing settlement is no longer viable. Curiously enough, the most fundamental of the reasons is the weakness of communism in East Germany.

Of all the puppet Communist regimes, the East German is the shabbiest and the most unsuccessful in putting down any roots among the people it governs. It is a failure by any objective test, and it has been bled white by defections to the West through West Berlin. It survives only because it is supported by Soviet bayonets. Communism would disappear in Germany overnight if all outside influence were removed from Germany and German political nature were allowed to take its own natural course.

But twinned with this decline of communism inside Germany has been a relative growth in Soviet power. The forces of East and West inside Germany have tipped westward, but outside Germany, Moscow's relative military and political strength has grown. Moscow is strong enough to prevent the West from demanding that political nature be allowed to take its own course inside Germany.

In effect, Moscow has said that the political erosion of communism in East Germany must be stopped, and it has sketched out the way it proposes to stop it unless we of the West will cooperate in working out a different way. Barring some new agreement, Moscow proposes to seal off East Germany from the West either by isolating or by suppressing entirely the Western enclave in Berlin.

We of the West have talked boldly of meeting this by force, some say by driving a military convoy through to Berlin in case of trouble. But would we, in fact, risk a nuclear world war to preserve West Berlin? Perhaps we would if there were no other way. But is there another way?

It may sound inconceivable to anyone brought up on Mr. Dulles' bold projects for rolling back the Iron Curtain and liberating the captive peoples of Eastern Europe that the same Mr. Dulles would ever be a party to a project for shoring up the shaky, sordid, and shabby Ulbricht-Grotewohl regime in East Germany.

But as the Western experts push their thinking out into the unfamiliar jungle trails of the German problem they are finding themselves entertaining just such unorthodox and almost grotesque ideas.

They are entertaining such thoughts for the simple reason that the best and safest way of securing the ultimate best interests of the East German people may well lie down the road of saving the outward form of the East German regime.

[From the Christian Science Monitor]

STATE OF THE NATION: DULLES GOES SHOPPING—2

(By Joseph C. Harsch)

The last column in this space identified two of the factors bearing heavily on the current reappraisal of the German problem as the erosion of the Communist regime in East Germany and the growth of relative Soviet power outside of Germany.

As John Foster Dulles canvasses the German problem with his allied friends on his current shopping tour for a new German policy, he and they recognize as a third factor the enormous importance to Moscow of the survival of a Communist regime in East Germany.

The reasons are familiar enough. East Germany is both the ideological and the military seal around the Communist regimes of Poland, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia. If the East German regime should collapse the whole satellite system in Eastern Europe would be exposed and threatened. Such a convulsion is for Moscow unthinkable and intolerable.

We may be tempted to shrug our shoulders and say, "So what?" But it is merely one of the unpleasant facts of world life that Moscow must be expected to regard a nuclear world war as less intolerable than the sudden collapse of its Western political and military front.

For one thing, Nikita S. Khrushchev has not so firmly consolidated his political position at home that it could survive the loss of all the western frontier provinces of the empire Stalin built after the last war. We have to accept the unpleasant fact that Moscow most probably would accept war as a last resort rather than see the keystone fall out from its Eastern European system. A Communist regime in East Germany is the keystone of that system.

In abstract theory we have three possible courses open to us in our search for a new German policy.

First, we could insist on maintaining the present situation in Germany in which the East German regime becomes progressively weaker. But to pursue this course is to drive ever closer to the brink of world nuclear war since Moscow ultimately will fight rather than see its whole western frontier system collapse.

Second, we could abandon our enclave in West Berlin to the vengeance of the Ulbrichts and Grotewohls. But this would be a sellout of the brave citizens of that city which is unthinkable and which no Western statesmen, least of all Dwight D. Eisenhower, could for an instant contemplate.

Third, we can explore with the Soviets the possibility of a new settlement for Germany which would attempt to balance the three conflicting sets of interests which have newly come into conflict over Germany. And it is in such exploring that the experts already have found facing them the conclusion that in all probability the only way out will involve the continuation with Western approval of a Communist regime in East Germany.

This would not be a tolerable possibility for us if the East German regime were growing in strength and influence inside Germany. But it is declining rapidly in strength and influence; indeed it is its very decline which has precipitated the present reappraisal of German policy.

The time has not yet arrived when any Western diplomat or statesman is ready to say in public what many of them are thinking in private. But behind the scenes the trend of thinking is strongly in the direction sketched out here—in the direction of a new German settlement involving a confederation within which the East German state will continue for some time to be guaranteed a government and a social system which will at least be nominally Communist and which will retain special relations with Moscow.

This does not mean that the Western statesmen are ready to abandon for all time the hope of seeing East Germans relieved of the burden of the thoroughly disreputable government which currently preys upon them, or the hope of seeing Germany move gradually toward the unity which all Germans desire and which many Germans someday might attempt to seize by force if the door were closed to any other approach.

The time has passed when the outside Western nations can impose by superior force their preferred form of a German settlement on Germany and make Moscow accept it. But the time has arrived when West Germany will exert increasing influence in East Germany as barriers to such influence are removed.

The more we can manage to allow West Germans to deal directly with East Germans the more will the lot of the East German people be relieved. And Moscow might be interested for the price of survival of at least a nominally Communist East German Government. The price is high but the more the experts study the problem the more they incline to think that it may well prove to be the only way out of a German problem short of a nuclear war.

MIKOYAN AND BERLIN

(By Walter Lippmann)

Mr. Mikoyan is making two visits to Washington, separated by the 10 days or so which he will spend traveling about the country. The first visit has confirmed the view, held by many who watch these things closely, that the Soviet's move in Berlin, though entirely serious and of great consequence, is not an ultimatum but a move to open up negotiations on a large range of questions.

Although no agreements have been negotiated in this first diplomatic encounter, it is reasonably certain that the door has been opened to a negotiated solution of the Berlin crisis, and it may be to bigger things than Berlin.

Apart from what has been said in these preliminary talks, which are properly confidential though they are not altogether secret, there are objective reasons for saying that the Berlin crisis is negotiable.

In the various notes that have been exchanged about Berlin two controlling propositions have been established. The first is that the Western allies will not withdraw their troops from West Berlin until there is a general German settlement, and that they will not permit anyone to interfere with their right to supply these troops. A blockade of the Western troops by the East German Government would be an act of war, and there cannot be any doubt on this subject in Moscow or in East Berlin.

On the other hand, we cannot prevent the Soviet Government from delegating to the East German Government any of the powers it now exercises. Therefore, if at the end of the 6 months period the Soviet Government transfers its authority to East Germany, the crucial question is whether this will in any way interfere with our military presence in Berlin and with our military access to Berlin. This is the question which will have to be negotiated.

It is not in itself a hopelessly difficult question. Assuming that the Soviet Government turns over to the East German Government its control over access to Berlin, the practical question is how to make sure that the East German Government will not attempt to interfere with allied military communications by road, rail, canal, and air.

It is here that there will have to be some give and take on both sides, the point of compromise and negotiation being about the powers of the East German control officials. The nub of the problem is whether the Soviet Government will give us a guarantee that the East German officials will not interfere with our military traffic and whether, if the Soviet Government gives this guarantee, we will allow the East German officials to inspect the travel papers of our vehicles.

A Soviet guarantee that the East Germans will not interfere with our vehicles would be a compromise in which neither side would lose face. The Soviet promise to transfer its powers to the East German Government would be fulfilled and at the same time a possible cause of war would be removed. On our side, the fact that the East German officials were subject to a Soviet guarantee would go a long way toward satisfying our official view that in Berlin the Soviet Union cannot divest itself of its obligations under the old international pacts. This formula would also be in accord with the position originally taken by Secretary Dulles in his press conference of November 26, and withdrawn later only upon the insistence of Dr. Adenauer.

To those who will hurriedly exclaim that any dealings with the East German Government are appeasement, we may point out that if this is appeasement, then the leading appeaser is Dr. Adenauer himself. For the actual fact of the matter is that civilian traffic between West Germany and West Berlin is now moving, and has for some time been moving, under an agreement between the two German governments. This agreement includes acceptance by Dr. Adenauer of the right of the inspectors and control agents of the East German Government to deal with the travel papers of West German vehicles.

Dr. Adenauer is now dealing with the East German officials, and if he can do this, why in the name of common sense should we not do the same, especially if we have obtained a guarantee under which we can hold the Soviet Government responsible?

A world war arising out of a quarrel as to whether East German officials can inspect our papers when they already inspect West German papers would be the most preposterous war in history.

I do not mean to say that the formula I am describing is the only way to resolve the Berlin crisis. But it is a way. If it were taken, the real problem of Berlin would still remain, which is how this city can cease to be an island surrounded by the Red army and become the capital of a reunited and unoccupied Germany.

This is a much more difficult problem than the current problem of Berlin, and it will call for much more complicated negotiation, not only with the Soviet Union but among the Western Allies.

[From the New York Herald Tribune, Dec. 4, 1958]

THE REPLY TO THE SOVIETS

(By Walter Lippmann)

A written reply will, of course, have to be made to the long Soviet note about Berlin. The reply will have to represent the agreed views of London, Paris, Washington and Bonn. But there are various ways of replying to the Soviet note, and we should think carefully before we choose which one.

It would be easy enough to write a reply, which is as argumentative as the Soviet note, rebutting its arguments and asserting our counterarguments. This will give a passing satisfaction to some. But it will do nobody any real good. The problem of the two Germanys and the two Berlins will still be with us.

Another way to reply would be to draft a big program of counterproposals with elaborate principles and generalizations, many of them ambiguous formulas to reconcile divergent views among the Western Powers. It would be a mistake to do this. The Western position is already in a straitjacket of the old formulas which, because they have been promulgated solemnly and publicly, make it almost impossible to maneuver and to negotiate. This suits those, some in very high places, who really do not want to negotiate. But in this changing world, in this changing Europe and changing Germany, the immobility of Western policy is a grave danger.

What then would be a better way to reply? It would be, it seems to me, to focus upon the thesis that the problem of Berlin can be settled only as and when there is a German settlement—that no solution, only at the most a de facto arrangement, is possible if Berlin is treated as an isolated problem.

If this were our thesis, then the next thing to do is to propose the beginning of negotiations about Germany. There are several ways to do this. One way would be to resume the discussion of a high level meeting, perhaps even at the summit. But this way is full of dangers and difficulties, and there is, I think, a better way.

It would be to take notice of the Soviet's standing proposal that the future of Germany be worked out by the two German governments. We could, then, ask the Soviet government whether it is willing to allow the two German governments to negotiate freely and whether it is willing to accept the result if they are able to agree upon the structure of a confederation.

It is almost certain, I believe, that the Soviet government will not agree to negotiations which are as free as that. It will insist on conditions. It will insist that the two Germanys must live within an arrangement which limits their armaments and their alliances.

Be that as it may, an Allied reply which took the line of a negotiation between the two Germanys would pose the basic question as to what are the practical conditions of a negotiated settlement—and what are the possibilities of an all-European security system.

I realize, of course, that a reply of this kind requires a serious modification of Dr. Adenauer's policy of the nonrecognition of the East German state. If he vetoes such a reply, the United States cannot now go over his head. But nevertheless it is a sound way to approach the German question, and it would have powerful support in the Western World, including Western Germany itself.

Indeed, it is hard to see how there can be any successful approach which does not begin with and recognize the facts of life—which are that there are now two Germanys and two Berlins, and that only slowly over a long period of time, and in the climate of national freedom after the foreign troops have departed, can the two Germanys become integrated again.

WEST WILL INVITE SOVIET TO PARLEY ON GERMANY SOON—PLANNING GROUP IN UNITED STATES ALSO PUTS EUROPEAN SECURITY ON PROPOSED AGENDA—BONN'S STAND MODIFIED—INSISTENCE ON VOTE BEFORE UNIFICATION IS DROPPED—NATO TO GET DATA

(By William J. Jorden)

WASHINGTON, February 6.—The Western Allies have agreed to invite the Soviet Union to join them at a foreign ministers' meeting in the near future to settle major differences.

The United States, Britain, and France will propose that the Four Power gathering take up a broad range of issues including the reunification of Germany and European security. They will reject a Soviet bid made January 10 for a 28-nation conference to work out a German peace treaty.

The unified Western Allied position on an East-West meeting was developed this week in Washington by a working group of diplomats representing the United States, Britain, France and West Germany. They were reliably reported to have completed the first phase of their task today.

NATO TO BE INFORMED

Their agreed position now will be transmitted to the North Atlantic Council in Paris for further discussion with other interested Governments.

It is expected here that the final form of the Western Allies notes will be decided next week and that separate messages from Washington, London and Paris will be sent to the Soviet Government within 10 days.

The West Germans are taking a new and considerably more flexible attitude toward the whole problem of German reunification. It was believed this new approach would considerably simplify the work of the Western diplomats in finding an agreed position with which to confront the Soviet leaders.

It was believed that if the Western Allies proposed a time for the foreign ministers' gathering it would be in March or April, probably April.

TALKS MAY SHIFT TO PARIS

The Western Powers probably would prefer holding such a meeting in Geneva or Vienna. They will turn down the Soviet proposals of Warsaw or Prague, mentioned in Moscow's notes as sites for a German peace conference.

The diplomats who worked out the West's answer to Moscow now will turn their attention to tougher problems. They will try to reach agreement on the positions the Western Allies will adopt on various problems likely to come up in any meeting with Soviet representatives.

There was a possibility the group might transfer its activities to Paris so it would be closer to Atlantic Pact headquarters. That would facilitate regular consultation with representatives of other Western Allied Governments, such as those of Italy, who have sometimes felt their views were not fully taken into account in determining Western diplomatic moves.

The first real sign that the Western Powers were prepared to face the Soviet Union with something new in the way of a German settlement was the fresh approach toward reunification the West Germans seemed to have adopted. Reliable sources said instructions embodying the alteration in the West German position had been received by the working group here.

Bonn's representatives now are prepared to discuss with their allies proposals for German reunification that would not include free all-German elections as a necessary first step.

As a further sign of West German willingness to compromise, the German diplomats were said to be ready also to talk about possibilities of face-to-face meetings with East German representatives. Such meetings, if they were held in the future, would not constitute negotiations in the view of the West German Foreign Ministry.

The West Germans' willingness even to consider such meetings with the East Germans represents a major shift in approach. It was believed here that West Germany's leaders were prepared to consider such meetings only because they recognized there probably would be no other way to work out steps toward unification in the absence of elections throughout Germany to select a government for a unified country.

Chancellor Konrad Adenauer is reported to be uneasy about making these shifts in his government's position. Apparently he is not convinced that they are either wise or can succeed. He has been willing to enable his representatives here at last to discuss them only as a result of considerable pressure inside West Germany and in recognition of his allies' desire to consider all possibilities.

It is clear that before there can be a Western Allied agreement on any proposal embodying these two ideas—postponing free elections for a time and setting up meetings with East German officials—there would be long scrutiny in Bonn. Chancellor Adenauer would have to be convinced that the results of these concessions would be a major advance toward reunification of his country in freedom.

All of these moves suggest that the Western Powers are prepared to produce a somewhat new and fairly comprehensive program for solution of the German problem. There is not too much optimism, however, among most competent observers that they will lead to any speedy or easy agreement with the Soviet Union.

These observers warn against a tendency to confuse progress inside the Western Alliance with an advance toward a settlement of major problems dividing the Communist and non-Communist worlds.

WARNING SIGNALS RAISED

Experts raise the following warning signals for those who are inclined to rush to the conclusion that quick agreement with the Soviet Union may be possible:

The Soviet Union may turn down the Western plan without further ado. Moscow has called for a conference on a German peace treaty that would do nothing about unifying the country. The Soviet leaders may insist that discussion of other issues is not necessary.

Moscow may insist that, if the Western Big Three are to take part in a foreign ministers' meeting, three Communist states also should participate. The West has refused to accept this parity argument in the past.

Despite Western willingness to revise its stand on German reunification, the Soviet leaders have given no sign they want or expect the two German states to be unified under any foreseeable circumstances.

Past meetings on German reunification and on European security have floundered on issues such as setting up control machinery, and there is no sign Moscow has changed its mind about these matters.

ADVANTAGES ARE NOTED

These and other factors cause many experts here to believe that there is little likelihood that a foreign ministers' meeting such as the West is about to propose has much chance of success. But they see the following advantages:

If a meeting can be arranged, it will provide an opportunity to explore how serious Moscow is about relaxing tension in the world.

While talks about Germany and European problems are underway, it is felt the Soviet Union will not press its threats to turn over its occupation function in East Germany to the German Communists, thus endangering the Western Allies' position in Berlin.

The West is desperately anxious to assume the initiative in relations with the Soviet Union, which Moscow has enjoyed so long, and the present situation opens the way to do so.

Secretary of State Dulles went to Europe this week to help work out the position the Western Allies will adopt toward the Soviet Union at a foreign ministers' meeting and in face of a threatened crisis over Berlin. It was reported here that if Moscow accepted the new Western Allies' bid for an East-West meeting, a preliminary conference of Western foreign ministers would precede it.

SOVIET SHIFT SEEN ON GERMAN VOTING—KHRUSHCHEV SAID TO SUPPORT FREE ELECTIONS IF THE TWO GERMANYS SET THEM UP

Moscow, February 3.—Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev was reported tonight to have offered support for a plan to unify Germany through free elections if West Germany consented to negotiate the arrangements with the East German Communist regime.

According to informed diplomats here, Mr. Khrushchev outlined this view at length for Dr. Hans Kroll, West German Ambassador, who was summoned to the Premier's Kremlin office yesterday. Deputy Foreign Minister Valerian A. Zorin attended the 2-hour-and-15-minute discussion.

[While various European capitals were sharpening discussions on Germany, Secretary of State Dulles left for London to discuss there and in Paris and Bonn a unified policy on Germany to present to the Soviet Union.]

SOVIET CRITICIZE PLAN

It was not known what other conditions and opinions were set forth by Mr. Khrushchev, who said a week ago that neither of the two Germanys could be eliminated "without touching off a world war."

West German diplomats here have refused all comment on yesterday's meeting. After it Dr. Kroll would say only that the matter was "very delicate" and that he could not comment. Llewellyn E. Thompson, Jr., U.S. Ambassador, presumably received a full briefing on the discussion at a talk with Dr. Kroll this morning.

The traditional Soviet view has been that the unification of Germany could be negotiated only by two existing governments without interference by the Big Four. The Russians have also maintained that the West's demand for free elections was nothing but a trick designed to "swallow up" the East German Communists and to incorporate a united Germany into the Atlantic Alliance.

Soviet leaders have expressed great interests in Secretary of State Dulles' recent comment that free elections were not the only way to unite Germany. In an obvious effort to demonstraate Soviet malleability on the subject, Mr. Khrushchev, in his speech to the Communist Party Congress last Tuesday remarked that he was not opposed to free elections.

The speech was especially severe on Chancellor Konrad Adenauer of West Germany, but it included this paragraph:

"Western propaganda loudly accuses the Soviet Union of opposing German reunification by free elections. We have never objected to free elections. But again the issue must be settled by the Germans themselves. We want all questions pertaining to German reunification to be solved by negotiations between the two German states and not the way Adenauer wants it—through pressure by foreign powers, through their interference in domestic affairs of the German people and by swallowing up the German Democratic Republic [East Germany]."

Mr. Khrushchev reiterated Moscow's support of a plan to "confederate" the two Germanys as a start toward complete reunification.

It is not known whether Mr. Khrushchev went any further yesterday. It is thought here that he wanted to outline Soviet views before the Germans, British and French began their talks with the Secretary of State Dulles, who flew to London today.

SIGNS OF SHIFT BY BONN

(By Sydney Gruson)

BONN, GERMANY, February 3.—There are signs that Bonn is beginning to come closer to Washington's thinking on the German question even before Secretary of State Dulles arrives here this week.

The latest indication concerns the necessity of making free elections a prerequisite for any moves toward reunification.

For years Chancellor Adenauer has insisted they must come first. But last night a leading member of the Chancellor's Christian Democratic Union backed away from this stand.

Dr. Heinrich Krone, majority leader in parliament, told a party meeting in Munich that while free elections remained a basic element for a German solution, they no longer needed to take first place in negotiations with the Soviet Union.

Mr. Dulles has said that reunification might be brought about without free elections, although that is the natural and preferable way. This leaves a gap between his position and Bonn's, but one not so wide as it was only last month, when Mr. Dulles voiced his stand.

Another important sign of change was a statement yesterday giving the West German Government's support to the idea of an East-West foreign ministers' conference on Germany before the end of May. That is Moscow's deadline for transferring Soviet responsibilities for access to West Berlin to the East Germans.

In general Chancellor Adenauer's thinking seems to be reaching for a new flexibility to match the appearance of flexibility in Mr. Dulles. But it concerns tactics, not the basic attitude that Dr. Adenauer has always preached, which is that any move weakening West Germany's close ties with the Atlantic community would be disastrous.

To observers here the rapprochement between Bonn and Washington seemed to have been made possible by the conviction that Mr. Dulles' fundamental policies also remain unchanged. Observers here believe that the Secretary's newly displayed flexibility concerns approach, not content.

The analysis made by both Western diplomats and many Germans in Bonn is that Mr. Dulles' maximum aim now is to test Moscow's readiness to make concessions on its long-standing German position. For that purpose a willingness to confer and some evidence of flexibility are essential.

But none of these observers really believe that there is any chance for essential change in the Soviet position. Therefore, the test would also be designed, if its results are negative, to show up Soviet intransigence.

For years the West has taken most of the onus for standing pat on Germany and refusing to explore compromise solutions. The minimum aim of the new tactic, it is believed here, would be to shift the blame in a way that is clearly illuminated to world public opinion.

Communist sources, speaking privately, have indicated that the Western appraisal of Soviet determination to maintain communism in East Germany is correct. It has been argued in the West, especially among Socialist Parties, that the pull of West Germany in any confederation would eventually overwhelm East German communism. But the Communists indicate that if such a thing ever seemed to be happening, the Russians would move back in, perhaps with force, to protect the territorial boundaries of their ideology.

POINTS 8 AND 9

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Dec. 29, 1958]

AN ALTERNATIVE IN EUROPE

Now that the West has delivered its reply to Moscow on the German question, the door is officially open for a Big Four conference this spring to discuss not only Berlin and not only Germany, but security arrangements for the whole of Central Europe as well.

The West has again made clear, quite properly, that it will not be thrown out of Berlin and will not recognize any unilateral changes of the present agreements controlling the city. But it has gone farther. It has invited a general negotiation on the whole problem of European security, and it has fortunately refrained from merely reiterating its own previously rejected proposals for the unification of Germany. If the Russians seriously want to talk, the stage is set.

It took the Allies just over a month to agree on this approach. They will now face a natural temptation to rest on their diplomatic oars and wait for the next step to be taken by the Russians. The temptation should be resisted. Instead of concentrating upon speculation as to what the Russians may propose in any negotiation, the West would better devote all its imagination and constructive effort to developing proposals of its own. And this means answering, first of all, soul-searching questions like these:

Can Western security requirements be satisfied without basing nuclear weapons on German soil?

Can the West get along without Germany in NATO?

Can the West accept a demilitarized zone across Central Europe including parts of all of Germany, Poland, and Czechoslovakia?

These questions need to be answered because they go to the heart of a possible alternative to the present situation of Central Europe. Nobody can know, of course, whether the Soviet Union would accept an alternative. We do know, however, that in its November 27 note on Berlin the Soviet Government proposed, in lieu of its threatened termination of the four-power status of Berlin, a German policy embracing:

"* * * the withdrawal of the Federal Republic of Germany from NATO with the simultaneous withdrawal of the German Democratic Republic from the Warsaw Treaty Organization and the achievement of agreement whereby, in accordance with the principles of the Potsdam agreement, neither of the two German states will have any armed forces in excess of those needed to maintain law and order at home and guard the frontiers."

Whether this suggestion offers a real basis for negotiation can be discovered only by detailed and confidential discussion. As Marquis Childs reports, a growing school of thought in Washington believes that the Russians do want an agreement on Germany, just as in 1955 they accepted an agreement on Austria, if they can get one without abandoning their position in Eastern Europe. But whatever the Soviet point of view, what is important for the West is its own point of view.

Our leaders ought to reexamine our position with great care. For if we could offer a safeguarded plan of military disengagement in Europe as an alternative to existing tensions, the West's moral position before the world would be immensely strengthened whether the Russians accepted it or not.

NATO LIMITS U.S. POLICY—PROBLEM OF GERMAN UNITY

(By Henry Brandon)

Neither Mr. Khrushchev's boast at the Moscow party congress this week that Russian intercontinental ballistic missiles are now in serial production, nor the prospects that the uncertainties of the Berlin situation will continue for some time, is likely to induce the United States to alter fundamentally its policy on Germany. This policy is tied directly to NATO military strategy.

With American ICBM development substantially behind Russia's. NATO, with its air and intermediate-range ballistic missile bases, is part of the diversification of the means of delivery by which the United States counterbalances the Soviet ICBM lead.

While the serious missile gap lasts, NATO, in the eyes of American military planners, will also remain for some time an indispensable supplement to the overall hydrogen deterrent of the Strategic Air Command. These facts impose limitations on substantial changes of NATO strategy and therefore on American policy on Germany. But they do not exclude the possibility of gradual modifications.

NOT INFLEXIBLE

It is ideas for such modifications that Mr. Dulles is studying now. For the first time, the American approach to the German question is not completely inflexible. Mr. Dulles is really searching for some freedom of maneuver for negotiation at the next four-power foreign ministers' meeting.

Though Mr. Dulles' modified approach to the German problem is more tactical than substantive, it has alarmed Bonn. Whenever the United States shows an inclination toward flexibility, Europe tends to tighten up anxiously; and whenever the United States remains unbending, Europe is critical.

CALL TO ADENAUER

But this time Mr. Dulles is imploring Dr. Adenauer, the West German Chancellor, that the initiative for a solution of the German problem must not become Moscow's monopoly. Mr. Dulles has finally come to this conclusion for these reasons:

1. It is no use going to a conference without having something to offer for negotiation.

2. He does not want to negotiate about Berlin only.

3. Americans believe the East German regime's position is so uneasy that it would be worth investigating some ways of associating it with an economically strong West Germany that would further test the regime's staying power.

4. There is some concern that, unless the West shows some flexibility in negotiations for the unification of Germany, West German public opinion might become restive. It is thought it is time to prove more convincingly that it is the Russians who are preventing German unification.

The reexamination of policy on Germany must not involve a withdrawal of American troops from all of West Germany—at least, not during the present stage of missile development.

This still leaves room for considering schemes such as putting the question of German nuclear rearmament on the bargaining table to find out what Russia would be willing to trade against it, and gradually associating the two Germanys with a view to eventual reunification.

If nothing else, Mr. Dulles is anxious to inquire more into the basic motives of Russian policy in Germany. His attempts to find out more about this from Mr. Mikoyan apparently failed completely. It is now concluded here that Mr. Mikoyan's mission was public, not private, diplomacy; but officials feel that, judging by Mr. Khrushchev's speech before the party congress, it was useful in that Mr. Mikoyan must have reported in terms relatively free of old dogmas about the real state of the American economy.

It is important to find out more accurately what motivates Russian policy in Germany because at present British and American estimates differ in emphasis. British experts believe that what prompted Mr. Khrushchev to stage the Berlin crisis was to force talks about Germany in general and the nuclear rearmament of West Germany in particular.

RUSSIA'S FEAR

The assumption is that the Russians are afraid West Germany ultimately will become the strongest continental member of NATO and then will try to use the fact to advance her own national aims.

On the other hand, State Department officials are more inclined to think that Mr. Khrushchev's objective is to bolster the shaky East German regime and make East Germany more proof against further internal disintegration. The United States seeks a middle way between the stand-fast position of Bonn and the British ideas, which are considered here to be too far reaching.

France has now informed the United States that she is against a foreign ministers' meeting before Mr. Khrushchev's deadline in May.

Though Mr. Dulles' new approaches are chiefly designed to wrest the diplomatic initiative from Moscow without abandoning basic principles, it is still uncertain whether Dr. Adenauer can be brought round to accept them. Here, as well as in London, it is hoped that a new phase in negotiations with Russia will soon begin, and that gradually progress can be made which would insure a lessening of tension.

EDITORIAL COMMENTS ON REMARKS

[From the Washington News, Feb. 13, 1959]

THE GERMAN PROBLEM

The State Department has welcomed the various ideas on Germany offered by Senator MIKE MANSFIELD for discussion and exploration. It promises to give the Senator's suggestions "careful attention" and study, as it will others offered in the same spirit—in search of a solution to a problem that, unsolved, remains a constant danger.

Some weeks ago Secretary Dulles set in motion a complete reexamination of all facets of this problem. Many of the ideas Senator MANSFIELD discussed are being studied and reweighed in the light of today's developments.

If the partition of Germany could be satisfactorily resolved with justice, some of the heat in the East-West conflict might diminish. Until then it remains a sort of time bomb in central Europe.

The chances may not be any better today than they have been in the last 13 years. But unless we are to reconcile ourselves to the present unsatisfactory and dangerous status quo forever, periodical new efforts must be made. The world does not stand still—nor does Germany.

Whether we like it or not, the Soviets have reopened this slumbering issue—and we must be ready within months to try to negotiate with them again. It will take the product of the best minds we have in this country to find a new negotiating formula—one that fits today's conditions in contrast to formulae which are now outdated.

Senator MANSFIELD made it clear that the responsibility for a new policy rests with the President and his Secretary of State, but that in the meantime the Senate has an obligation to debate, discuss, and advise. That is the way things are done in this country. To any who might be tempted to interpret either the Senator's speech or the continuing discussion of Germany in this country as a sign of division or confusion, Mr. MANSFIELD reminded:

"When the President speaks officially on Germany he will be speaking for all of us whether or not we agree with what he says."

[From New York Times, Feb. 14, 1959]

THE MANSFIELD PROPOSALS

The Western Powers are now engaged in a wholesale review of their policies on Germany in an effort to meet the Soviet ultimatum on Berlin with new initiatives and programs designed to test to the limit of any possible Western concessions the real Soviet intentions. Meantime the search for new programs and formulas continues, and while it continues a contribution of any new ideas and suggestions can be only welcome and helpful.

An attempt to make such a contribution has been made by Senator MANSFIELD, recognized as a Democratic expert in foreign affairs. In it the Senator has made some points which need constant emphasis. He is right in emphasizing that the problem of German reunification is the key to the peace of Europe and that this problem is now moving toward a crisis. He is equally right in calling on the administration, Congress and the whole West to stand fast in Berlin. He is also right in emphasizing that German reunification must be accompanied by a security system that safeguards both Germany's neighbors and Germany itself.

But in attempting to work out formulas for attaining these ends Senator MANSFIELD has been lured into propositions which can only throw confusion into the Western ranks, impair Western unity, and encourage the Soviets to press for a Western surrender. Indeed, there is an ominous, though of course unintentional, parallel between Senator MANSFIELD's proposals and those of Premier Khrushchev.

Like Premier Khrushchev, Senator MANSFIELD insists that there are now two German states, or political authorities, even if East Germany is ruled by puppets manipulated by Moscow, and that therefore German reunification can no longer be brought about by the Big Four Powers but only by talks between the two German regimes. If such talks involve a degree of recognition of East Germany, the Senator is willing to accept that, ignoring the fact that in practice this means either recognizing German partition or forcing West Germany into a deal with Moscow as East Germany's master.

Like Premier Khrushchev, who insists on preserving the social gains (meaning the Communist regime) in East Germany, Senator MANSFIELD is willing to accept a not fully representative democracy in East Germany, which would make the East German regime the Communist Trojan Horse in a united Germany. He thinks that East Germans should have "some genuine choice in the form of control exercised over them," but regards free elections as merely an unrealizable slogan—without making any suggestions as to how a genuine choice is to be manifested under a Communist regime.

Finally, and perhaps immediately most important, Senator MANSFIELD, like Premier Khrushchev, proposes to take Berlin out of the context of the German problem and deal with it separately. The Senator would reunite Greater Berlin under an all-Berlin government, withdraw the Western forces, and replace them first with a United Nations police force and later with German militia under NATO guarantees. Quite aside from the fact that the Soviets have already annexed East Berlin to East Germany, and that West Berlin belongs to neither West Germany nor NATO, this proposal not only prejudices Western rights in Berlin but is the surest way to a conquest of free Berlin by a Communist-dominated militia.

Senator MANSFIELD admits that he "can be wrong." He is wrong, we believe, on these points, and the sooner he rectifies them the better for the West and for peace.

MR. DULLES' ILLNESS

The news that Secretary Dulles' illness is cancer, and that he will have to take an immediate leave of absence while undergoing radiation therapy is admittedly a shock. This is not because the prognosis for cancer is as disheartening as it used to be, Mr. Dulles has great courage and great endurance. If any man in the condition indicated can recover, Mr. Dulles can, and that he will do so is the fervent hope and prayer that will go up everywhere in this country and throughout the free world. We need John Foster Dulles.

On the verge of 71 Mr. Dulles' physicial achievements as well as his intellectual labors have been remarkable—and even startling. Since becoming Secretary of State he has traveled 560,000 miles—well over a round trip to the moon. From Chancellor Adenauer in Bonn to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek in Taipei he has taught powerful individuals to depend on his personal presence and advice. The strain of this travel and the profound responsibility that went with it day and night, week in and week out, year in and year out, would have worn anybody down. Mr. Dulles endured these hardships like a good soldier. Now he is wounded and must retire from action for a time. That, too, is the destiny of soldiers.

No one can realize more keenly than Mr. Dulles how unfortunate it is that he cannot at this precise moment be fully active. We are approaching a crisis over the city of Berlin, over our entire relationship with Russia, and possibly over the immediate future of the whole free world. Senator MANSFIELD appeared to be arguing last Friday for what could be called an agonizing reappraisal of our European policy. Senator MANSFIELD's main thesis seems to us to be wrong, but he does have to be answered and alternatives have to be found.

Thus, at the very moment when the fruits of 6 years of the most arduous work are at stake, it is a tormenting situation that Mr. Dulles finds himself in. We fully believe, as must everyone who knows the man and his work, that his concern today is less for his personal well-being than for the security of his country and of the democratic world.

It may be that this present emergency will require us to reexamine the role and function of the State Department. We have placed too heavy a burden on one man—a devoted, intelligent, quietly heroic man. It was too much to ask.

It will now be necessary—not, we hope, to find a successor for Mr. Dulles—but to reorganize the top levels of the State Department to meet this crisis. The Department has extraordinarily able men, including the Under Secretary of State, now Acting Secretary, Christian A. Herter, and Deputy Under Secretary of State C. Douglas Dillon. Such men can be depended upon to carry forward the policies pursued by Secretary Dulles and approved by the President. But the lesson taught by Mr. Dulles' breakdown might lead to some change in the method of day by day direction of our foreign policy. The ultimate responsibility must rest with the Secretary and through him with the President. It may be, however, that thinking is more important than traveling. Mr. Dulles has been, in a way, the victim of the very ease with which men get around the world today.

In the weeks to come we shall undoubtedly see significant shifts in the front ranks of the State Department. The expected meeting of Western foreign ministers in Paris in March will not be called off because one man is unable to be there. Our national policies—to stand firm for even the smallest threatened islands of democracy, such as West Berlin, to offer conciliatory programs insofar as we can do so without compromising freedom—these have been fixed, are nonpartisan, and will endure.

We must now hope not merely for Secretary Dulles' safety and recovery but that we will continue for a long time to have the benefit of his advice. We need that advice far more than we need his physical presence in an airplane or in some faraway capital. For the country's sake as well as for his own, we wish him well.

THE WORLD PERSPECTIVE

It may be true, as is often said, that those who live at a given time cannot have as good a perspective on the events of their era as can historians writing decades afterward. Yet the effort to obtain perspective on one's own time is one that must be made, for without some kind of framework of interpretation there is only a chaos of unrelated, essentially meaningless facts.

The key to a perspective on the present world situation is recognition of the fact that we are right now in a time of swift change. An unfortunate symbol of that change is the news that Secretary of State Dulles is so ill that many of his difficult duties must be taken over by others. This misfortune was made known after Prime Minister Macmillan of Britain had decided to visit Moscow this week and Senator MANSFIELD had spoken on the Senate floor—in many respects unwisely—for changes in the Western approach to the problem of Germany. And behind these and other signs of ferment in Western political thinking and action is the ominous deadline Khrushchev has set for West Berlin, a deadline now little more than 3 months away.

In the Communist world there are change and tensions, too, though great efforts are made to hide that reality. The relations between the Soviet Union and China are obviously quite different today from what they were a few years ago when Communist China was still only recovering from the wounds of its civil war. Last weekend, for example, Moscow and Peiping celebrated the ninth anniversary of their treaty of friendship and alliance with much talk of unshakable unity. But the world of 1959 is not the world of 1950 and Krushchev's relation to Mao today cannot be and is not what Stalin's was.

It is also clear that the thunderous fusillades both Moscow and Peiping direct so often against Yugoslavia would not be needed if Yugoslavia's successful show of independence were not even now exerting an important attractive influence upon countries still subservient to Moscow. And within the Soviet Union itself the most corrosive agents of social and political change are at work: education, greater knowledge of the outside world, and the desire for a better, freer life.

What we do not know, of course, is the end result those signs of change and forces for change will bring. Premier Khrushchev, of course, speaks confidently of his inevitable victory. But he spoke confidently at the 20th Communist Party congress three years ago, too, little dreaming of the disasters he would suffer in Poland and Hungary within a year. The future, in short, is as inscrutable to him as it is to us.

What we do know, however, is that the changes now underway in the world are powerfully affected by the knowledge on both sides of the disastrous and universally suicidal potentialities of renewed world war. That knowledge is perhaps the greatest change of all in the human condition today as against all previous recorded history. Against this background it is clearer than ever that the changes now and in the future must take place under a compulsion if sanity prevails to maintain the peace. We may all hope that that compulsion will be effective, for otherwise humanity has no future.

MANSFIELD SPEAKS OUT

Senator MANSFIELD has made a speech outlining positive and constructive proposals for negotiating a settlement of the Berlin problem and the reunification of Germany. He is a careful and responsible man, a member of the Foreign Relations Committee and the deputy leader of the Democratic Party in the Senate. Senator LYNDON JOHNSON, the party leader, has by implication endorsed Mr. MANSFIELD'S proposals by saying that this was a great speech.

The Mansfield speech does not, however, necessarily reflect the thinking of Democrats in the Senate as a whole. It does lend the support of an enlightened and influential Senator to the call for flexibility in the American policy and in the approach of the Western nations as a group to the thorny Berlin question. Mr. MANSFIELD does not suggest any abatement of the Western decision not to be driven out of Berlin. He upholds all that Mr. Dulles has said on that score.

If Mr. MANSFIELD'S ideas can be summed up in any word, it is disengagement. He does not go as far in that direction as Mr. Mr. George Kennan, who has become the principal exponent of disengagement in the United States. However, Mr. MANSFIELD does suggest that the Rapacki plan for the establishment of a neutral zone in Central Europe be considered. That plan also figures largely in Mr. Kennan's thinking.

The deputy Democratic leader would have the United Nations help East and West Germany to negotiate an all-Berlin government, and in the case of success, United Nations might replace both Russian and Allied forces in the city. Otherwise, he would let Russian forces leave and Germanize the forces of freedom in Berlin under NATO guaranties. As for Germany as a whole, he is willing to have East and West Germans work out a plan for unification subject to the proviso that the East Germans have some choice in their own decision. And while he would limit armaments in German and Central Europe, he wishes the reunited Germany to continue its association with the Western alliance. These views are cogently presented and include a wealth of informative discussion.

This scheme goes far beyond anything that the Secretary of State could say at this time, or even hint at. Mr. Dulles must keep his plans completely covered, for as a negotiator he cannot expose his hand to the Russians. Mr. MANSFIELD can speak more freely. Mayor Willy Brandt of Berlin, now in this country, objects to his plan. Foreign diplomats in Washington are said to be shocked at the Mansfield speech. The shock may arise from fear that it may injure the West's negotiating position. However, there is nothing in the speech contrary to Mr. Dulles' Berlin statement that Western concessions were dependent on the Russians' making them too. And the speech may make it easier here at home for Mr. Dulles to offer concessions for a price. In any event, it will undoubtedly help in clarifying a situation that for the average citizen is as confusing as it is dangerous.

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 13, 1959]

MR. MANSFIELD'S PRESCRIPTION

Senator MIKE MANSFIELD has given a strong nudge to the administration in his suggestion of direct negotiations between West Germany and East Germany. The thoughtful discussion of the Berlin crisis by the Democratic whip goes farther than that of any other legislator to question cherished postulates of Western policy. Some of his assumptions, we think, are mistaken and others are unrealistic. Moreover, some of his remonstrances to the administration about past standpattism seem inappropriate after the State Department has begun to move in its approach to the problem. Nevertheless, it is highly useful to have encouragement from Capitol Hill for a searching examination of the possibility of arms limitation in Central Europe.

Mr. MANSFIELD would have the Western Powers safeguard their rights and access to Berlin, but he would have the East and West regimes negotiate toward a unified neutralized city. He would have a United Nations police force replace present Allied and Soviet troops; or, if this were impracticable, he would replace Allied troops with West German troops. He would abandon free all-German elections as a prerequisite for German unification (something Mr. Dulles already has done in effect). While continuing West Germany's ties to Western Europe, he would consider various proposals, including the Rapacki plan for arms control.

We have serious misgivings about two of Senator MANSFIELD'S proposals. The suggegestion for negotiations on unification of Berlin seems to us to approach the problem backward, because the division of Berlin reflects the division of Germany. It is difficult to conceive of any sort of city unification that would preserve freedom and still would survive as an island in Communist East Germany. Any stable unification of Berlin is likely to depend on the prior unification of Germany.

Similarly, we doubt the feasibility of bringing the United Nations into what, at root, is a dispute between two great power blocs, the Soviet Union and United States and its allies. The U.N. might be able to perform a simple police-type assignment; but without prior settlement in this situation the international organization would be subjected to impossible ideological pulling and hauling.

Mr. MANSFIELD is quite right, however, in saying that East Germany cannot be wished away. The West Germans have recognized the fact of the Communist regime in their trade relations. Of course, the practicability of negotiations would depend upon the Soviet purpose. Do the Russians want a settlement in the crisis they have created, or do they merely want to inhibit West German rearmament while perpetuating the division? It is unlikely that they will relinquish the Communist system in East Germany. How much room this leaves for acceptable compromise is debatable; but the West ought to find out.

The big point is that a divided Germany is in itself unstable. This is the basic flaw in the thinking of those who would just as soon see the division remain. The artificial separation is a canker in the consideration of other European problems. Furthermore, it is high time to abandon the shibboleth that nuclear armaments in West Germany are a sine qua non of Western defense and to look seriously at the feasibility of mutual East-West security arrangements.

That is why we think Mr. MANSFIELD has performed a service despite our disagreements on details. None of this, however, ought to obscure the basic prior necessity for specific Allied agreement on military defense of land access to Berlin. Counterproposals will be most useful if they stem from clear understanding of military intentions.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Feb. 13, 1959]

ACT FOR PEACE ON BERLIN ISSUES

This newspaper has strongly believed and said so, that the Western Powers should not merely await Russian initiative in the Berlin crisis. We should have our own policies, with the allied nations united to stand by them.

We should not just say "No," sit tight, wait it out. Moscow has announced intentions to pull out of the long-established, Four Power control of Berlin by May 27, demanding that the Western Powers get out also. And thereupon to leave Berlin, its communications, and the life of its people, to the East German Communist regime.

That regime is a firsthand agency of the Kremlin. The prospects of an inert western policy—a waiting game—or, worse still, of no definite policy at all, may be dangerous in the extreme. The Berlin crisis, and all that surrounds it, carries a threat of war.

The alternative is actively to seek ways and means—and we repeat, on a united front—to develop sound solutions of the Berlin and German unification problems.

The entire question has gained new widespread interest through the trip of now ailing Secretary of State Dulles among western European capitals. This has produced affirmations of allied rights. Also a movement has taken form, attributed to western leaders, for definite consultations with the Russians.

Yesterday, Senator MIKE MANSFIELD, called for United Nations conciliations to unify Berlin and ease the threats the Soviet-created crisis concerning it have raised.

Senator MANSFIELD'S voice is authoritative. He is assistant Democratic leader and a member of the Foreign Relations Committee. He is right in declaring the time has come for positive action and a great deal of talk between east and west Germans.

Mr. MANSFIELD put it this way: "We are approaching the beginning of the end of two Berlins and of two Germanys." He declared that standing fast in Berlin is simply a slogan and not enough.

His conclusion is profoundly significant—that immobility "* * * may well lead down the blind alley of an unnecessary conflict or disastrous diplomatic defeat."

Emphasizing that both Democratic and Republican leaders in Congress stand solidly back of the policy of refusing to be driven from Berlin, Senator MANSFIELD stresses the need for a western initiative for peace.

Such an initiative is required. Current dispatches from Europen capitals seem to envisage a movement for a Four Power Foreign Ministers conference to talk over the Berlin and German questions.

This would include Britain, France, Russia, and the United States. And an additional factor—the attendance as advisers of representatives of both West and East Germany.

The proposition would not, it is maintained involve recognition of Russian-controlled Communist East Germany. Its representatives would attend to consult with those of Russia; the West Germans to act in a similar way with the Western Powers.

We do not have to accept this idea as final. It may, however, be worth serious consideration.

These proposals and others aimed at German unification demand thoughtful study and action. They all look in one vital direction; that is, to prevent the Berlin situation from drifting toward perilous futility. The Berlin problem is the most important peace question of this time. On our side we should get down to cases and seek honest and honorable solutions to insure that peace, not grave new dangers, may come from them.

TALKING ABOUT BERLIN'S FUTURE—OUTPOURING OF THOUGHTS FOR SOLUTION SEEN REPLACING FORMER INFLEXIBILITIES

(By Doris Fleeson)

If there has been only a little thaw in the cold war, there has been a big one in talk about the future of Berlin and Germany which threatens to produce a flood.

Once the status quo of the Berlin situation promised to be breached, suggestions for dealing with that, with the reunification of Germany, and even with the whole European position have been pouring out from sources high and low. Thoughts which have been pent up by inflexibilities on both sides have now been released. It produces a marked contrast with periods only a short time ago in which all sides appeared bereft of ideas capable of producing any hopeful change in the cold war. Some of the ideas now being presented are useless on their face; some seem dangerous. But it should be a good thing to get talk going again, talk being, as often noted, infinitely less dangerous than war.

On the theory that the position of Berlin cannot well be dealt with without also dealing with the whole question of a united Germany, this appears to be accepted by the United States and its allies as well as the Soviet Union. It also is true that the question of a unified Germany, under whatever conditions, could hardly be dealt with without bringing up the whole European position which it would deeply affect. We are certain to be hearing about some daring proposals in this direction.

The practical difficulty of this is that if too great a task is set for the coming meeting of foreign ministers it would be less likely that it could come to the sort of agreement which would settle the immediate problem before us, which is the future of Berlin. Planning an agenda which is at the same time big enough to encompass the possibilities and limited enough to fall within the practicalities will be one of the great tasks to be accomplished before there is any meeting at all. Its accomplishment will not be as simple as falling off a log.

The direction in which State Department thinking has been going is demonstrated by the offer to have representatives of both the West and East German Governments participate in the conferences as attachés of delegations officially there. But this was followed with the tantalizing suggestion that the same might be done for representatives of Poland and Czechoslovakia. This was a bland way to pull the tail of the Russian bear.

There could be nothing more desirable to the Governments of Poland and Czechoslovakia than to be at the conference. They are as vitally concerned as France in what is going to happen to Germany. They are nearer to Germany than the Soviet Union, and for all the intimacy of their association with the Russians, they might have different ideas of where their interests lay than the Soviet Union would have. It was not a suggestion guaranteed to enchant the Russians.

Senator MANSFIELD, of Montana, who does both his homework and his fieldwork on foreign policy matters, has now reminded the Senate that 9 months ago he warned that body of the coming crisis in Germany.

"The question was never," he said, "Would Germany be unified? It was when and how Germany could be unified. We may now have begun to comprehend the 'when'; the actual process of unification is likely to begin this year. Only one question remains, How is Germany to be unified? Will it be by conflict, by negotiation, or by some mixture of the two? That is the question which is impelling us and the rest of the world toward the coming crisis in Germany."

[From the Washington Evening Star, Feb. 14, 1959]

BERLIN DANGER

Montana's Senator MANSFIELD has made a responsible and constructive contribution to the debate on the Berlin-German problem.

The Mansfield speech is not a partisan attack on Mr. Dulles or the Eisenhower administration. It is, rather, a notable effort to focus public attention on the great danger which lies ahead, especially with respect to Berlin, and to stimulate consideration of new approaches by the West to this problem.

The Russians have announced that, unless an agreement is reached, they intend to pull out of Berlin on May 27 and hand over their occupational responsibilities to the East Germans. We should assume that they mean what they say, and that Western protests will not stop them. It is in this context that Senator MANSFIELD, in what he described as carefully measured words, expressed to the Senate his belief that "just ahead lies the most critical period which the United States will have had to face since the conflict in Korea." At stake, he said, are the "lives of tens of millions of human beings, Americans included." This is a sober estimate, not an alarmist forecast, and it is of high importance that this be understood.

Senator MANSFIELD believes that Germany is going to be reunified—and by the West and East Germans themselves. This will come about peaceably or by force, and the latter course almost certainly would mean an enormously destructive war. Mr. MANSFIELD suggests a start in Berlin, hoping that this may produce patterns of unification which would be applicable to the problem of peaceful all-German unification.

In any event, he urges that Western policy, and particularly United States policy, be redesigned to accommodate and encourage peaceful unification.

"I submit," he said, "that a policy which merely clings to an unrealizable slogan of free all-German elections, which does not pursue German unification by other means, is no policy at all. It is a straitjacket. It is an excuse for immobility. It may well lead down the blind alley of an unnecessary conflict or disastrous diplomatic retreat."

The Montana Senator offered nine points for consideration. The first is rather vaguely stated—that "forces representing the concept of freedom in peace" not be driven out of Berlin. What he apparently has in mind is that German forces should be substituted as soon as possible for Western forces in Berlin. These German forces would be fully supported by NATO guarantees. In any plan of unification, he says, East Germans as well as West Germans must be free to express a political preference—even though the expression, in the case of the East Germans, may be recorded only in East Germany. Finally, Mr. MANSFIELD strongly urges a search for agreements which might lead to limitation of armaments through Germany and central Europe—even though this would entail genuine consideration of Communist-sponsored plans.

In a word, Senator MANSFIELD wants the West to get off dead center and begin serious work on a realistic plan. His specific suggestions may not be the best, nor does he contend that they are. And it is true, of course, that Mr. Dulles, prior to his latest illness, seemed to be moving closer to the Mansfield point of view.

But words are one thing; a policy is something else. The West has had plenty of slogans to fit the German situation.

Slogans, however, are not a policy, and it is a policy which is so urgently required.

[From the New York Daily News, Feb. 13, 1959]

ASK MARSHALL—HE KNOWS

Or should know, assuming he can learn from experience.

We're speaking of Gen. George C. Marshall. What brought him to mind was the much-touted speech Thursday by Senator MIKE MANSFIELD, Democrat, of Montana, on what to do about Germany.

It is MANSFIELD's lovely thought that the Western allies should gradually pull out of West Berlin and let the West German leaders and the East German Reds reunify Germany.

President Truman, back in 1945, had a similar lovely thought about China. He sent Marshall as his special envoy to pressure the Chinese Nationalists and Communists into setting up a joint government. The upshot of this cockeyed venture was that the Reds eventually squeezed Chiang Kai-shek out of mainland China.

Decent people cannot safely trust Reds—as Marshall must know now, and as MANSFIELD should have learned from Marshall's experience. When you do trust a Red, he cuts your throat.

It looks to us as if MANSFIELD, in the greatest of simple-minded good faith, is only proposing a plan to let the Reds grab all Germany sooner or later; probably sooner.

West German Chancellor Konrad Adenauer is not buying the Mansfield plan. Mayor Willy Brandt of West Berlin says it is based on a dangerous illusion. We hope it will be rejected just as flatly by the United States, British, and French Governments.

[From the New York Daily Mirror, Feb. 13, 1959]

A MISTAKEN PLAN

Senator MIKE MANSFIELD, of Montana, one of our abler Senators, proposes that East and West Germany do their own peacemaking and that the Soviet and United States troops in these countries be replaced by a United Nations force.

The proposal is made in the desire to avert war with Soviet Russia. Coming from Senator MANSFIELD, it must be regarded as representing a serious and sincere point of view.

Its weakness lies in the fact that Senator MANSFIELD ignores two historic factors:

1. West Germany is our ally. We have rebuilt that nation and it is a bulwark against Soviet imperialism.

2. His proposal is a modification of the Soviet plan and if accepted would represent another victory for Russia.

Therefore Soviet imperialism would be strengthened throughout the world and would become a greater problem.

It is therefore a self-defeating proposal, however well intentioned.

Furthermore, no matter how far from East Germany the Russians remove their troops, Russian trained and directed armies exist in Poland and in all the territory that surrounds East Germany.

Also, East Germany is a province of Soviet Russia politically and is governed by Kremlin appointees.

On the other hand, American troops to be moved an equidistance from Berlin, let us say, would have to be in the Atlantic Ocean and if, at a moment, Russia sent tanks into West Germany to take it over, the defensive force would be inadequate.

Finally, why should we move out of West Germany before our ally asks us to?

Mayor Willy Brandt of West Berlin does not ask us to leave that city.

Chancellor Adenauer does not ask us to leave West Germany.

Why should we accept an ultimatum from the Russians?

The day will surely come soon when even those Americans who prefer to remain blind will recognize the fact of history that, while it is true that we fought a war against Germany, it is equally true that our enemy is and has been Soviet Russia and that the Russian menace is draining our lifeblood as a nation.

Peace with Soviet Russia will not be found by sacrificing our allies until we have none. Peace with Soviet Russia can only come from strength.

The Russians understand strength; they laugh at cowardice.

RUSHING TOWARD UNITY

In an eloquent speech Senator MANSFIELD has offered some thoughtful and thought-provoking views on what he calls the coming crisis in Germany. His views had added significance in the light of the weekend announcement of Secretary Dulles' new illness.

Yet, for all the merit of the MANSFIELD assessment, we fear it contains a central defect. The key question, in Mr. MANSFIELD'S mind, is not whether Germany will be united but when and how. He thinks the when is already at hand, is beginning this year. To arrive at the how of it, he says that we must realistically acknowledge that the Communist regime in East Germany is not going to disappear voluntarily any more than the free Goverment in West Germany is going to choose to go out of business. Therefore, any form of unification is going to be less than perfect from the point of view of either West or East.

From this the Senator derives two further points. It is primarily the Germans, East and West, who are going to, and should, decide the how of unification. And, if the means are not to be war, it behooves the United States to put forth promptly fresh proposals designed to help the Germans achieve unity.

Now if the assumptions are correct, then the proposals which Mr. MANSFIELD does in fact put forth have a certain validity. He proposes that the Germans in both parts of divided Berlin start serious efforts to unify the municipal government, perhaps with a U.N. force supervising the agreement. And in this pattern he sees an application to the largest problem of unifying all Germany, though at some stage of the process all Germans must have some means of expressing their political preferences without the threat of terror.

But is the Senator's central assumption correct? Is it true that time and events are rapidly pushing toward German unification one way or another, and that we must therefore do everything possible to speed the process?

The Soviets, for their part, have never shown convincing interest in any kind of unity except under their complete domination. They have spurned free election, as advocated by the West, for nearly 14 years. They talk favorably of confederation without elections, but it is by no means sure they would even permit that unless it guaranteed their continued control of East Germany and a good chance to grab West Germany.

As for the Germans, the overwhelming majority in the Soviet Zone want freedom and perhaps they will rise again as they did in 1953, despite the presence of 22 Red army divisions. But that is in the realm of conjecture, hardly the basis for policy. In West Germany reunification is an emotional and political issue, but the West Germans aren't so frantic that they are determined to have unity this year no matter what; certainly they have no intention of trying to get unity by force.

So Mr. MANSFIELD may be offering somewhat unreal alternatives: That there must be a rapid unification of Germany, or else there will be a war. If that proposition is questionable, then there is some danger in rushing toward forms of unity, in Berlin and all Germany, that may not serve our interests in German freedom at all.

We might remember that not so many years ago this country exerted prodigious efforts to get the Chinese Nationalists and Chinese Communists to join in a coalition government. That was a tragic blunder; the upshot was not coalition but Communist conquest. The Czechs learned the same sorrowful lesson. The same danger lurks in plans for confederation or coalition with the Communists in Germany.

This newspaper believes the administration should welcome all fresh thoughts on dealing with Germany, for we agree with Senator MANSFIELD that it is a potentially explosive issue. We also believe that our policymakers should, in any new negotiations with the Soviets, be able to maneuver as much as possible within the limits of safety.

But, as these columns recently tried to indicate, it is essential to know what the limits are, to distinguish sharply between what is not vital to the interests of freedom and what is vital. In his understandable eagerness for German unity, Senator MANSFIELD comes close to confusing the two.

THE OPPOSITIONS UNITE

Senator MANSFIELD'S thoughtful speech on Germany in the Senate last week was a gratifying demonstration of constructive opposition. The assistant Democratic floor leader advanced not only specific proposals for the negotiation of a new status for Germany, but a most wholesome attitude. He urged our Government to accept first of all the reality that change is coming. Then he proposed that we adapt ourselves to change, that we approach it with creative imagination, that we undertake to guide it into channels serving Western security and world peace.

At last it has been clearly said by a responsible party leader that clinging to the old formula of German unification by free elections is not vital to the national interest. Now it has been said that we should go halfway toward the Soviet position and encourage direct negotiations between East and West Germany. Now it has been said that the Rapacki plan for a buffer zone free of nuclear weapons, and other plans for demilitarization of the border between East and West, should be parts of Western thinking. Now it has been said that military disengagement should be an objective.

Only a year ago ideas like these, when put forward by George F. Kennan in his English lectures, were energetically repelled by official Washington. That they are now seriously considered by the Democratic majority in the Senate, if not by the administration, is a measure of a revolution in Western thought.

It is now a deeply significant fact that the general ideas and attitude suggested by Senator MANSFIELD last week are shared by the responsible opposition leaders in Britain, Germany, and the United States. There is a strong presumption that in each country the opposition approach more nearly reflects current public opinion than does the official policy of the conservative government leaders.

The people yearn to face forward. They long to put behind them the stale deadlocks of the cold war. They seek an accommodation of national interests which involves surrender by neither side and yet lays the foundation for disarmament and the quelling of tension. The question is whether those who now hold power can recognize and adjust to this upwelling of popular opinion.

SIX MONTHS OF OPPORTUNITY

Because Premier Khrushchev's German note was issued in the atmosphere of a Berlin crisis, its proposals on West Berlin got the most attention. But as the note is studied carefully in Western capitals it may well take on more significance as a serious and carefully planned attempt to initiate a settlement on Germany as a whole. Since Germany cannot be separated from central Europe, the note must be regarded as bidding seriously for negotiation on European issues as well.

It seems to us supremely important that in formulating their reply the Atlantic Powers should avoid merely knocking down the Berlin proposals—even though, standing alone, these may call for knocking down. The Berlin question cannot be solved in a vacuum, but only as part of a general German settlement. The West would err most grievously if it failed to keep the door open for that kind of settlement, and if it failed to develop its own constructive and new proposals to that end.

The need for new proposals requires emphasis because there will surely be a strong temptation to repeat what the West has been saying for 10 years—that the whole German problem can be solved simply by reuniting East and West by free elections.

This formula, however desirable it may seem in the abstract, has become the excuse for inaction rather than a fruitful basis for settlement. Among the facts which must be faced as a part of today's world is the fact that the Soviet Union does not intend to permit integration of East and West Germany in a way which would permit the new Germany to become a military ally of the West.

To be perfectly fair, let it be said that the West would not permit a reunified Germany to arise as a military ally of Russia, either. Have we the right to demand from the Russians something we would not think of conceding ourselves?

If the old Western basis for a settlement is gone it does not follow, however, that all basis is gone—provided our leaders can face up to the realities and summon the resources of imaginative leadership that are needed. In holding out the possibility that East Germany could be withdrawn from the Warsaw Treaty Organization in return for West Germany's separation from NATO, Khrushchev seems to be renewing, with great emphasis, the Rapacki plan for a demilitarized belt through central Europe. In offering to accept U.N. supervision of a demilitarized Berlin, he may be hinting that similar international jurisdiction on a larger scale might be negotiable.

The Rapacki plan in its original form had obvious defects from the Western point of view. It proposed to bar nuclear arms from the two Germany's, Poland, and Czechoslovakia, but said nothing about conventional forces. A one-sided deal like that would leave the Communists with predominant power in Central Europe.

Now the plan has been revised by the Poles to embrace a two-stage agreement. In the first stage, nuclear armament in the area would be frozen while talks were held on reduction of conventional arms; in the second, nuclear and conventional disarmament would be carried out simultaneously.

This plan also may be inadequate. But would it not be far better for the West to bring forward its own proposals for the demilitarization of central Europe, including Germany, than to go on pressing for the permanent incorporation of Germany into the western military alliance? The West might, for example, insist on U.N. supervision of the demilitarized zone and on a balanced withdrawal of both Soviet and Western forces from it. Other conditions to assure good faith performance of the contract could be added.

Within some such central European settlement it might be possible to work out a German settlement along the lines increasingly mentioned of late in both Germany and Russia. The West could give up its aspiration for an all-democratic Germany and Moscow its hopes for an all-Communist Germany. The two Germanys could be brought together in some form of confederation or dual state which preserved the political and social structure of each but denied them both the military means to threaten aggression either way.

Whether any settlement along these lines is possible can be doubted, but it is worth thinking about if only to get away from the stereotypes and frozen formulas that have blocked any better settlement all these years. If by good fortune a confederation did work out to everybody's satisfaction, then the Berlin problem could be solved at last. It is most unlikely to be solved without a general German settlement.

In any event, the West should prepare itself to negotiate on Germany during the next 6 months, and should do its best to develop fresh, creative proposals. It is well to remember that a demilitarized central Europe verifiably free of nuclear arms might be quite as much to our advantage as to the Soviet Union's.

UNITED STATES SAYS SOVIET IS PACT VIOLATOR—ACCUSES MOSCOW OF ALTERING HISTORY—LISTS BREACHES OF POTSDAM AGREEMENT

(By E. W. Kenworthy)

WASHINGTON, November 30.—State Department officials charge that, contrary to Moscow's complaint that the West has violated the Potsdam agreement, the Soviet Union itself has broken that agreement as well as other accords on Germany.

These officials have had long experience with what is viewed as Soviet rewriting of history. Nevertheless, they are amazed at what they consider brazen historical distortion and twisted logic in last week's Soviet note on Berlin.

In a speech November 10, Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev called for ending the occupation status of Berlin on the ground that the West had violated the Potsdam agreement, which does not even mention Berlin.

Last Thursday's Soviet note proposing that West Berlin be made a free city did not repeat this error. It specifically denounced two agreements dealing with occupation zones and the four-power control of Berlin.

Nevertheless, the note still charged at length that the Western Powers had violated the Potsdam agreement, which was reached August 2, 1945, by the United States, Britain and the Soviet Union.

Following are essential provisions of the Potsdam agreement and of the accord on the Allied Powers' assumption of supreme authority, with the Soviet violations as charged here. This compilation is based on a document prepared in 1955 for the Senate Judiciary Committee by State Department sources.

THE POTSDAM AGREEMENT

Agreement: So far as practicable the occupying powers should accord uniformity of treatment to the German population in their respective zones.

Violation: Beginning in June 1952, East German authorities, under Soviet direction, undertook to isolate the East Germany population from contact with the West, particularly West Germany. The program was aimed chiefly at reducing the exodus of East Germans, which reached 1 million in 1952. Except for crossing points in Berlin, the interzonal frontier was closed. Substantial parts of the population, including entire villages, were forcibly evacuated from a 3-mile-wide zone along the West German frontier.

Agreement: Germany should be completely disarmed and demilitarized and industry capable of military production should be eliminated or controlled.

Violation: The Soviet Union established in East Germany a police force of approximately 110,000 men that, because of its training and equipment, was actually military in character. This was supplemented by an equal number of paramilitary security and border police. To counter this violation, the West decided to raise and arm a West German force to be incorporated into the Atlantic alliance.

Agreement: The administration of Germany should be directed toward the decentralization of the political structure and the development of local responsibility.

Violation: Soviet authorities restricted the activities of non-Communist parties by depriving them of facilities equal to those of the Socialist Unity Party, interfered in their affairs and coerced their leaders.

Agreement: Subject to the need for maintaining military security, freedom of speech, the press and religion was to be respected and free trade unions were to be permitted.

Violation: Soviet authorities, by police and party intimidation and suppression, have eliminated freedom of speech and the press. Basic human rights and legal processes have been denied. The authorities have resorted to arbitrary seizures of property, detentions, deportations and forced labor.

Agreement: During the occupation period Germany was to be treated as a single economic unit, with common zonal policies on transportation and communications.

Violation: From the beginning the Russians followed a unilateral economic policy, and made trade across the zonal borders more difficult than is customary across national frontiers.

Agreement: Reparations payments should be scaled to leave enough resources for the subsistence of the German people without external assistance.

Violation: The Russians took large amounts of reparations from current production and absorbed a substantial amount of industry into state-owned enterprises. They have refused to submit detailed reports on reparations removals.

Agreement: The western frontiers of Poland, in conformity with a Yalta Conference decision, were to await a peace settlement.

Violation: On July 6, 1950, East Germany and Poland signed an agreement making the Oder-Neisse demarcation line the definitive German-Polish frontier.

AGREEMENT ON GERMANY

Agreement: A Kommandatura, consisting of four commandants in Berlin, was to direct the city's joint administration.

Violation: On July 1, 1948, the Soviet representative walked out of the Kommandatura, and Soviet authorities announced they would no longer participate in any meetings. This destroyed the quadripartite control machinery. The Berlin blockade from July 2, 1948, to May 12, 1949, was also directed at destroying the four-power status and driving the West out of Berlin.

Agreement: During the period when Germany was carrying out the requirements of unconditional surrender, authority on matters concerning the whole country was to be exercised by a control council of the four zonal commanders in chief.

Violation: On March 20, 1948, the Soviet commander unilaterally adjourned a meeting of the council and walked out, thereby ending its operations.

TOWARD A GERMAN SETTLEMENT

(By Sir Ivone Kirkpatrick)

Recent Russian moves in regard to Berlin and the German problem mark a significant change. At Geneva in 1955 and in the course of subsequent exchanges, Mr. Khrushchev's attitude has been that a German settlement can wait. He believes that time is on his side and that he holds the trump cards. After all, Dr. Adenauer is not eternal. When the climate becomes more favorable, ways and means could be found of reaching a settlement acceptable to Russia.

If necessary, the Soviet Government will be in a position to offer Germany massive inducements which the West could not hope to match: the return of the lost provinces and the restoration of Germany's traditional trade outlets to the east. Moreover, the rising standard of life in Russia would make communism less repugnant to the German masses and so facilitate a Russo-German understanding. Meanwhile, it is of course essential to preserve and sustain the Communist regime in Eastern Germany. This in brief has hitherto been the Russian attitude.

It would be idle to speculate on the motives which have brought the Kremlin to abandon the waiting game and to choose this moment to force the German issue. It may be Mr. Khrushchev's method of securing the conference for which he has long been pressing. If the Western Powers decide to open negotiations, their problem is to resolve on which points they must stand firm and on which a compromise is tolerable in the interests of a German settlement.

In the matter of German unity Russian and Western interests are fundamentally divergent. Russia is opposed to German unity on anything like Western terms, not because she is afraid of a German military resurgence, but on purely political grounds. Mr. Khrushchev has avowed that he will do his utmost to disrupt NATO; and no more effective step could be taken than to remove Germany from the organization and to secure the withdrawal of all remaining NATO forces to an indefensible strip on the continent.

Secondly, Russia cannot afford to sacrifice the Red leaders in Berlin, so losing her foothold in Germany and demoralizing her henchmen in the satellite countries. Thirdly, the establishment of a free Germany would bring freedom to the frontiers of Poland, which would henceforth find herself in the situation in Yugoslavia, that is to say of a country sustained in the struggle for independence by direct access to the West.

The Western Powers, on the other hand, are bound both by honor and by motives of self-interest to maintain that Germany must be unified in freedom. Article 7 of the Bonn Convention of May 26, 1952, provides that: "The three powers (Britain, United States, and France) and the Federal Republic will cooperate to achieve by peaceful means their common aim of a unified Germany enjoying a liberal-democratic constitution like that of the Federal Republic and integrated within the European community." This clear obligation has subsequently been confirmed by more than one undertaking and could not be repudiated without dishonor.

But self-interest also demands that we should not connive at the dissolution of NATO. In particular the Russian proposals for the neutralization of Germany are fraught with danger. Nobody who knows Germany believes that it will be possible to neutralize this dynamic nation for very long. If Germany's ties with the West are cut, if there ceases to be a pull from the West, it is foolish to believe that there will be no pull from the East. The Germans, feeling abandoned and betrayed by the West, are likely to move in a short time into the orbit of Soviet Russia.

My conclusion, is therefore, that on the basic issue of German unity there is little room for maneuver or compromise. The same is true of Berlin. Here again the Western Powers are bound by solemn obligations and self-interest to oppose the incorporation of West Berlin with Eastern Germany. The obligations are clear enough. They have been deliberately assumed by successive Western governments and made the subject of constant public declarations over the years.

Self-interest is equally clear. No greater blow could be delivered to our position in both Germanys or to our friends behind the Iron Curtain than tamely to surrender Berlin. The Soviet Government, who are not really incommoded by our presence, are well aware of this. Hence the sporadic Russian efforts during the past 12 years to encroach on and eventually to liquidate our rights in Berlin.

The fact, however, that we cannot give much ground on the issues of German unity and Berlin does not necessarily mean that we should reject the idea of any negotiation with the Russians. On the contrary. So long as Germany is divided and Berlin remains isolated there will be a constant danger to peace in Europe. Consequently it would be worth making substantial concessions which do not violate our obligations, always provided of course that they were part of a bargain which brought us closer to a German settlement.

I do not believe that, having regard to the position taken up by both sides, it would be realistic to expect that a final comprehensive agreement could be reached at this stage. But it might be possible to take the first step toward one. The various proposals hitherto made for disengagement have for one reason or another proved unacceptable, but ingenuity might devise a scheme, which although not wholly free from objection, could be justified by the advantages flowing from the settlement of which it formed a part. I personally have always been attracted by the idea of a demilitarized strip across Europe on both sides of the Iron Curtain. It may be that this would find no favor with the Russians, but I should like to see the conception explored.

Other matters which might profitably be discussed are the old Russian proposals for European security and the possibility of achieving a progressive reduction of the rival forces in Western Europe. Finally it would be interesting to find out if the Russians really attach importance to a ban on the establishment of nuclear weapons on German territory and, if so, what concessions they would be prepared to offer in return for such a ban.

If the Western Powers embark on discussions with Russia, they must reconcile themselves to the self-evident truth that, unless they are prepared to make some concessions, the negotiations are bound to end in early deadlock and an aggravation of the situation. In their present mood of self-confidence the Russians are not going to give away anything for nothing. Secondly, the Western Powers must clear their own minds as to what is vital and what, although important, can be the subject of compromise, always provided that the price paid corresponds to the concession received.

Finally, the West must be united. Before the Conference of Foreign Ministers in Paris in 1948 representatives of the Western Powers met (Mr. Dulles was in the American team) for over 3 weeks in order to define an agreed position on all the contentious points which might arise. In the event this preparation proved very advantageous and the example then set might well be followed again. Today in the face of Russia's growing self-assertiveness the need for Western unity is greater than before; and unless we have reason to believe that we can enter and leave a conference united, it would be better not to negotiate at all.

GERMANY IN REVIEW

One obvious result of the accession of Senator FULBRIGHT to the chairmanship of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee will be to encourage the administration in new foreign policy initiatives. Those who fear that this may lead to discomfiture or disadvantage for the West are in our opinion mistaken. Mr. FULBRIGHT and his colleagues are no more anxious than Secretary Dulles to impair Western interests; and in any event the execution of foreign policy will remain an Executive responsibility. But a willingness to explore new ideas could help break the East-West ice jam to which old rigidities have contributed.

For some days Mr. Dulles has been talking a more flexible approach. Perhaps his conference last night with Mr. FULBRIGHT, and the endorsement of Senator MANSFIELD for his trip to Europe today, will supply an additional nudge. It will be useful for Mr. Dulles to confer with leaders in London, Paris, and Bonn in the light of what was learned from Mr. Mikoyan's visit, for an East-West foreign ministers' conference surely is approaching.

The most immediate problem, of course, concerns Berlin. Soviet leaders have been at pains to soften the impact of their ultimatum. But the West will need a firm plan if the Russians do proceed with their announced intention of turning the administration of East Berlin over to East Germany. Would it be wise for the West to decline to deal in any way with East German authorities as Chancellor Adenauer has urged despite West Germany's own trade with the East? Or could the West reasonably regard East Germany as an agent of the Soviet Union so long as no blockade were involved?

In this newspaper's judgment there would be no loss of principle in allowing East German officials to stamp documents so long as access to West Berlin remained unimpaired. But it ought to be made absolutely clear that such access will be defended—and on the ground as well as in the air. It is doubtful whether a 1948–49 type airlift could supply West Berlin's needs today. In any event, protection of the land corridor is basic to the Western position.

There is little indication, on the larger question of German reunification, that the Soviet Union and the West are talking the same language. Every sign still points to a Soviet intention to preserve communism in East Germany at any cost; and it is hard to see how the Soviet proposal for confederation could be anything other than a facade for continuing the division of Germany. But neither West Germany nor the West in general is under any compulsion to buy a pig in a poke. It will be worth exploring various suggestions for reunification, with accompanying security assurances, to learn how far the Russians are willing to go.

On another matter—trade with the Soviet Union—it also looks as if a Western understanding needs to be strengthened. If it is true that West Germany is undertaking to sell to Russia the same sort of steel pipe which the United States denied Mr. Mikoyan, evidently the signals have been mixed up. Under Secretary of State Dillon properly has called Mr. Mikoyan to account for exaggerating the American strategic restrictions on trade. At the same time, Western Europeans may want to inquire whether this country is withholding export permits for items not on the strategic list, and if so, why.

These are the sorts of subjects upon which it is important to have a meeting of minds in the West. It may well be, as Chancellor Adenauer and President De Gaulle of France apparently assume, that no form of disengagement or other detente with the Soviet Union would be possible now without seriously harming West Germany. But it will be useful to find out the Soviet terms, and perhaps, with Senator FULBRIGHT'S encouragement, Mr. Dulles will make the effort. If nothing else should come of Western initiative, it would at least place the burden of continuing the cold war on the Russians.

KENNAN RENEWS HIS GERMAN PLAN—TELLS SENATORS U.S. POLICIES NEED A SHARP REVISION—FAVORS NEUTRAL STATUS

(By Russell Baker)

WASHINGTON, February 4.—George F. Kennan put his controversial argument for a sweeping revision of the U.S. policy on Germany before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee today.

Testifying before its subcommittee on disarmament, Mr. Kennan, a former chief of policy planning for the State Department, proposed that the United States consider negotiating a kind of neutral status for a reunited Germany in return for a Soviet pullback from Eastern Europe.

The new status of Germany, he said, should then be enforced my making it absolutely clear to the Soviet Union that any violation would be a provocation of war.

Mr. Kennan, replying to questions, doubted that a Western withdrawal from Germany would strengthen the Communists for an attempt to win control of the Government. As a political threat, he asserted, communism has become an ineffective force in Europe when it has to work in a democratic milieu.

"I think communism as an ideology is dead, not only in Western Europe but throughout a great portion of the European continent, and it will never again be a great, pulling, emotional force," he said.

Mr. Kennan's proposals, first propounded last year in lectures for the British Broadcasting Corp., have been denounced by Secretary of State Dulles and by Dean Acheson, his predecessor in the Truman administration.

Despite this formidable opposition, the Kennan idea for a new approach to the stalemated problem of central Europe has persisted and has had a deep impact on the thinking of the young Senators who are becoming the Democrats' influential spokesmen on foreign policy.

Today, for example, Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, Democrat, of Minnesota, and subcommittee chairman, put himself in broad agreement with many of Mr. Kennan's ideas. He praised Mr. Kennan for a "frank and long-overdue statement" of how the United States could take "a more flexible approach" to the German problem.

Senator J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT, new chairman of the full committee, said at a news conference last week that he would like to see Mr. Dulles move off "dead center" and consider new approaches to a whole range of world problems, including the possibility of a central European settlement based on the Kennan disengagement idea.

What is significant is that Mr. Kennan's proposals have survived the attacks of the eluders of both parties and are coloring the thought of influential young Senators at a time when the country seems headed for another conference with the Soviet Union on the German problem.

In his testimony today, Mr. Kennan said real disarmament would depend on prior relief of political tensions, which now exist most acutely in the "crucial and neuralgic area" of central Europe.

The "best we can hope for" from a negotiated settlement, he said, would be the following:

The reunification of Germany free of the Soviet orbit.

A new condition in which Eastern Europe could evolve toward greater national independence from Soviet dominance.

A clearly defined and mutually acceptable agreement of Germany's new status, so carefully phrased that it would not be susceptible to violation, as some agreements with Moscow have been.

The withdrawal of both Eastern and Western military forces from Germany; an agreement that Germany should not have nuclear weapons or weapons for strategic attack; a conventional German defense force strong enough to prevent incursions.

Achievement of such a result, Mr. Kennan went on, would involve Western concessions. He said that changes in Western policy should be made only as part of a package settlement, not beforehand.

IN SEARCH OF A NEW APPROACH?

(By Erwin D. Canham)

Secretary Dulles is on his way back to Washington after one of the most important diplomatic missions of his career. It seems evident in the dispatches from Bonn, Paris, and London that while there may be agreement among the four Western Allies on general aspects of the German problem, no bold new policy has been decided upon. It may be that Secretary Dulles is still in search of some constructive new approach to the Kremlin.

Indeed, the official and unofficial statements made at Bonn as the Secretary departed included hints and bids to the Soviet. Thus, Mr. Dulles and Chancellor Adenauer alike plainly intimated that concessions on the Soviet side would be matched by concessions from the Allies.

As. Mr. Dulles put it, the talks "will help to assure that we shall be united and firm for our rights," although "that does not exclude being conciliatory, but it does exclude merely making concessions for which there is no counterpart." In plain language, that simply says to Moscow: "What do you have to offer?"

TIMETABLE SET

Although the Western Powers are still in the position of merely asking questions, they have at least agreed on a timetable of procedures. Prime Minister Macmillan is leaving for the Soviet Union on February 21. This trip may be the most important act of Western diplomacy thus far. Mr. Macmillan, who is the most flexible of the Western heads of state, and whose public opinion most eagerly wants an agreement with the Soviet, is going to try to find out what the Soviet leaders want, and what they intend, in Berlin and in Central Europe generally. He will be back from Moscow in time to report to a meeting of foreign ministers in Paris in mid-March.

Before that meeting, however, the Western Powers will answer the Kremlin's note of January 10 calling for a German peace conference of 28 nations from East and West alike. Doubtless they will reject this grandiose and premature proposal, and suggest instead a meeting of the foreign ministers of the United States, Britain, and France with the Soviet.

There will also be a further meeting of the Western foreign ministers in Washington in early April, when they gather to observe the 10th anniversary of NATO.

Finally, there may well be a full-dress conference with the Soviets—one report is for a meeting in Vienna in May. All together, the diplomatic schedule is full. Each of these steps seems needful in order to coordinate Western policies and to talk things over with the Soviets. But Moscow may have very different ideas. It generally does.

STILL DIFFERENCES

From the Western side, it seems apparent that not very much beyond the timetable has been agreed. Despite the amiability, and the undeniable utility, of the Dulles talks, there are hints of unresolved differences. Leaving Bonn today, the Secretary said he and Chancellor Adenauer had a similarity of thinking and planning.

He explicity did not use the word "identity," but "similarity." And it is doubtless accurate. It might also have been applied to Paris and London.

From everything that has come from the three capitals, the basic positions of the governments remain as they were: with Bonn and Paris firmly determined to yield no ground to the Soviet; with London eager to explore new possible solution; with Washington somewhere in between. And so the so-called reappraisal of policy must continue.

The Soviets did not aid in the reappraisal last week. The statements coming from Moscow were blatantly contradictory. Premier Khrushchev was reported to have suggested to West German Ambassador Kroll a plan to unify Germany through free elections, if only Bonn would negotiate with the East German Republic. But at the final session of the party congress, this same Khrushchev said that the Soviet Union would never tolerate any plan that called for abolishing the socialist (Communist) system in East Germany.

The two statements are in flat conflict. For everybody agrees that free elections—if followed—would mean the downfall of the Communist system in East Germany. It would be voted out by overwhelming margins. Thus Khrushchev was talking out of both sides of his mouth.

It is generally agreed that the East German puppet government is the weakest Communist regime in the entire satellite system. One spokesman in Bonn declared Mr. Dulles felt East Germany was an albatross around Khrushchev's neck. But it is an albatross that he shows no willingness to give up.

In fact, East Germany is a buffer around some of the Communist boundary states which insulate the Soviet Union from the nations it regards as its enemies. Could this buffer area possibly be given up? Could the satellites be exposed to direct contact with a powerful, dynamic West-oriented German republic? At best, only if it were strictly neutralized. And that means the demilitarization of all of Germany if Germany is to be unified. Could the West accept such terms? Not in present military thinking. The Soviet has suggested such terms through the Rapacki plan, and Mr. Dulles testified the other day that this plan would place the West at a substantial military disadvantage.

Two problems should be distinguished: that of Berlin, and German reunification. Some kind of solution of the problem of Berlin alone is not very difficult. Just to deal with the East Germans as agents of Moscow might be such a solution. Mr. Dulles himself referred to this solution in November, and Mayor Brandt of Berlin, speaking on Meet the Press, replied a little ambiguously that if Moscow itself identified the East Germans as its agents perhaps it would be a workable idea.

EXPLORING SOLUTIONS

So there are solutions of the Berlin problem on which both sides could agree. Perhaps Mr. Macmillan will explore such a solution while he is in Moscow. But the problem of reunification of Germany comes back to the Soviet necessity of keeping an area of insulation around its satellite states.

The price of reunification, therefore, remains demilitarization. The West has offered a partial demilitarized belt, and has added guarantees against German aggressions. Such pledges are doubtless not enough for the Soviets.

At present, no terms which both sides could accept are in sight. A recent poll among the West Germans showed only 14 percent who thought peaceful reunification was possible. And so the question remains remote. The West Germans are understandably unwilling to cut their ties with the West for the sake of reunification which would be fraught with economic and political problems. But, of course, they are determined to help West Berlin remain free, and hence would be much more flexible on the Berlin question, which is a serious problem, than on the reunification matter, which is more remote.

From the Western capitals come expressions of respect for Secretary Dulles which have not always been the dominant notes there. It is quite apparent that few responsible statesmen indeed are very confident of next steps in the German situation apart from the diplomatic calendar, and there is an appreciation of the laborious and useful nature of Mr. Dulles' trip.

An expression of this attitude also came from Senator MIKE MANSFIELD, of Montana, a Democrat who has frequently criticized Mr. Dulles' conduct of his post. Said Senator MANSFIELD: "I assume that Mr. Dulles' first-hand conversations with our allies will result in some unified move to break away from the old rigid position of trying to settle the German question on the basis of free elections alone.

"Although there has been some criticism of Mr. Dulles in the past, I think it has been largely constructive criticism and that we Democrats have given him rather solid backing for 6 years. In the 2 years that lie ahead we'd like to help him in every way we can. We want him and President Eisenhower to take the leadership in finding some solutions to our grave problems. We hope and think they will do it, and they will have our solid support."

That is as explicit a statement of bipartisan support as has been heard for some time. As given on the American Broadcasting Co. network.

THE BERLIN-GERMAN PROBLEM, AND THE SPEECH BY SENATOR MANSFIELD

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, the Washington Evening Star of Saturday, February 14, comments editorially on the responsible and constructive contribution to the debate on the Berlin-German problem made by the Senator from Montana on the preceding Thursday.

Although the intervening shock of the sad news of the seriousness of the illness of the Secretary of State, Mr. Dulles, has naturally tended to overshadow the substantive discussion of the impending crisis in Berlin and Germany, this discussion cannot be suspended for long. There is, indeed, a new urgency now.

The Star editorial is a good start.

In a word—

It concludes—

Senator MANSFIELD wants the West to get off dead center and begin serious work on a realistic plan.

I ask that the Star editorial be included in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BERLIN DANGER

Montana's Senator MANSFIELD has made a responsible and constructive contribution to the debate on the Berlin-German problem.

The Mansfield speech is not a partisan attack on Mr. Dulles or the Eisenhower administration. It is, rather, a notable effort to focus public attention on the great danger which lies ahead, especially with respect to Berlin, and to stimulate consideration of new approaches by the West to this problem.

The Russians have announced that, unless an agreement is reached, they intend to pull out of Berlin on May 27 and hand over their occupational responsibilities to the East Germans. We should assume that they mean what they say, and that Western protests will not stop them. It is in this context that Senator MANSFIELD, in what he described as carefully measured words, expressed to the Senate his belief that "just ahead lies the most critical period which the United States will have had to face since the conflict in Korea." At stake, he said, are the "lives of tens of millions of human beings, Americans included." This is a sober estimate, not an alarmist forecast, and it is of high importance that this be understood.

Senator MANSFIELD believes that Germany is going to be reunified—and by the West and East Germans themselves. This will come about peaceably or by force, and the latter course almost certainly would mean an enormously destructive war. Mr. MANSFIELD suggests a start in Berlin, hoping that this may produce patterns of unification which would be applicable to the problem of peaceful all-German unification.

In any event, he urges that Western policy, and particularly the U.S. policy, be redesigned to accommodate and encourage peaceful unification.

"I submit," he said, "that a policy which merely clings to an unrealizable slogan of free all-German elections, which does not pursue German unification by other means, is no policy at all. It is a straitjacket. It is an excuse for immobility. It may well lead down the blind alley of an unnecessary conflict or disastrous diplomatic retreat."

The Montana Senator offered nine points for consideration. The first is rather vaguely stated—that "forces representing the concept of freedom in peace" not be driven out of Berlin. What he apparently has in mind is that German forces should be substituted as soon as possible for Western forces in Berlin. These German forces would be fully supported by NATO guarantees. In any plan of unification, he says, East Germans as well as West Germans must be free to express a political preference—even though the expression, in the case of the East Germans, may be recorded only in East Germany. Finally, Mr. MANSFIELD strongly urges a search for agreements which might lead to limitation of armaments through Germany and central Europe—even though this would entail genuine consideration of Communist-sponsored plans.

In a word, Senator MANSFIELD wants the West to get off dead center and begin serious work on a realistic plan. His specific suggestions may not be the best, nor does he contend that they are. And it is true, of course, that Mr. Dulles, prior to his latest illness, seemed to be moving closer to the MANSFIELD point of view.

But words are one thing; a policy is something else. The West has had plenty of slogans to fit the German situation. Slogans, however, are not a policy, and it is a policy which is so urgently required.

PROPOSED CONFERENCES ON GERMAN SITUATION

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I should like to add another thought to the remarks on the German situation which I made last Thursday. At that time, the extent of the illness of the Secretary of State was still unknown. It was generally assumed that he would be physically fit to lead the Western Nations' coming conferences on the German problem. I expressed the hope, which was joined in by several other Members of the Senate, that Mr. Dulles would be able to return promptly to active duty.

It is now no longer certain, however, when the Secretary of State will leave the hospital. Nevertheless, there is every likelihood that conferences will have to be held in the near future on the critical problems of Germany. Our participation in those conferences is one which sorely needs whatever guidance Mr. Dulles may be in condition to give to it. In these circumstances, Mr. President, I should like to add a 10th point to the suggestions I made last Thursday.

I believe it would be most helpful if the coming conferences on the German situation were to be held in Washington, D.C. If the Secretary has recovered by the time they convene to the extent that he can participate in any way, he will at least be spared the necessity of traveling abroad again to make the contribution which he is so capable of making in the search for peace. It is a small thing to ask for one who has already given so much. I cannot believe any of the nations involved in this critical situation would not respond favorably, in present circumstances, to invitations from the President to hold these critical conferences in the United States.

ADVISORY PANEL ON LABOR-MANAGEMENT LAW REVISION

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, in mid-January, when I introduced S. 505, the labor-management reform bill, I reiterated my often stated conviction that after 11 years of expereince under the Taft-Hartley Act we needed a thorough relook at our labor-management relations law. Circumstances have changed, new problems have arisen, defects in the original act need correction, and yet we have had no revision of our basic laws governing industrial relations for over a decade.

The reasons for this lack of congressional action are as complex as they are numerous. But the basic fact is that whenever we have had amendments before us we have bogged down in bitter controversy for which we could get no consensus and which had repeatedly resulted in no action whatever. As time has gone by, the strong forces which have prevented action in the past, rather than dissipating, have grown stronger and more rigid. Attitudes are firm; prejudice runs high; rationality is virtually absent. And it is the public which suffers.

Having watched this process over the years in both Houses of Congress, it seemed to me that a wholly new start was needed. For this reason I suggested that the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare appoint a panel of professionals of exceptional competence in the industrial relations field to advise us on those areas of our labor-management relations law most in need of revision. I am pleased to report to the Senate that the committee has appointed a panel of 12 experts who began work last Wednesday. The panel will meet regularly over the coming weeks and plans to make its recommendations to the committee about May 1. I am confident that the committee will act promptly on this report and that a bill will be ready for Senate consideration shortly thereafter.

May I say a word about the advisory panel. Each of the men on this panel is long experienced in the field. Each is recognized as a person of the highest professional competence although they represent diverse viewpoints. Most importantly I was impressed after my meeting with the panel last Wednesday that as a group they were dedicating themselves to the resolution of most difficult problems in the light of the public interest regardless of their own preferences.

To me this is a most hopeful sign, for if there is any legislative field which requires careful, competent, objective analysis it is this one. I share with the chairman of our committee, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], and the ranking Republican Member, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], the firm belief that the work of this distinguished group of experts will mark a turning point in the development of sound legislation in this field. We believe the result will be legislation which is fair to both labor and management and which, above all, protects the interest of the public at large.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD at this point a biographic sketch of each of the 12 distinguished members of the panel, and the remarks which I made to the group at its organizational meeting last Wednesday.

There being no objection, the biographic sketches and the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF SENATOR JOHN F. KENNEDY AT THE ORGANIZATIONAL MEETING OF THE ADVISORY PANEL ON LABOR-MANAGEMENT LAW REVISION

I want to express not only my personal gratitude but also the appreciation of all the members of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare for your willingness to serve upon this panel to advise the committee concerning revision of our laws covering labor-management relations.

The public, management, and labor have had 12 years experience under the Taft-Hartley Act. They have been years of praise, criticism, and countless proposals for amendment. Both the Senate and House committees have heard endless testimony. We have learned a great deal but there have been two obstacles in the way of effective legislative action. One is the complexity of subjects. The other is the inevitable diffuseness of the hearings in a complex and controversial area. We are now beginning a fresh approach. By asking you to bring the problems into focus as a professional body, we hope to remove at least these two obstacles to constructive legislation.

The panel should set its own aims and its own procedure but I would like to suggest a few ways in which you can be most helpful.

First, I hope that your report will indicate what you regard as the major problems in labor-management relations for which new law is required. Your judgment upon the comparative importance of different issues will be of great assistance to the Senate committee in its deliberations.

Second, there will be important subjects on which you ought to give us a unanimous or virtually unanimous recommendation. It should be couched in legislative language taking account of its relationship with other aspects of labor law. There is no need to dwell upon the great weight that such a recommendation would carry or the help that they would furnish in coalescing opinion in both Congress and throughout the country.

Third, there may be problems for which you can find no solution on which there is a substantial consensus of opinion within the group. In this area your report will nevertheless serve two useful functions. The report should narrow the issues, state the critical question fairly and present the arguments pro and con which the Congress will have to weigh. It would also be most helpful to have you state the two or three leading alternatives in legislative language which takes account of other parts of the statute and their context in labor law.

Fourth, I am much concerned by the long delays in NLRB proceedings. You are all familiar with NLRB cases. I am confident that you can develop suggestions which will greatly expedite its action. Undoubtedly there are also other technical amendments which would simplify proceedings before the NLRB and clarify the statute.

I would like to say just a word more about the problem of achieving agreement within your group. We are calling upon you for a public service in the highest traditions of your profession. It is of the utmost importance that you make every earnest effort to resolve any differences and reach a true consensus of opinion. General agreement would probably require some sacrifice of individual opinions, but if lawyers with long experience in the field, acting in the traditions of their profession, cannot submerge most of their differences the chance for constructive legislative action seems somewhat remote.

Finally we must all remember that this is a most fortuitous occasion for work—one which holds out much greater prospect for success than either the past or the future. Sentiment in both the House and Senate is now reasonable and dispassionate toward both management and labor. With the weight of opinion in the middle of the road we stand the best chance of enacting legislation which is not pro-management or pro-union but which would be directed solely toward the improvement of collective bargaining relationships and the advancement of the public interest. If constructive legislation cannot be enacted at the present Congress, there is likely to be no correction of acknowledged defects in the present statutes until either management or unions gain sufficient control to ram through legislation favoring their self-interest. This would not be a solution of the problems which we all want to solve, and would result in another period of renewed conflict in this sensitive field.

EXPANDING RESEARCH TO PREVENT FOREST BLIGHT AND DISEASE

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, recently I brought to the attention of the Senate the need for an expanded research program to eliminate blight and disease from the Nation's forests. At the time, I stressed the need for about $250,000 additional money to carry on research in the Lake States Forest Experimental Station. Although established at La Crosse, Wis., this new branch office will carry on research to benefit the whole upper Midwest and the Nation.

Currently, the annual loss of timber destroyed by disease exceeds the volume of timber cut; in addition, it lowers the grade of timber now being utilized. Unless controlled, this situation will become progressively worse.

Unfortunately, there is a lack of fundamental information on blight and disease problems. The expansion of our forest research program, particularly through the facilities of such programs as are being carried on by the Lake States Forest Experiment Station, is essential, if knowledge is to be obtained for coping with this problem.

I want to emphasize that we, in the Midwest, are not depending solely upon the Federal Government to carry on work in this field. Rather, the Wisconsin Conservation Commission—as a fine example—is participating splendidly with Federal services in a joint effort to deal effectively with this threat to our woodlands.

This morning, I received a letter from Mr. John A. Beale, chief state forester of the Wisconsin State Conservation Department, reaffirming the needs at this experiment station.

In his letter, Chief State Forester Beale also indicates that he feels that a minimum of $2.5 million should be added to the overall Forest Service research budget for the next fiscal year, to meet our forestry needs. I respectfully call the attention of our colleagues on the Forestry Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee to Mr. Beale's recommendations, for their consideration when the matter comes before them.

I request unanimous consent to have the letter printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF WISCONSIN
CONSERVATION DEPARTMENT,
Madison, February 12, 1959.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: Some time ago I received a letter from Senator JOHN STENNIS, of Mississippi, in which he expressed his interest in forestry research and his concern regarding the adequacy of the present U.S. Forest Service forestry research budget.

Knowing of your personal strong interest in this field I felt you would be interested in our feelings in the matter. For your information, I have attached a copy of my reply to Senator STENNIS.

We are especially appreciative of your efforts in obtaining an appropriation for the new branch of the Lake States Forest Experiment Station at La Crosse, which is now working on forestry and watershed problems in that area. The initial appropriation for this station was $30,000 for the 1958–59 fiscal year. The original cost estimate for this program was $100,000 per year. You will be interested to know that the conservation commission has entered into an agreement with the U.S. Forest Service for joint effort in this program and that the State will purchase the lands needed.

It is our feeling that this program should now be strengthened to meet the urgent demand for new management information in that area.

We are also strongly interested in insect and disease research, in particular, the need for research on the maple blight problem which has caused serious losses in the State and which could easily move into the upper peninsula of Michigan.

All things considered, we feel that a minimum of $2.5 million should be added to the Forest Service research budget in the next fiscal year.

We will certainly appreciate your support for this most important work.

Very truly yours,

JOHN A. BEALE,
Chief State Forester.

WHEAT ACREAGE ALLOTMENT REGULATIONS

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, the Kansas Farm Bureau, through its president, W. I. Boone, has made some recommendations to the Director, Grain Division, Commodity Stabilization Service, regarding acreage allotment regulations, which I believe are sound, and, therefore, I want to call them to the attention of the Senate.

During the past year I have received a number of letters from wheatgrowers in Kansas stating that some were in danger of losing their acreage allotment because they did not plant the full allotment and others were threatened with loss of acreage because they overseeded.

It seems to me that the statement from the 1959 Farm Bureau policies on loss of acreage is sound. It reads as follows:

Since the purpose of allotments is to reduce the acreage devoted to specific crops, an allotment should be looked upon as a ceiling on acreage rather than a requirement to plant. No producer should be forced to plant an allotment in order to maintain history.

At a time when we are burdened with surpluses, it occurs to me that no grower should be penalized for not planting his full allotment acreage.

The Farm Bureau's stand on overplanting without excessive production is equally sound.

There are large sections in the wheat-producing areas of Kansas and other States in the Middle West where we do not produce large crops every year. Under these circumstances, a grower should be permitted to grow in excess of his allotment acreage if he does not sell more than the average acreage production in bushels off his farm. The excess should be stored for years when he produces less than his average crop.

Both of these views of the Farm Bureau are so sound that I feel they should be given every consideration by the Department and the Congress.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter to the Director, Grain Division, Commodity Stabilization Service, Department of Agriculture, be made a part of these remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 4, 1959.

DIRECTOR,
Grain Division, Commodity Stabilization Service, U.S. Department of Agriculture, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: As president of the Kansas Farm Bureau I herewith submit recommendations in accordance with the notice published in the Federal Register for Tuesday, January 27, 1959.

Both the Kansas Farm Bureau recommendations and the American Farm Bureau Federation resolutions adopted by the voting delegates of 48 States, Puerto Rico and Hawaii have indicated similar and rather definite views on some phases of acreage allotment regulations.

LOSS OF HISTORY BECAUSE OF UNDERPLANTING

It is the belief of the above groups that underplanting of the wheat acreage allotment for a farm, regardless of the reason, should not result in loss of history. One statement in the 1959 Farm Bureau policies contains this wording, "Since the purpose of allotments is to reduce the acreage devoted to specific crops, an allotment should be looked upon as a ceiling on acreage rather than a requirement to plant. No producer should be forced to plant an allotment in order to maintain history."

The above wording would cover underplanting for the purpose of releasing previously stored excess. A study of the proposed 1960 regulations indicates that history would be lost in case of underplanting where excess is released because of either or both underplanting and underproduction.

The effect on history of underplanting not connected with release of excess is not clearly indicated. It would appear to depend upon the wording of diversion formulas, which are not specified in the proposal.

We request that final regulations be so worded that maintenance of history is independent of underplanting.

OVERPLANTING WITHOUT EXCESS PRODUCTION

We are in agreement with current statutes which specify that maintenance of history should be dependent upon storage of any farm marketing excess production. However, we do not believe that history should be lost because of overplanting in case the actual production is not greater than the normal production of the allotted acres.

It seems to us that Public Law 85–366 can and should be so interpreted. To do otherwise is to penalize a producer for failing to overproduce, (1) since, technically, he cannot store what he does not have. We are opposed to the apparent meaning of this proposed regulation and recommend revisions which will clearly state the opposite.

We welcome and appreciate this opportunity to extend our recommendations.

Sincerely yours,

KANSAS FARM BUREAU,
W. I. BOONE, President.

MEDICAL TESTS FOR OLD AIRLINE PILOTS

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I wish to draw the Senate's attention to a very informative article which appeared in Washington's Sunday Star, entitled "Tests Called Inadequate for Older Airline Pilots."

The article quotes three top authorities in aviation medicine as saying that airline pilots—especially those who are 50 and older—are not receiving adequate medical tests before flying large commercial planes.

Air traffic is increasing by leaps and bounds in the United States. This means that more and more people are entrusting their lives to the skill and fitness of pilots and to the aircraft they operate.

The Government—Federal, State, and local—is spending hundreds of millions of dollars on air safety. The industry also is continually working in many ways for greater safety in air travel. And research organizations outside of the industry and the Government are concerned with the problem.

Many factors are involved in safety of air travel.

Certainly one of the more important of these factors is the pilot himself.

I was therefore very much interested in the newspaper article mentioned.

For instance, I was surprised to read that 551 pilots in their fifties were flying for the airlines in 1957, and that 19 were above 60 years old.

I was disturbed to read that the authorities think better medical tests are needed to be sure that these hundreds of older pilots are fully capable of safely flying today's swift and complicated aircraft.

I noted with interest that the three medical authorities quoted in the article agred that pilots in their fifties are increased risks.

I was pleased, however, to find that our new Federal Aviation Agency and the other organizations represented by the authorities seem to be on top of the situation.

The article makes it clear that these doctors and their organizations are aware of the importance of the situation, and that they are working on the problem.

The article points out, for instance, that the Federal Aviation Agency is now doing research to determine how adequate tests may be given to pilots.

I wish these men and others who are working for greater air safety speedy success in their important undertaking. And I commend the Washington Star for its enterprise in bringing the problem of pilot age and fitness to the attention of the public.

In jobs where physical or mental failure could mean disaster, adequate medical testing, perhaps coupled with some sort of retirement system, seems to me to be a definite must in the public interest.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article referred to be inserted at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TESTS CALLED INADEQUATE FOR OLDER AIRLINE PILOTS—551 OVER 50 FLYING COMMERCIAL PLANES; DOCTORS CITE NEED FOR DETECTING DEFECTS

(By Andrew W. Bingham)

Airline pilots—particularly the hundreds who are 50 and older—are not receiving adequate medical tests before flying large commercial planes, three of the Nation's top authorities in aviation medicine said yesterday.

They told the Star the current situation needs urgent attention for the sake of air safety.

They feel that current testing procedures often do not show up many physiological and psychological defects which they say can exist in people over 50.

The three authorities are:

Dr. John E. Smith, acting civil air surgeon for the new Federal Aviation Agency and the former Chief of the Medical Division of the Civil Aeronautics Administration. He is in charge of examining pilots for the FAA every 6 months.

Dr. Ludwig Lederer, medical director for Capital Airlines and president-elect of the Aero Medical Association.

Dr. Ross A. McFarland, professor of environmental health at Harvard University's School of Public Health and director of the Guggenheim Center for Aviation Health and Safety. Dr. McFarland is also author of a book, Human Factors in Air Transportation.

FIVE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-ONE PILOTS OVER 50 FLYING

Both the airlines and the FAA conduct physical and flight exams. The FAA will add electrocardiograms to its testing program in July, although they will be only 50 percent effective for pilots who have not had heart attacks, Dr. Smith said.

According to the latest FAA figures, 551 transport pilots in their fifties were flying for the airlines in 1957; 19 were above 60 years.

Other figures from Air Transport Association show that in 1955 there were 429 pilots in their fifties flying. Another 27 were above 60 years.

Failure to bring out possible defects in these older men is a particularly serious problem today, the authorities agree, because of:

(1) Pressure from the Air Line Pilots Association that the tests, and not age, be the only basis for retirement. (The FAA has set no maximum age for pilots; only a minimum age of 23 years.)

(2) The current switch by airlines from piston-engine planes to jets. The change in equipment could be a difficult one for older pilots to make, although tests now do not reveal how difficult.

PILOTS RESIST RETIREMENT

The experiences of two airlines serve as an indication of what could happen if the testing system for pilots is not improved, the authorities say.

The first case concerns American Airlines. An arbitration award last October declared that the company could not—as it had been doing—retire qualified pilots who reach 60 years. The award said such retirement was "a violation of the employment agreement," according to William M. Culbertson, a pilot for the airline and a member of the board which made the award.

The ruling affected three pilots who had been retired because of age, according to Mr. Culbertson. The company agreed to abide by the decision before the recent pilot contract was signed, he said.

American officials, however, refused to change their policy. They said last night that no pilot over 60 is flying for the company. It is understood the three pilots are receiving pay, but not flying.

The ALPA regards this case as a major breakthrough in ending arbitrary retirement schemes of airline companies.

The second case involves Capital Airlines, which recently switched primarily to propjet planes.

According to Dr. Lederer, several pilots passed all the tests but were still not deemed to be qualified for the new planes. "We sat down and talked," he said, "and they agreed to stay on slower equipment."

He added: "According to strict union procedures, we should not and cannot do this. The pilots, through seniority, were entitled to get the new planes."

Capital at present insists pilots retire at 60. "We feel that beyond that age, a sudden incapacitation would be more likely to occur," Dr. Lederer said. "For new equipment, the age may have to be lower."

Retirement ages for most of the other airlines are 60 years. The list includes Northwest, Delta, Braniff, TWA, United, and Eastern Airlines. National Airlines has a 65-year retirement. Just 2 weeks ago Northwest retired a 62-year-old pilot who was the only exception to the company's policy.

The tests which Dr. Lederer and the other authorities want to establish would measure the pilot's overall competence—not such easily checked points as eyesight or hearing.

They want to know the pilot's ability to adjust to a new environment and the influence of aging on mental and sensory functions, such as his ability to learn, his memory, reasoning and judgment.

What they are after is to find the pilot's functional, rather than his actual age. This can be an extremely subtle determination.

As Dr. McFarland pointed out in his book, "even minor deteriorations in many of the psychological and physiological functions may interact to produce a significant loss in overall efficiency."

At present the only way these functions are observed is indirectly through flight tests. Check pilots are our best psychologists," Dr. Smith said. "What we need, however, are more specific criteria for performance of older men. Pilots can compensate for deficiencies with their tremendous experience. But we want to make factual, not emotional, determinations."

Older pilots often have slower reaction, detection, and response times, according to Dr. Lederer. "We know this by experience," he said, "although it is hard to detect." Other pilots show their age by over-activity in the cockpit, he added, to compensate for their deficiencies.

"Night vision of older pilots is also impaired," he said.

Currently the FAA is doing research to determine how adequate tests may be given, according to Dr. Smith. The most hopeful work is being done with a ballisto-cardiograph, he said, which would detect the velocity of blood flow.

AVIATION INDUSTRY GETTING OLD

The project is still in the developmental stage, he said. The indications are, however, that its perfection will greatly increase the effectiveness of the current tests, he noted, since the blood flow seems to be a key in understanding the physiological, and perhaps the psychological, makeup of the pilot.

"Our problem is that the aviation industry is just starting to grow old," Dr. Smith said. "Our current tests were designed for young pilots 20 years ago. The physical examination we require every 6 months is the usual $15 variety, and that's not too complete."

All three authorities agree that pilots in their 50's are increased risks. "Most doctors I've talked to feel pilots should retire at 60," Dr. Smith said.

The current requirements for pilots were drawn up by the Civil Aeronautics Board, Dr. Smith said. They are now the responsibility of the FAA.

FEAR LOSS OF HIGH INCOMES

Another problem associated with pilot-retirement is that pilots are professional men, much like doctors and lawyers, with correspondingly high incomes. Flying new equipment usually means more money for them. Retiring can mean just the opposite.

"Why should we voluntarily retire at 60 when we can still pass all the tests?" one pilot explained. "My income now is $28,000 a year. Under the retirement plan, it would be $4,800."

Larry Cates, Washington representative for ALPA, explained: "Doctors are usually very conservative. They can't evaluate a man's experience to offset his deterioration."

"Anyway," he added, "pilots don't fly solo. There's always at least one other pilot."

Mr. Cates pointed out that most pilots leave the airlines before they are 50. Dr. Smith, too, noted that many pilots "by nature are sensible" and quit when they feel themselves sliding.

DOUBTS AGE AS MEASURING STICK

Others, however, feel that they will rely on the tests given by their companies and the FAA to determine when they should retire.

"They aren't going to turn me loose just because someone sets an arbitrary age," said Mr. Culbertson, who is an attorney as well as a pilot for American Airlines. "It has not been proven to me that age is a good measuring stick."

The Public Health Service, as well as the FAA, is trying to develop another measuring stick, according to Dr. Stanley R. Mohler, of the Center for Aging Research at the National Institutes of Health.

Research centers throughout the country are doing Government-sponsored work to develop tests for each occupation where a physical or mental failure could mean disaster, Dr. Mohler said.

"The question is whether there should be some sort of retirement system for people in these sorts of jobs," he said.

EXPERT ON AGING GIVES VIEWS

Another expert in the field, Dr. James Birren, chief of the Section on Aging in the National Institutes of Mental Health, noted:

"We praise a doctor of 80 who is still practicing medicine. But there is often serious question whether he is a good doctor, and whether in the public interest that he should be allowed to practice."

In his book, Dr. McFarland suggested a retirement age of 50 years—plus or minus five—as probably best for most pilots, although each case should be thoroughly examined on its own merits.

He suggested last night that a possible way to satisfy safety requirements and the pilots would be to make these older men plane commanders.

"Their judgment and experience would be used, but they wouldn't actually be at the controls," he said.

So, far, he reported, airlines have not expressed much interest in his proposal.

J. FRANCIS SMITH, OF CONNECTICUT

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, the recent death of J. Francis Smith leaves a void in the civic, business, and political life of Connecticut and the Nation that will be sorely felt, for he possessed qualities of mind and character that can never be spared.

He carried into every field of endeavor a competitive spirit, a practical and analytical judgment, and a complete integrity. On the athletic field, in the business world, and in countless civic and charitable causes, he left a series of achievements that will long be remembered.

As Connecticut's Democratic State chairman for many years, Francis Smith ushered in a period of party rejuvenation and growth that is still yielding rich dividends.

His friendship, his ideals, his example, have given guidance and inspiration to a generation of Connecticut citizens in all walks of life, and all who knew him share my feeling of great loss at his passing.

I ask unanimous consent that the Waterbury Republican editorial of February 13, 1959, entitled "J. Francis Smith," be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

J. FRANCIS SMITH

Our city and the State are made poorer indeed by the untimely death of an outstanding businessman and citizen.

There is a sad irony in J. Francis Smith's death. He had apparently made a strong recovery a couple of years ago from a long, serious sickness, had resumed control of his business affairs, and, in managing Senator THOMAS DODD's campaign for the Democratic nomination, had shown last summer that he still possessed an old political warrior's skill. Then came the heart attack which, after weeks in the hospital, has claimed his life.

A hardheaded sense of what was practical guided him. His was a fierce competitive spirit, shown on the tennis court when he was younger, later on the links, and carried over into business, politics, community service. He had a shrewd analytical mind. His success as president of J. E. Smith & Co. led to other business connections, to bank and corporation directorship and trade association honors. On the political side, his service as Democratic State chairman when the late Wilbur L. Cross was Governor was a very distinguished one, and the part he played over the whole political range from local to national was notable.

As drive chairman for community causes and worker for community betterment he had no superior and few peers. However much you might narrow down a list of pivotal local leaders in business, in politics, and in movements for civic improvement, his name would be bound to be there.

Such men are few, precious, hard to spare.

ST. LOUIS TORNADO DISASTER ASSISTANCE

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, during the early morning hours of last Tuesday, the 10th of February, the city of St. Louis was struck by a devastating tornado.

In the few minutes during which the twister cut a path through the central part of the city, 21 persons were killed, 350 were injured, and more than 5,000 others were made homeless or were otherwise affected.

Forty-seven buildings were totally destroyed and nearly 2,000 others were damaged. A 575-foot TV tower and a radio tower were toppled; and the arena, a large sports building, was damaged.

The major damage occurred in areas occupied by multiple dwellings and small businesses.

Tornadoes are not new to our part of the country. Kansas City suffered appalling damage in 1957, as did St. Louis itself in 1927 and 1896.

Last week, wind struck suddenly and with tremendous force. The financial loss, estimated at more than $12 million, is enormous, but we in St. Louis are fortunate that the loss of life was not greater. Had the tornado hit during daylight, many more would probably have been killed.

The people of St. Louis were quick to rise to the emergency. The speed with which personal and financial assistance came from local, State, and Federal agencies was a great comfort and help to those who had lost loved ones, personal possessions, and homes.

The Civil Defense, Red Cross, Salvation Army, and local hospital workers, as well as the municipal police and firemen, were on the scene soon after the twister struck. Their work in the early morning hours, and throughout the day, in rescue and treatment of the injured, was outstanding.

City officials are also to be congratulated for the rapid cleanup operations. Within 2 days, all streets, save for one intersection, were cleared so that disruption of the city's traffic flow was kept at a minimum.

Coordination between local, State and Federal agencies was outstanding and proved very effective.

The Presidential designation of the city as a major disaster area was prompt, and speeded financial assistance to needy persons.

The people of St. Louis, through newspaper and radio campaigns, have contributed large sums to aid their fellow citizens. Much of the property damage was covered by insurance. With funds thus available from a variety of sources, rebuilding already in progress will continue apace.

We are fortunate that the courage, community spirit and efficient work of all concerned kept injuries to a minimum, and provided relief to the victims.

Last Tuesday was a day of great sorrow for the city of St. Louis. But it will also be remembered as a proud day. City, State, and Federal officials and the people of the St. Louis area itself responded magnificently to this "challenge of disaster."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have included as a part of my remarks an editorial entitled "Tornado's Tragic Wake," from the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of February 11, an editorial entitled "The Challenge of Disaster," from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of February 11, and a letter from Gen. Alfred M. Gruenther, president of the American National Red Cross.

There being no objection, the editorials and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, Feb. 11, 1959]

TORNADO'S TRAGIC WAKE

Death, suffering, and sudden horror rode the tornado that sliced through St. Louis and St. Louis County in the black hours of early Tuesday morning.

The grim toll was about a score slain, some 300 injured, and a property devastation running into multimillions of dollars.

The shock was tragic and savage. There had been no warning. Most of the city slept through a rainstorm, awakening unconscious of the stark path of depredation that had knifed diagonally through the community.

The worst storm to strike St. Louis in 32 years, it followed much the same course of the devastating tornado that laid a swath of demolition and killed 78 persons in 1927. This was the third worst weather disaster ever suffered by the city.

Rescue workers were still sifting through ruins late last night searching for possible victims. The hospitals were heavily taxed caring for the maimed and shock sufferers. Welfare organizations were quickly on the job, and appeal has been made to designate the city a disaster area.

Such is the capsule résumé of devastation following the 65-mile-an-hour twister. Sympathy and care for survivors caught in the vicious tornado's maw is all that can now be offered. And that, unfortunately, will be forthcoming in most generous measure.

Such violent incidents are a macabre vagary of nature, explicable perhaps to meteorologists who apparently are not yet able to forecast their coming. There is left only sorrow, sincere compassion for the bereaved.

A disaster like this, brutal as its harvest shows, is but a minuscule shadowing of the cosmic power of destruction man has shaped in his world arsenals of nuclear annihilation.

Nature, even in its deadly moments, is kinder than this generation of men, who have devised a potential of monstrous destruction that could be loosed in a moment's madness.

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Feb. 11, 1959]

THE CHALLENGE OF DISASTER

Here in St. Louis the whistle of the wind is no exhilarating song. Here the whine under the eaves carries overtones of alarm. This is tornado country. Damaging storms have lashed the city since its earliest days, but only two—those of 1896 and 1927—were more deadly than the catastrophe which whipped across St. Louis early Tuesday morning. Had that calamity befallen the community in business hours, who knows how many more might have been killed or injured in the streets? For that one is grateful.

But 21 dead, 300 injured, and 1,725 buildings damaged is disaster enough. It will be ameliorated insofar as that is possible. President Eisenhower has responded to Mayor Tucker's appeal by declaring this a disaster area, eligible for Federal aid.

The firemen, the police, the doctors and nurses of hospitals, the emergency crews of the utility companies, Civil Defense, the Salvation Army, and the Red Cross responded with marvelous energy. They ministered to the injured, dug out the dead, blocked off danger zones, cleared streets, and restored facilities as quickly and as best they could. They did splendid work. For this the community honors them. Individuals and groups unable to help so directly can join in relief over the longer run.

The Post-Dispatch, KSD-TV and KSD have started a tornado relief fund with a contribution of $5,000. Other contributions are solicited, especially because so many of those hard hit are unable to do much for themselves. Money is needed not only for emergency food and shelter, but also to help the victims of the storm in reestablishing themselves. This is a concrete way of expressing the universal sympathy for those injured in limb and property. Contributions sent in care of the Post-Dispatch will be distributed by the Red Cross.

The response this time, we are sure, will be what it has been every time St. Louis felt the wrath of storm, fire, and plague. These disasters are hardly to be prevented. But beginning with the first policeman, fireman, and doctor on the scene, the community can make good the damage. People can show not only compassion but also courage. They can and will clear away the wind-scattered debris. They can and will build anew, stronger and better. They can and will respond to the challenge of disaster.

Washington, D.C., February 11, 1959.

Hon. STUART SYMINGTON,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR SYMINGTON: Once again it is my sad duty to report the measures which the Red Cross is taking in meeting the suffering caused by the tornado which struck St. Louis early yesterday morning.

Preliminary surveys from Red Cross workers indicate approximately 3,036 families have been affected. Most of these were in St. Louis in an area bounded by the following streets: Grand, St. Louis, Olive, and Newstead. Here, 21 died, 69 were hospitalized, and 350 received minor injuries. In this area 21 dwellings were destroyed, 141 dwellings received major damage, and 1,104 dwellings received minor damage. Most of those dwellings were occupied by varying numbers of families up to four. In the Brentwood area 2 homes were destroyed and 11 homes were damaged. In the Rock Hill area 1 home was destroyed and 107 homes were damaged. In the Berkeley area 12 homes were damaged. In addition, 23 businesses were destroyed, 93 businesses received major damage, and 388 businesses received minor damage in St. Louis and in the Brentwood area. Fifty persons occupied a Red Cross shelter last night. Five canteens have been operating in the affected areas, feeding both rescue workers and victims.

Chapter volunteers and national disaster workers of the Red Cross are on the job along with Federal, State, and community agencies to bring all possible relief to the disaster sufferers in your State. The full resources of our organization have been mobilized to aid these stricken families. The Red Cross will continue its emergency and rehabilitation work until the disaster-caused needs of all families lacking the necessary funds have been met.

Red Cross help is based on the principle, not of replacing all losses, but of assisting disaster victims in need who lack sufficient resources of their own, including insurance, to start back on the road to recovery.

All assistance from the Red Cross is an outright gift from funds contributed by the American people. Unfortunately, our disaster revolving fund has been drastically reduced because of the extraordinary heavy disaster losses in the past 4 years. For that reason special appeals for funds have been inaugurated by the Red Cross in the affected areas. I am confident that the American people, as always, will contribute generously.

You may be assured that the Red Cross will remain on the job until all who need our assistance have been helped.

Sincerely,

ALFRED M. GRUENTHER.

CONGRESSIONAL COOPERATION WITH THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, the Secretary of Agriculture is now testifying before the Senate Agriculture Committee regarding the administration's recommendations for additional farm legislation.

This is the seventh year of this administration's farm policies and programs.

Six times, either the President or his Secretary of Agriculture has come before Congress with recommendations which they said would help solve the farm problem.

Each time the Congress was assured that the farm situation was getting better, but that additional legislation was needed to further improve the economic conditions in agriculture.

Many of us did not concur with these policies and proposals. We felt that, even if administered well, many of the Secretary's farm policies would not serve the best interest of farm families.

In his recent farm message, the President argued that the Congress has not given the administration all of the legislation requested.

On other recent occasions, high officials in the Department of Agriculture have stated that Congress has not provided the legislative tools to solve the farm problem.

Let us get the facts—based on the record.

What legislation has been requested by this administration.

And what has Congress done about these requests?

I asked the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress to make a comparison of the administration's major farm price and income recommendations with the legislative action taken by Congress.

To get the facts, the Legislative Reference Service checked the recommendations of the President and the Secretary of Agriculture for each of the past 6 years.

They reviewed the bills, hearings, reports, and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. They used the Department of Agriculture's Digest of Legislation and other official publications.

Now let us see what the record shows.

The Library of Congress report states:

In the past 6 sessions of the Congress, some 53 recommendations have been made by the Secretary of Agriculture for price and income stabilization for commercial farmers.

According to the report, 48, or more than 90 percent, of these recommendations have received favorable legislative action.

A more detailed examination of these legislative actions shows that 41 of the 48, and I quote, "substantially fulfilled the requirements stated by the Secretary," while 7 partially met the administration requests.

To continue from the report by the impartial Library of Congress Legislative Reference Service:

Only five recommendations made by the Secretary in the past 6 years have not received favorable congressional action. They are:

1. The sale of CCC stocks at not less than support levels plus carrying charges (84th Cong., 2d sess.).

2. The sale of low-quality CCC wheat by the Secretary of Agriculture for feeding purposes (84th Cong., 2d sess.).

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE SECRETARY OF FOR STABILIZING FARM PRICES

83D CONGRESS,

Recommendations

1. June 30: President requested legislation which would give authority to use agricultural commodities held by the Government to meet needs arising from famine or other urgent relief requirements abroad.

2. June 10: President proposed that Congress authorize availability to Pakistan of 1 million tons of CCC-held wheat, with recommendation that legislation include authority for CCC to recover through appropriation.

3. June 2: Presidential message to Senate contained recommendation for Senate ratification of extension of International Wheat Agreement.

4. March 26: President recommended adoption of Reorganization Plan No. 2, to transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture functions vested by law in other officers, agencies, and employees of the Department * * * to simplify and make effective the operation of the Department.

83D CONGRESS,

Recommendations

1. January 11: President recommended authority for price supports at 90 percent of parity be allowed to expire in favor of supports between 75 and 90 percent of parity on the five basic commodities—wheat, corn, rice, cotton, and peanuts—depending on the relationship of total to normal supply.

3. Extension of the noncommercial wheat area (84th Cong., 2d sess.).

4. The replacement of acreage allotments on cotton with quantity allotments (84th Cong., 2d sess.).

5. Provision for elimination of national acreage allotments on peanuts (84th Cong., 2d sess.).

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire report of the Legislative Reference Service, giving each of the 53 recommendations and the legislative action thereon, be included in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE AND LEGISLATIVE ENACTMENTS FOR STABILIZING FARM PRICES AND INCOME, 1953 TO DATE

In the past six sessions of the Congress, some 53 recommendations have been made by the Secretary of Agriculture for price and income stabilization for commercial farmers.

Of this total, 41 legislative actions have substantially fulfilled the requirements stated by the Secretary, and 7 of his recommendations were only partially met, or the timing of the changes recommended were delayed. One of these occurred in the 83d Congress, four in the 84th Congress, and two in the 85th Congress.

Only five recommendations made by the Secretary in the past 6 years have not received favorable congressional action: They are:

1. The sale of CCC stocks at not less than support levels plus carrying charges (84th Cong., 2d sess.).

2. The sale of low-quality CCC wheat by the Secretary of Agriculture for feeding purposes (84th Cong., 2d sess.).

3. Extension of the noncommercial wheat area (84th Cong., 2d sess.).

4. The replacement of acreage allotments on cotton with quantity allotments (84th Cong., 2d sess.).

5. Provision for elimination of national acreage allotments on peanuts (84th Cong., 2d sess.).

ARGICULTURE AND LEGISLATIVE ENACTMENTS AND INCOME, 1953 TO DATE

1ST SESSION (1953)

Legislation

Public Law 216 authorized President to use stocks of agricultural commodities from CCC to relieve famine and relief requirements abroad.

Public Law 77 made a gift of up to 1 million long tons of wheat from CCC stocks to Government of Pakistan to relieve starvation and mass suffering.

Public Law 180 extended the International Wheat Agreement to arrange for orderly movement of wheat between exporting and importing nations.

Reorganization Plan 2 was put into effect by the President after the 60-day period when Congress did not reject the plan.

2D SESSION (1954)

Legislation

Public Law 690 (Agricultural Act of 1954) provided flexible price support program at 82½ to 90 percent of parity for the 1955 crop of wheat, corn, cotton, peanuts, and rice. In 1956 and thereafter, support levels designated at 75 to 90 percent of parity.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE AND LEGISLATIVE ENACTMENTS FOR STABILIZING FARM PRICES AND INCOME, 1953 TO DATE—Continued

Recommendations	Legislation
2. January 11: President recommended provision to allow for moving from old to modernized parity in steps of five percentage points of the old parity per year until the change has been accomplished.	Public Law 690 contained a transitional parity provision that parity price would be decreased only 5 percent per year until the change has been accomplished.
3. January 11: President recommended removal of excessive stocks of surpluses from commercial channels, and strengthening work of the Department of Agriculture in developing foreign markets abroad and at home.	Public Law 690 provided for transfer of agricultural attachés from State to Agriculture Department. Public Law 480 provided for disposal of agricultural surpluses by the President for emergency assistance to friendly nations, and authorized sale for local currencies of surplus agricultural commodities to foreign nations. Authorized $1 billion for these purposes.
4. January 11: President recommended that authority be provided to set aside reserves up to $2.5 billion from stocks held by CCC.	Public Law 690 provided set-aside authority recommended.
5. January 11: President recommended increasing the amount CCC may spend or lend to support farm prices from $6.5 to $8.5 billion.	Public Law 312 increased borrowing power of CCC from $6.75 to $8.5 billion.
6. January 11: President recommended raising normal carryover allowance from 10 to 15 percent of domestic use of corn. Also, repeal of marketing quotas for corn.	Public Law 690 repealed marketing quotas for corn and increased carryover allowance from 10 to 15 percent.
7. January 11: President recommended, for fruits and vegetables, inclusion of additional commodities. Also, authority for marketing orders to be continued despite short-term price variations, and authorization for agencies established under marketing orders to use funds collected to engage in market research and development.	Public Law 690 authorized marketing orders to continue when prices are at or above parity. Funds collected under marketing agreements authorized for use in market research and development.
8. January 11: President recommended legislation for assistance to growers of potatoes in same manner as is available for growers of other fruits and vegetables.	Public Law 690 provided authority for inclusion of Irish potatoes in support program at 0 to 90 percent of parity.
9. January 11: President recommended for wool, direct payments to domestic producers sufficient to raise average return per pound to 90 percent of parity. Funds to meet wool payments to be taken from general revenues within the amount of unobligated tariff receipts from wool. Similar recommendations to apply to pulled wool and mohair.	Public Law 690 provided for use of incentive payments to wool producers for 4 years, beginning April 1, 1955, to support wool at a level up to 110 percent of parity, as the Secretary determines necessary to encourage annual production of 300 million pounds. When such goal is reached, price to be supported at between 60 and 90 percent, as Secretary determines necessary to encourage production of 360 million pounds of wool annually.

84TH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION (1955)

Recommendations	Legislation
1. March 3: In letter to Speaker, House of Representatives, USDA recommended legislation to extend for 2 years the period for making livestock loans.	Public Law 166 extended the period for making special livestock loans for 2 years.
2. March 18: House Report 238 contains USDA's recommended legislation to redetermine 1955 marketing quotas and acreage allotments for burley tobacco; to increase the penalty for marketing excess tobacco from 50 to 75 percent of average market price for previous year, to provide that any acreage of tobacco harvested in excess of allotted acreage shall not be considered in establishing allotment for the farm in the succeeding year.	Public Law 21 directed Secretary to redetermine national marketing quota for burley tobacco for 1955–56 marketing year, authorized reductions by not more than 1/10 of an acre for existing allotments which are 7/10 acre or less, but more than 1/2 acre. Penalizes growers who submit false reports on tobacco acreage. Increased excess-marketing penalty from 50 to 75 percent of average market price for previous year.
3. Also, that legislation be enacted to eliminate provision whereby tobacco growers may vote for quotas either for 3 years or 1 year and provide for voting only on the question of quotas for 3 years.	Public Law 279 provided for voting only on the question of quotas for 3 years.

Public Law 25 improves the operations under Public Law 480 by removing requirement that private stocks exported under title I be replaced by CCC stocks.
84TH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION (1956)
Recommendations	Legislation
January 9: President Eisenhower sent to Congress a message on a farm program with proposals designed to relieve the problems of huge agricultural surpluses. He recommended:
1. A soil-bank plan in 2 parts:
A. Acreage reserve program: Government payments for putting a part of the acreage allotments of the basic commodities in the soil bank, payments to be made to the producer by the Commodity Credit Corporation.	Public Law 540 (The Agricultural Act of 1956) set up a $1.2 billion-a-year soil bank in two parts:
	A. Acreage reserve, designed to reduce acreages of basic commodities. Payments to farmers made to reduce acreage of crops below allotments. Maximum of $750 million annually for next 4 years authorized.
B. Conservation reserve: producers contract voluntarily with the Government to shift cropland into unharvested grasses, and other conservation uses, the Government to pay a fair share of costs of establishing the reserve, as well as annual payments for period of the contract.	B. Conservation reserve: designed to remove acreage from crop production on a semi-permanent basis for which payments equivalent to the rental value of the land would be made, with an annual national limit of $450 million.
2. Legislation to permit sale of CCC stocks at not less than support levels plus carrying charges.
3. Repeal of section 304 of Public Law 480 which restricts exports of CCC stocks to friendly nations only.	Public Law 85–128 amended section 304 to allow President to assist friendly nations to be independent of trade with U.S.S.R. and with nations dominated or controlled by U.S.S.R. and to assure that agricultural commodities sold or transferred do not result in increased availability of those or like commodities to unfriendly nations. Transactions prohibited with U.S.S.R. or Communist China.
4. Corn: eliminate acreage allotments for corn and put price supports on a discretionary basis comparable with other feed grains.	Public Law 540: To be eligible for supports in 1956, the producer must devote to the soil bank an acreage of land equal to 15 percent of his corn base. Corn base acreage allotments shall be effective for the 1956 crop. Outside the commercial corn area, corn will be supported at 82.5 percent of the level in the commercial area. After 1956, producers in a referendum will decide between (a) base acreages in lieu of acreage allotments, with price supports discretionary with the Secretary. If producers favor base acreages, they must stay within acreages and devote 15 percent of their corn base to the soil bank, or (b) acreage allotments with supports at 75 to 90 percent of parity. (In referendum, choice "b" carried).
5. Wheat: Authorization for the Secretary to sell for feeding purposes limited quantities of CCC wheat of less-desirable milling quality;
6. To expand the noncommercial wheat areas beyond the 12 States now so designated; and
7. The extension for 1 year of legislation exempting durum wheat from acreage and marketing controls.	Public Law 431 provided possible planting in 1956 of expanded acreages of durum wheat.
8. The exemption from marketing quotas of wheat used on farms where it is produced for feed, seed, or food.	Public Law 85–203 provided exemption from liability by producers of wheat grown in excess of allotments when acreage does not exceed 30 acres and none of such crop is removed from the farm and is used for seed, human food, or feed for livestock.
9. Cotton: Provision that the average grade and quality be utilized for parity-price computations, rather than "middling 7/8."	Public Law 85–835: Beginning in 1961 price support shall be based on the average quality of the crop cotton.
10. The replacement of acreage allotments on cotton with quantity allotments with the crop of 1957.
11. Peanuts: Elimination of provisions for the minimum national acreage allotment.
12. Sugar: Renewal of the Sugar Act of 1948.	Public Law 545 reenacted and extended for 4 years, to December 31, 1960, the Sugar Act of 1948, as amended.
13. Special school milk program: That the program be extended for 2 years, with au-	Public Law 465 extended the special school milk program 2 years and increased the thorizations to use CCC funds, increased from $50 to $75 million.

14. Creation of a Great Plains program, suggesting modification of existing legislation to (a) provide for long-time cost-sharing commitments under agricultural conservation program, and (b) relaxation of planting requirements to maintain base acreage for wheat allotments.
15. "In the budget message, I will request the maximum increase in research funds that can be effectively used next year * * * an increase of one-fourth, to a total of $103 million for research in new products, markets, new uses for products. * * *"
16. "I recommend that legislation be passed to relieve the farmer of the Federal tax on purchases of gasoline used on the farm."
17. May 17: Secretary Benson proposed amendment to title I, Public Law 480 (83d Cong.) to increase maximum authority for reimbursement to CCC for commodity disposal operations from $1.5 billion to $3 billion.
85TH CONGRESS,
Recommendations
1. February 14: Secretary of Agriculture proposed bill to amend Public Law 480 (sec. 103b) to increase title I authority from $3 to $4 billion, to extend Public Law 480 for 1 year, and to repeal section 304 which prohibits disposal operations in Iron Curtain countries.
2. January 16: President's budget message recommended legislation authorizing "the barter of nonstrategic Government-owned agricultural surpluses to the nations of Eastern Europe."
3. January 16: President in budget message, recommended legislation authorizing exemption from marketing quotas and penalties of farmers who use all of the wheat grown on their farms for feed, seed or food.
In response to request for report, Secretary of Agriculture endorsed legislation and proposed amendments to exempt wheat producers from liability when total acreage does not exceed 30 acres and when all the production is used on the farm for food, feed and seed.
4. March 15: In response to request for report, Secretary Benson indicated Department favored enactment of bill to freeze at 75 percent of parity the support on extra long staple cotton.
5. May 20: In response to request for report, the Acting Secretary of Agriculture recommended that bill providing that preservation of allotment histories should be automatic within the period 1956–57, should pass.
85TH CONGRESS,
Recommendations
January 16: President's farm message contained the following legislative proposals:
1. The conservation reserve program of the soil bank should be strengthened and the acreage reserve program terminated after the 1958 crop.
2. Authority should be provided for the Secretary of Agriculture, in accordance with criteria which he will propose to the Con-amount authorized for it from $50 to $60 million annually for the current fiscal year and to $75 million for each of the next 2 fiscal years.

Public Law 752 extended school milk program to nonprofit organizations whether or not they are for underprivileged children.

Public Law 1021: (The Great Plains Conservation Act) provided a broad program, in cooperation with farmers, to restore and conserve cultivated and grazing lands of a wide area in 10 Plains States. Authorized $150 million program over a 10-year period. Authorized Secretary to formulate and announce a conservation program and to enter into 10-year contracts with operators to encourage permanent shift in land use in the Great Plains.

Public Law 540 provides for a five-member commission to be appointed by the President to make recommendations for increased industrial uses of agricultural commodities.

Public Law 466 relieved the farmer of excise taxes on gasoline and special fuels used for farming purposes.

Public Law 962 amended section 103(b) of Public Law 480 to raise the authority for appropriations from $1.5 billion to $3 billion.

1ST SESSION (1957)

Legislation

Public Law 85–128 extended Public Law 480 for 1 year; increased authority contained in section 103(b) from $3 to $4 billion. Amended section 304 to allow President to assist friendly nations to be independent of trade with the U.S.S.R. and with nations dominated or controlled by U.S.S.R., and to assure that agricultural commodities sold or transferred do not result in increased availability of those or like commodities to unfriendly nations. Transactions prohibited with U.S.S.R. or with Communist China.

Public Law 85–203 provided (a) exemption from liability by producers, of wheat grown in excess of allotments when acreage does not exceed 30 acres and none of such crop is removed (except for processing) from the farm, and the entire crop is used for seed, human food, or feed for livestock on the farm, and (b) that no acreage in the commercial wheat-producing areas seeded to wheat for harvest as grain in 1958 or thereafter in excess of allotments shall be considered in establishing future allotments.

Public Law 85–28 amended AAA of 1949 to provide that the price support levels for American upland and extra long staple cotton for 1957 and subsequent years shall be the same percentage of parity as for the 1956 crop. (The 1956 support level was 75 percent).

Public Law 85–266 amended section 377 of the AAA of 1938, to provide that preservation of allotment acreage shall be automatic within the period 1956 to 1959, inclusive, thus making it unnecessary for farm operators to notify county committees of their desire to preserve allotment history for the years involved.

2D SESSION (1958)

Legislation

Nineteen hundred and fifty-nine appropriation action strengthened conservation reserve and terminated acreage reserve.

Public Law 85–835 (Agricultural Act of 1958): Title I provides for a minimum national acreage allotment for cotton of 16

gress, to increase acreage allotments of basic commodities up to 50 percent above the levels determined by existing formulas.	million acres. For 1959 and 1960 the individual farmer will have a choice between his regular acreage allotments and price supports as determined by the Secretary, or an increase not to exceed 40 percent of his regular allotment with supports 15 percent lower than the level of those farmers who elect the first choice. After 1960, farmers will receive only their regular allotments, supports to be between 70 and 90 percent; after 1961, supports between 65 and 90 percent of parity. Title III provides that the minimum national and State acreage allotments presently in effect for rice will be extended permanently.
3. Acreage allotments for corn should be eliminated.	Public Law 85–835, title II, provides for a referendum among corn producers (in the commercial area) to choose between (a) discontinuance of acreage allotments in the commercial corn area, and price support at 90 percent of the average price received by farmers for the 3 preceding years (but not less than 65 percent of parity), or (b) acreage allotments to continue in effect and the minimum level of price supports to continue at between 75 and 90 percent of parity. (In referendum, choice "a" carried.)
4. The escalator clause (requiring price supports be increased as surplus is reduced should be abolished.	Public Law 85–835, title I repealed the escalator clause for cotton, effective with the 1961 crop. Title III repealed the escalator clause for rice, effective with the 1959 crop.
5. The overall range within which price supports may be provided should be substantially widened. Price supports for basic commodities should be determined administratively between 60 and 90 percent of parity using established guidelines.	Public Law 85–835 provides a minimum level of supports for corn at 65 percent of parity in the event choice (a) was made in the referendum. Title I provides a minimum for cotton for 1959 of 80 percent. Title III provides 75–90 percent for rice for 1959 and 1960; 70–90 percent for 1961; and 69–90 percent after 1961.
6. Price supports for cotton should be based on the average quality of the crop.	Public Law 85–835: Beginning in 1961, price supports shall (for cotton) be based on the average quality of the crop.
7. The agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act should be extended for 1 year and an additional $1.5 billion authorized for sales for foreign currencies.	Public Law 85–931 extends the termination date of both titles I and II from June 30, 1958, to December 31, 1959. Authorizes an additional $1.5 billion per year for title I operations, or an additional $2.25 billion for the 1½-year extension. Requires the Secretary to engage in the barter or exchange of CCC surplus commodities for strategic or other materials when he determines this to be in the best interests of the United States. 1959 appropriation action increased research funds.
8. Research efforts aimed at increasing industrial uses of farm products should be expanded.
9. Congress should extend the National Wool Act.	Public Law 85–835, title IV extends the National Wool Act for 3 years, until March 31, 1962, and provides for the use of 70 percent of the ad valorem duties on wool (in addition to 70 percent of the specific duties).
10. Congress should continue the special school milk program.	Public Law 85–478 extends special school milk program for 3 years. Provides for each fiscal year $75 million of CCC funds to increase consumption of fluid milk by children.
11. March 4, 1957: In response to request for report, Secretary of Agriculture indicated approval of extension of Agricultural conservation program for 4 years, providing certain changes relating to State administration of the program be incorporated.	Public Law 85–553 extends the agricultural conservation program for 4 years, incorporating changes relating to State administration of the program suggested by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, despite the exceptional legislative cooperation in providing the Secretary with the tools he said he needed to solve the farm program, he has not solved it.

In fact, the opposite is true.

Over the past 6 years, total net farm income has averaged $3 billion per year below the level in 1952.

Farm prices have averaged 15 percent below the 1952 level.

The parity ratio, 100 percent in 1952, has averaged 85 percent in the past 6 years.

From the beginning of the farm program until 1953, Department of Agriculture expenditures averaged less than $1.5 billion per year.

During the past 6 years, those expenditures have averaged nearly 5 billion per year.

And they are increasing.

Secretary Benson started his management of the Department of Agriculture with $2.4 billion total Commodity Credit Corporation investment in farm commodities.

As of January 1, 1959—exactly 6 years later—that total inventory investment is $8.7 billion.

And according to the President's budget message, it will soon be over $10 billion.

This is the record of what has been done with the legislative tools he requested and which Congress has given him.

As the Senate Agriculture Committee hears the Secretary's presentation, it will be looking to the future—to new, sound programs which will help bring true prosperity to the farm families of our great country.

In planning for the future, let us this time give careful consideration to the record of the past.

FIVE BASIC PROBLEMS OF EDUCATION

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an article entitled "Five Basic Problems of Education," written by Fred M. Hechinger, and published in the New York Times magazine of January 25, 1959. I commend this informed and sobering article to all Senators.

There being no objection the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FIVE BASIC PROBLEMS OF EDUCATION

(By Fred M. Hechinger)

Ever since the cold war moved into outer space, the American people have been concerned about education. No longer is the sky the limit; even the moon is only a whistle stop. And in this futuristic contest, the classrooms are the launching platforms.

Hardly a week passes without several television programs peeking behind the scenes of education. Not long ago, a broadcaster cornered a few high school students, and their deplorable ignorance set off a national storm of criticism. The Rockefeller report on education got top billing on the front pages of even small-town dailies. Rear Adm. Hyman G. Rickover, father of the atomic submarine, received a sympathetic public ear when he proclaimed that, if the money for education could not be found in the Federal budget, the defense appropriation should be cut.

President Eisenhower appointed a special Committee on Education Beyond High School. The Ford Foundation made the largest gift in the history of private philanthropy for the increase of professors' salaries. James Bryant Conant, Harvard's former president, has devoted the past 2 years to an attempt to find out what is wrong with American high school education. In fact, the "Conant Report," which is set for publication next Wednesday, has already stirred up more excitement than many Government White Papers.

Everybody is concerned about education; but "education" is an elusive, amorphous thing. Before it can be understood and improved, some of the crucial problems must be singled out and defined. As an observer of the educational scene, I have visited classrooms, talked with teachers, listened to parents, sat through speeches and conventions, scanned the statistics and studied the reports.

Let me set down what seem the five most immediate problems; then let us see what the experts recommend.

The problem: (1) How can American standards of education be raised, and what, especially, can be done to meet the challenge of the exceptionally gifted child?

American democracy promises every child a full elementary and secondary education, but the unanswered question has always been how to do this without surrendering to the lowest common denominator. Our educational laissez-faire, which permits even able students to pick "elective" snap courses, has allowed standards to slip.

The raising of educational standards for the great mass of students would mean a spectacular improvement in the country's total reservoir of skills. But what about the small number of exceptionally gifted children—the top 2 percent? The talents of these, if lost, are irreplaceable. In terms of the country's progress and of competitive coexistence in a cold war period, they may well hold the key.

The proposed solutions: There is almost unanimous agreement that the search for quality in a system of quantity rates first attention. To cope with the problem of a curriculum which has been loaded down with an almost unlimited variety of subjects from driver education to citizenship training, the Rockefeller report, entitled "The Pursuit of Excellence," demands that "we reach some agreement on priorities in subject-matter." Educators are asked to make up their minds which of the many elective courses are most important.

The Conant report will go a step further. It will clearly demand that all high school students complete four years of English, three to four years of history and related social studies, one year of mathematics and one year of science. Students in the top 20 percent would take three additional years of science, three more years of mathematics and at least three years of one foreign language.

For all students there must be improved guidance. Dr. Conant asks for 1 guidance counselor for every 250 to 300 high school students. And, in order to assure adequate programs and facilities, he asks for elimination, through consolidation of all high schools with graduating classes of fewer than 100 students.

All proposals for the improvement of education demand a greater sense of continuity of subjects and a greater scope of understanding. Study of a foreign language for less than 3 years, says Dr. Conant, is like drilling for oil and then stopping before striking it. In the study of history, too, efforts are largely wasted unless there is a sense of the natural sequence of events.

For the 2 percent of gifted pupils, even more of a concession to the difference in human talent must be made. "A school system that insists on the same instruction for the talented, average, and below average child, said Rear Admiral Rickover, "may prevent as many children from growing intellectually as would a system that excludes children because of the social, political, or economic status of their parents. Neither system is democratic."

The experts agree. "Any educational system is, among other things, a great sorting-out process," says the Rockefeller report. But while the European sorting out is achieved almost entirely by impersonal examinations, the American experts call for a variety of tests, some scoring native talent, others the actual achievement of the student, with personal observation and guidance. Once the gifted students are recognized, the experts want them to be given advanced work, without separating them from their classmates.

Toward the end of high school, the extra work would be increased. Thus, juniors and seniors would be offered college-level instruction in some subjects, as they now are under the advanced placement program sponsored by the college entrance examination board. Another program for early admission to college, initiated by the Fund for the Advancement of Education and hailed by all the experts, has sent more than 1,000 gifted students to college during the past 5 years without completion of the last year or two of high school.

The problem: (2) How can we get better teachers?

There is no way to improve the quality of American education without an adequate supply of good teachers. Already a serious shortage of highly educated manpower exists. This shortage will become increasingly critical unless we find enough of what the Ford Foundation calls the "seed corn"—teachers who, through their superior efforts, help to raise new generations of educated brains.

Perhaps even worse, the standards set for the teachers are often pitifully low. For example, at a convention in Bowling Green, Ohio, recently, an education spokesman "demanded" that chemistry teachers be given at least thirty-two hours of college study in that subject. A Russian student in a college-preparatory high school, by comparison, gets more than 340 hours of chemistry before graduation.

The proposed solutions: "No educational system can be better than it teachers," warns the Rockefeller report. It estimates that the number of new teachers needed in the next decade is somewhere between one-third and one-half of all college graduates in that period. The present ratio of college graduates entering the teaching profession is only one out of every four or five. And yet, even today, the report warns, the problem of quality is critical. As of 1956, 33 per cent of all elementary teachers did not hold an A.B. degree, while more than 21 percent of all public school teachers had less than four years of college.

Since the training of all teachers depends on the quality of the training of college teachers, there is special significance in a report by the National Education Association that "since 1953–54, holders of the doctor's degree among newly employed, fulltime [college] teachers have decreased 25.2 percent." And the manpower pressures of the immediate future may make this situation even worse.

The Rockefeller report calls for an improvement in the courses and training procedures given teachers. "If the programs for the preparation of teachers are rigid, formalistic and shallow, they will drive away able minds as fast as they are recruited," it warns. "Unhappily, preparation for pre-college teaching has come all too close to that condition."

The report warns against the practice of handling teachers as interchangeable units in an educational assembly line. At present, the best teacher and the poorest in a school may teach the same grade and subject, use the same textbook, handle the same number of students, get paid the same salaries, and rise in salary at the same speed to the same ceiling. The ironic result is that school administration—and the end of active teaching—often becomes the only refuge for able teachers who want to advance their careers.

The problem of getting a sufficient number of teachers is primarily one of recruiting and of offering an attractive career. "But even with aggressive recruitment there appears to be little or no likelihood that we can bring into teaching at any level anything approaching the number of qualified and gifted teachers we need," says the Rockefeller report. "We must therefore utilize our superior teachers more effectively."

All the experts agree that, in the words of the Rockefeller report, "one way to make better use of the ablest teachers is to eliminate many of the petty tasks which occupy a teacher's time. Less highly trained classroom assistants may accomplish much in the lightening of this burden." The Fund for the Advancement of Education, putting this theory to the test in Bay City, Mich., found it successful, and it has spread from there to many communities across the country. A bonus, it was found, came when many of the aides, seeing teaching at its best, became so interested that they went back to college to get their teacher training.

Other experiments have been sparked by the success of the first one. The use of teams of teachers, made up of one master teacher, one regular teacher, and one untrained assistant has made it possible to increase the class size for some subjects to three times a normal classroom quota, while, at other times, permitting one teacher to work with only 8 to 12 pupils. The use of television has also made it possible to get more of the best teachers into contact with more students.

The problem: (3) Should we emphasize science as against the liberal arts?

However we respond to the challenge of sputnik or speculate about the importance of moon shots, one fact is inescapable—science and technology are intimately linked with modern man's destiny.

Traditionally, there used to be a clear dividing line between the liberal arts and the sciences. The high school student who thought he had no interest in a career of science frequently was allowed to get by with a minimum of mathematics and science instruction. Reports about the Russian schools, which go to the opposite extreme of requiring a stiff dose of science and mathematics for all high school students, have intensified the problem of just how much science training should be required of every high school graduate.

The proposed solutions: The experts agree on two fundamental points: (1) that, despite the panic headlines, science must not crowd out the humanities; (2) that it is vital for all students, not just the scientifically inclined, to have a thorough measure of basic mathematics and science.

On the first point, the President's Committee on Education Beyond High School says that the country would be inexcusably blind if it failed to see that the challenge of the next 20 years will require leaders not only in science and engineering and in business and industry, but in government and politics, in foreign affairs and diplomacy, in education and civic affairs.

On the second point, Dr. I. I. Rabi, Nobel Prize physicist and chairman of the President's Science Advisory Committee, says: "We must teach science as an intellectual pursuit rather than as a body of tricks." And he adds: "As yet, if a man has no feeling for art he is considered narrowminded, but if he has no feeling for science, he is considered quite normal. This is a fundamental weakness."

Probably the greatest waste of scientific talent stems from social clichés which discourage girls from studying science and mathematics as unladylike. Dr. Conant found that, even in the best high schools, fewer than half of the gifted girls elect 4 years of mathematics.

The experts agree that it is not a question of either/or between science and the liberal arts. The Rockefeller report warns as much against the narrowly trained scientist as against the educated man who is illiterate in science.

The problem: (4) Who should go to college?

Already more than 3 million young Americans are enrolled in college—a total of one-third of the eligible age group. Is universal college the next step, following the universal high school? Some State universities have, in practice, accepted this principle; they consider a high school diploma an automatic admission ticket. Other college spokesmen warn against the danger of indiscriminate admission policies as an invitaton to lowered standards. They are, however, more concerned that rising costs will price the colleges out of the market for many able students.

One fact is clear: even if the present policy of selection is continued, most colleges would have to double or triple in size by 1975 in order to accommodate the same percentage of students who go to college today.

No expert wants to restrict college admission, but all would like to see standards raised so that the restrictions could be built into the procedure of selection. They applaud current trends in that direction. They cite the announcement by the University of Illinois that by September 1960, its freshmen will no longer be nursed along in remedial English courses. They point with approval to more than a dozen colleges which have revived foreign language requirements for admission.

The problem is not so much whom to keep out of college, but rather how to make sure that those who should go to college do so.

The two roadblocks, the experts agree, are motivation and finances. To remove the first, they say that young people with talent will have to be shown more effectively that there is real value and excitement in higher education. To remove the second, they suggest more scholarships.

The President's Committee called for 10 times the present total amount of scholarship money, estimated at about $60 million. It wants about 200,000 of the ablest and neediest high school graduates annually to be assured of a college education by having the financial burden removed from them.

In addition, it calls for between 25,000 and 50,000 subsidized campus jobs so that another large group will be able to support itself with work-study programs. In order to build higher education firmly into the American way of life, the President's Committee also suggests that the tax laws be revised so that students and their parents would be assured of credits or deductions.

All the experts agree that there should be a greater number of 2-year colleges for those who are unwilling or unable to commit themselves to 4 years of higher eduaction.

Finally, the Conant report will urgently demand another reform plan which would eliminate those students who feel that they are inadequately prepared to make a living when they leave high school, and who go to college for vocational training rather than for education. The Conant plan would expect the high schools to offer vocational training of highest caliber to these students.

Considering the importance of the problem of who should go to college, it is disappointing to find the experts vague and hedging in their replies. The reason is simple: they are torn between rational planning and the commitment to an ideal. The first calls for toughness in setting up restrictions so that the colleges and universities can be made into institutions of excellence; the second dreams about the removal of all limitations from a child's educational horizon. At present, the American genius for compromise is in search of a formula that will be democratic without destroying the standards of scholarship and education.

The problem: (5) How do you pay for all this?

If mass and class in education are to be combined, perhaps for the first time in history, then the cost will be high. What compounds the difficulty is the almost pathological fear of Government control through Government financing. Yet, from the problem of the loss of potentially able teachers to higher paying jobs to the fact that local spending is not even beginning to catch up with school construction needs, every sign points to an inescapable truth: the present sources of money are insufficient to pay for a first-class mass education system.

Many schools are overcrowded, understaffed, and ill equipped. There is an estimated shortage of 142,000 classrooms and an "excess" of almost 2 million pupils. And within 10 years the high schools will have arrived at a point where they will face 50 to 75 percent more pupils than they now accommodate.

The proposed solutions: None of the experts has tackled the money problem with complete candor. The fear of an all-out fight over the principle of Federal aid has led to a flood of cautious statements and even more cautious legislation. Yet between the lines the implication is clear: Federal aid will have to be a permanent part of the picture.

What are the real needs? Our total expenditure for education, from elementary school through the universities, today is approximately $14 billion annually. This is 3.6 percent of the gross national product. The experts estimate that, in order to attain the goals of quality in a system of quantity, the Nation will have to spend $30 billion annually 10 years from now, with those $30 billion measured in terms of today's purchasing power. This would mean, according to the best economists' predictions, about 5 percent of the gross national product.

The Rockefeller report points out that local and State tax systems are in some respects archaic. School expenditures are charged almost entirely to the revenue raised through property tax—and this is also the tax which meets with the most solidly organized and most vocal opposition. It is no coincidence that the rejection of school bond issues in New York State reached an all-time high last year—despite sputnik.

"It is this weakness in the State and local taxing systems more than anything else that gives rise to current proposals for increased Fereral support of education," says the Rockefeller report. "For those who wish to resist or postpone the resort to Federal funds and at the same time not constrict educational services, there seem to be only one alternative: a thorough, painful, politically courageous overhaul of State and local tax systems."

Almost certainly this is not going to happen, and definitely not in time to bolster a weakened edifice of education.

The only public acknowledgment of these unpleasant facts was made by the White House Conference on Education, late in 1955, which voted better than 2 to 1 in favor of Federal aid to education, to be devoted specifically to school construction.

Congress omitted all Federal aid to school construction, however, after the administration's Federal aid proposals in 1958 completely dropped the demand for money for buildings.

Congress and the public had their eyes on scholarships, which they considered the chief ingredient of a crash program to compete with the Soviet Union. When it came to a vote and a series of compromises, the less than $1 billion aid bill offered mainly student loans (not scholarships); some graduate fellowships, plus special financial lures in the form of partly written-off loans to draw students into the teaching profession; and special funds for the improvement of guidance, language, and science teaching, vocational education and research. The largest single amount—$300 million—was earmarked to buy science equipment for school systems in the various States. The most critically needed items, funds for buildings and for teachers' salaries, were overlooked.

Thus, the real Federal aid problem as a key to the financing of the schools remains an issue, with the fear of Federal control still the major roadblock to more sweeping appropriations. The Rockefeller report points out some safeguards that could be built into Federal aid to prevent it from leading to Federal control:

1. Federal funds would be one source of support among many.

2. State, local, and private sources of funds should continue to be the major factor in the support of education.

3. Federal funds should be used only to balance the serious gaps in the total educational system, and should be given in such a manner as to encourage State and local governments to use their own resources.

Whatever the sources may be, the experts have no doubt whatsoever that, financially, we already face a real emergency. "It will not be enough to meet the problem grudgingly or with a little more money," says the Rockefeller report. "The Nation's need for good education is immediate; and good education is expensive. That is the fact which the American people have never been quite prepared to face. At stake is nothing less than our national greatness and our aspirations for the dignity of the individual. If the public is not prepared for this, then responsible educators, business leaders, political leaders, unions, and civic organizations must join in a national campaign to prepare them."

ORDERLY RENEWAL AND DEVELOPMENT OF URBAN LOCALITIES

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, ACTION—The American Council To Improve Our Neighborhoods—is a national private organization for the creation and maintenance of a good environment in our Nation's cities. ACTION has recently issued a statement of intention which indicates that on May 4, 5, and 6, 1959, it will convene a selected audience of the policy and decision makers of America to determine how to handle the critical problem of the growth of our cities and the spreading of slums. I ask unanimous consent that the statement of intention by ACTION be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A STATEMENT OF INTENTION BY ACTION

On May 4, 5, and 6, 1959, ACTION will convene a selected audience of the policy and decision makers of America to launch a new program for America's cities. The conference will be held in Newark, N.J., where an impressive partnership of private and public leadership is creating the new Newark. Attendance will be by invitation only.

The explosive growth of new areas and the accelerating obsolescence of older areas provide a framework of urgency for the conference. The special content of the meetings will be the product of nearly 3 years of ACTION's special research in housing and community development.

The American economy stands or falls upon the strength or weakness of our industrialized urban areas where the great majority of our people now live, work, and do business. Uncontrolled growth and unchecked decay are twin forces creating extraordinary problems in the proper functioning of our cities. Great sums of private and public funds have been spent and much more will be spent to cope with these problems. New resources, new methods, and new leadership must be identified and enlisted to measure up to the task and the opportunity of the American city. American private enterprise, particularly, is challenged with the future of the American city.

The ACTION method to meet this challenge is to bring together leaders from industry, labor, government, and civic organizations with specialists in urban affairs. Accordingly, ACTION has called the Newark conference on the ACTION program for the American city to present the basis for the continuing, orderly renewal, and development of our cities in the tradition of American enterprise and initiative.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, it is important that we think of our housing, urban redevelopment, and slum clearance programs as national programs, not as programs for the benefit of vested interests which are working against the interests of the general taxpayer, not as programs for homebuilders or mayors, but as programs intended to insure the policy set forth in earlier housing acts, namely, to provide a good home for every American family.

It is important to know that a splendid organization like ACTION has been organized, and includes among its approximately 40 directors the representatives of many large American corporations, as well as several labor leaders and public servants—in fact, the whole spectrum of leadership in America which is interested in this critical program.

Mr. President, in order that the editorial writers who read the RECORD may have an opportunity to see how widespread is this support for urban renewal, slum clearance, and more and better housing, I ask unanimous consent that the names and occupations of the directors of ACTION be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the names were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. For some time since Congress convened, I have been working with the distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania in an attempt to develop a vehicle for putting into effect a program in the important field to which he has just referred. I am pleased to observe that the Senator from Pennsylvania is alert and aggressive, and has manifested great leadership in this field.

I trust that very shortly Congress will be able to face up to this problem, and will conduct a study which will make a thorough exploration so as to determine the best vehicle that can be used to bring about a redevelopment of the great metropolitan areas of our country and make the people acutely aware of the obligations which they have in this respect.

I commend the Senator from Pennsylvania for his diligence, for his constructiveness, and for the comprehensive approach which he has displayed in this matter.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the distinguished majority leader for his kind remarks. Needless to say, I welcome his support, which is essential to the making of further progress in this important field.

JUSTIFICATION OF DEFENSE SPENDING

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, the New Yorld Herald Tribune, the Washington Post, and numerous other papers recently carried a column by Roscoe Drummond which cogently points out the need for an informed public on defense matters.

It is not enough for a relatively few Members of Congress to have the basic knowledge essential to intelligent judgment on the shape and scale of our defense effort. The defense program must have the active support and confidence of the American people and this in turn requires that the people be convinced of its adequacy.

Mr. President, I am heartily in agreement with Mr. Drummond on this point. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point both Mr. Drummond's column and my own remarks on this matter, delivered to the congressional dinner of the New Jersey State Chamber of Commerce which was held in Washington February 5.

There being no objection, the column and remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEED FOR MORE FACTS—PRESIDENT MUST INFORM PUBLIC TO WIN SUPPORT

(By Roscoe Drummond)

President Eisenhower is going to lose his battle for a balanced budget if he doesn't get out from behind his desk and convince the country that it is taking no risk in not spending more for defense.

There is widespread anxiety over the Soviet lead in long-range missiles and it isn't persuasive enough to suggest that, because the Soviet boast to have invented baseball is dubious, the Soviet boast on missile production can be dismissed.

It may well be dubious but I think the public is not going to take anybody's simple say-so on faith.

What we need is more facts and we are not yet getting them.

For this reason I expect that the President will shortly be taking his case to the country. That will be all to the good.

What will really count however, is what method the President takes to assure the country that the projected defense program is equal to the danger which surrounds us.

Obviously, by virtue of his military experience, Mr. Eisenhower will have great credibility. But because he has put such a high priority on balancing the budget, there will understandably be many who will want to know, and feel they have a right to know, not just the President's conclusion that all is well but also the facts on which he bases his conclusion.

In deciding how frankly and how fully he will lay out the evidence, it seems to me that Mr. Eisenhower will have to put these two questions very much to the fore:

Is there any reasonable prospect that he can persuade this Democratic Congress to keep the budget in balance, unless he can convince the country that the proposed defense spending is comfortably adequate?

Can the President convince the country that all is well with our defenses in comparison with the Soviets' unless he is prepared to tell enough of what the Government believes it knows about Soviet capability so that people can make up their own minds?

There may be, as some administration spokesmen say, a lot of people who are misled into believing that the Soviets are a lot further ahead than they are. At the same time there are plenty of sincere and intelligent people who deeply believe that the administration is resolving the risk too narrowly. With them it will take more facts—not more opinions—to do the convincing.

Secretary of Defense Neil McElroy told Congress this week that the American stockpile of operational ICBM's "will be within a few of the Russian total at the end of the year." That makes the missile gap seem not very ominous.

But if the public is going to be persuaded to share Mr. McElroy's confidence, it must have a fair amount of the facts which persuade Mr. McElroy that within 10 months our stockpile of ICBM's will be "within a few" of the Soviets. What do we know about the Soviet stockpile? How do we know? How well do we know? Those are the questions which need answering.

At his latest press conference Mr. Eisenhower was asked whether he had any information about Soviet submarines off American shores. His reply was that he did not want to discuss this because he couldn't be sure whether his knowledge "was in the public domain or restricted."

The question which many people will ask is: Why should information on Soviet submarines off U.S. shores—if there are any—not be in the public domain? Why should it be classified?

One of the complaints of Republicans was that previous recent administrations operated too often on the theory that "Papa knows best"; or, "You don't need to know, just leave it to the Government."

Admittedly there are security boundaries beyond which the Government can't go, but it seems clear to me that if the President wants to win the battle of the balanced budget, he will have to take the country into his confidence and give the people not more opinion but more information on which they can reach their own opinion.

PARTIAL TEXT OF REMARKS PREPARED FOR DELIVERY BY SENATOR CLIFFORD P. CASE AT 22D CONGRESSIONAL DINNER OF NEW JERSEY STATE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, AT HOTEL STATLER, WASHINGTON, D.C., FEBRUARY 5, 1959

A few days ago hearings on the defense posture of the United States opened before the Senate Preparedness Subcommittee and the Space Committee of which I am a member. For 2 days the klieg lights burned in the crowded hearing room as one after another of the Chiefs of our Defense Establishment was questioned as to his view of the adequacy of our defense effort.

The gravity of the questions the committee was endeavoring to explore dominated the proceedings. The dedication and sincerity of those who carry the immediate responsibility for the defense of the Nation was apparent. The questioning was long and intensive. Nonetheless, I doubt that any member of the committee, much less the public generally, came away satisfied he had the answers to the questions raised.

The members of the committee had the assurance of executive sessions to follow at which matters scarcely touched in the public sessions could be more thoroughly explored. This may be fine for the committee members but where does it leave John Q. Public, who, in our system, must ultimately make or at least ratify decisions of national policy?

Whatever his occupation, or his income level, the first concern of every good American is the safety of the Nation. The American people will do whatever is necessary to assure adequate protection of the national security. But they must know what is necessary. And to know this both the people and the Congress must have the facts.

This is not a little matter. The survival of the country is involved. It is intolerable that either the Congress or the country should have to decide these questions on the basis of piecemeal information, inspired stories, leaks, rumors, charges, and countercharges. Speeches about a sense of urgency, or the lack of it, are no help whatever. On the other hand, the need is not met by assurance that the Chiefs of our Defense Establishment, or even that the President himself, regard the present level of our defense effort as adequate. We must have the facts.

Only in this manner will Congressman or citizen be able to find his way through the controversy now centering on the defense budget. That controversy is by no means all political in nature though undeniably some seek to make defense a partisan issue. Nor can it be explained wholly in terms of the undoubted economic interest of some segments of industry or the long standing competition between the services. All these factors are present but they will not control the situation except by default.

The immediate question is, of course, the size of the defense budget and, in particular, the amounts allocated for missiles and space programs. I am not here arguing for a higher budget or a smaller one. I do say that the size of the budget should not be controlling. We can have a higher defense budget if it is necessary. And, of course, we should have a lower one if it can safely be cut. But I am not here expressing any view as to what the defense budget should be. I am, like everyone else in Congress or outside it, seeking the facts which I need in order to make an intelligent judgment.

Let me be specific. A few days ago, Gen. Nathan F. Twining, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, appeared before the Armed Services Committee to brief committee members in executive session. Following the meeting an unclassified version of his testimony was released. His testimony included an evaluation of U.S. capabilities as compared with Soviet strength. As a noted military reporter pointed out, this is the crux of the matter. Yet the only reference in the release to this part of his testimony was the terse statement "there followed a step-by-step evaluation of our capabilities."

It was encouraging to note the view subsequently expressed by the experienced and highly respected chairman of the Armed Services Committee to the effect that he believes American strategic bombers will keep this country superior in striking power for another year. How much better, however, if the public generally knew the grounds for his confidence—and the grounds for the apprehension for the future that he also expressed. What could be more vital to the American people than the substance of the testimony of General Twining and our other military leaders on this point?

How can we justify depriving the American people of information that can alone provide the basis for intelligent judgment on the issues confronting us?

Surely we are not fooling the Soviet. We know from our own work the various ways in which knowledge of another's military and scientific effort can be gathered. It would be imprudent indeed to assume that the Soviet Union cannot and does not do the same. Some data by their nature cannot be concealed and certainly there is no longer room to doubt that the Soviet has the scientific, technical, and industrial prowess to be able to correlate and interpret them. So far as the essential facts are concerned, the question is not one of denying the Soviet but rather of denying the American people.

The essence of representative government is that it governs by and with the consent of the people. Under that system no policy can long endure without widespread public support and understanding.

I am confident that Americans can and will measure up to any challenge, whatever the cost. But they will not—they cannot—respond unless they are told promptly and fully what we are up against and what the choices before us are. I deeply believe that to give them that choice is the highest responsibility of leadership in America today.

TAXABILITY OF GIFTS OF CHRISTMAS TURKEYS

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD the text of a letter written by me under date of February 4, 1959, to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and his reply to me, dated February 9, 1959, concerning an Associated Press article relating to the taxability of Christmas turkeys as gifts.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., February 4, 1959.

Hon. DANA LATHAM,
Commissioner of Internal Revenue,
Treasury Department,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. LATHAM: In an Associated Press article appearing in the papers today the Internal Revenue Service at Tacoma, Wash., is quoted as having ruled that a gift of a Christmas turkey by an employer to his employee is taxable to the employee and that the tax must be withheld.

Will you please send me a copy of this ruling along with information as to how the tax is computed; that is, is it based on the cost to the employer or on the retail price of what the employee would have paid had he purchased a turkey?

Is this ruling uniform with the Treasury Department, or is it just a ruling of the Tacoma office?

Would the ruling go further and include as taxable items, other types of small Christmas gifts by employers either to their employees or to their customers? Would this not include withholding tax on the distribution of calendars, desk pads, etc.?

I ask these questions not to be facetious, but frankly the ruling does appear to be rather ridiculous.

Yours sincerely,

JOHN J. WILLIAMS.

U.S. TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington D.C., February 9, 1959.

Senator JOHN J. WILLIAMS,
U.S. Senate
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WILLIAMS: I have your letter of February 4, 1959, with respect to the recent Associated Press article dealing with Christmas turkeys, and affecting a certain taxpayer located at Tacoma, Wash.

In your letter you ask for a copy of the ruling purportedly applied by our Tacoma district office. You also ask other questions with respect to this ruling.

There has been no official ruling with respect to this point up until February 6. However, our various district offices had in general taken the position stated to have been applied by our Tacoma office. Accordingly, in practice our Tacoma office was not, in fact, out of line.

For more than a year this troublesome matter has been under study here. I am happy to advise you that on February 6, 1959, we issued an official technical information release, a copy of which is enclosed for your information. This TIR will be issued as Revenue Ruling 59–58, and will appear in our official Internal Revenue Bulletin on February 24, 1959. It will, of course, constitute official instructions at all our offices with respect to this matter.

You will note two excerpts from said ruling:

"It is accordingly held that the value of a turkey, ham, or other item of merchandise of similar nominal value, distributed by an employer to an employee at Christmas, or a comparable holiday, as part of a general distribution to employees engaged in the business of the employer as a means of promoting their good will, does not constitute wages subject to income tax withholding or wages for Federal Insurance Contributions Act or Federal Unemployment Tax Act purposes.

"It is further held that the cost to the employer of turkeys, hams, and other merchandise of similar nominal value which are distributed generally to the employees engaged in his business, primarily for the business purpose of promoting good relations with his employees, is deductible by the employer under section 162 of the Code as an ordinary and necessary business expense."

The first of the above excerpts will answer your particular question with respect to other small gifts, such as calendars, desk pads, etc.

It is our belief that the issuance of the official revenue ruling will dispose of this troublesome matter.

We appreciate your interest in this problem. Should anything not be entirely clear, please let me know.

Sincerely yours,

DANA LATHAM,
Commissioner.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT UNTIL NOON TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its deliberations today it stand in adjournment until noon tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

GROUND-BREAKING CEREMONY AT EAST FRONT OF THE CAPITOL

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Architect of the Capitol has arranged a ground-breaking ceremony for Monday next, February 23, at 11 o'clock. It will be held at about the middle of the construction work on the east front of the Capitol. The program will be very short; and I simply direct the attention of the Senate to the fact that the program will take place. All Senators are invited, and are urged to attend.

CIVIL DEFENSE PROGRAM EXPENDITURES

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, I hold in my hand an article which was published in the Cincinnati Post and Times-Star of February 2, and which reads in part as follows:

CIVIL DEFENSE SEEKS BIG HIKE IN BUDGET

WASHINGTON.—Tucked away in President Eisenhower's new budget is a request for a big expansion of the Federal civil defense program.

Lee A. Hoegh, chief executive of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, wants Congress to double his money—

And so forth.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CIVIL DEFENSE SEEKS BIG HIKE IN BUDGET

(By Robert Crater)

WASHINGTON.—Tucked away in President Eisenhower's new budget is a request for a big expansion of the Federal civil defense program.

Lee A. Hoegh, chief executive of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, wants Congress to double his money, making the new total $87 million. This would enable him to take over financing of some civil defense activities handled by other departments and still expand the civil defense program.

Chairman ALBERT THOMAS, Democrat, Texas, of the House Independent Offices Appropriations Subcommittee, says he is going to take a long, sharp look at the request.

Civil defense has been growing in recent years. In 1955, the agency had 737 employees. That total has moved up each year. Hoegh now is asking for 1,750 employees, of whom 225 would be from the old Office of Defense Mobilization.

Under a law enacted last year, the OCDM now shares civil defense responsibilities with the States. This also means more Federal money-matching funds to pay local civil defense salaries and administrative expenses, including civil defense uniforms.

This program calls for $3 million for the remainder of this fiscal year and $12 million for fiscal 1960.

Hoegh also is anxious to get nearly $6 million for a prototype shelter program. This would be used to help cities provide fallout retreats in buildings normally used for other purposes.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, the times demand of us, as elected Senators of 49 sovereign States, that we work with fidelity and zeal to eliminate unnecessary Government spending.

It appears to me that we have a solemn duty to make this Nation one of utmost strength against the threat of aggression from the dictators of the Soviet Union. Billions of dollars of necessary expenditures—probably $41 billion or more—will be required during the fiscal year for national defense. Dictators respect and fear strength, and might well plunge us into war were we to weaken our defenses and become "sitting ducks" for a possibly overwhelming surprise attack.

But, Mr. President, upon reading the news item which was published in the Cincinnati Post and Times-Star, I made a call at the offices of civil defense. In just a short time, I obtained some 15 pamphlets and booklets which set forth their program, and so forth, for civil defense. Of course, there are many more pamphlets of this sort; but I now hold in my right hand one which is captioned "Rural Family Defense," and on my desk are 14 other booklets or pamphlets—all printed at considerable expense to the taxpayers. In reading that material, Mr. President, it seemed to me that they involved an astonishing and astounding expenditure of the taxpayers' money.

Mr. President, in view of this staggering burden of defense costs, we must be zealous to eliminate nonessential Government spending of every character. Today I propose to cover briefly one aspect of our domestic situation whereby, if we take proper action, I feel we may save our taxpayers many millions of dollars.

I assert that over the years there has been tremendous unnecessary spending for civil defense.

I assert that our civil defense program has become outmoded and obsolete, and that it would be a shameful waste of public money to continue in the same pattern.

We live in a jet age; and in the intense rivalry between this Nation and the Soviet Union a fearsome milestone has been passed in the successful testing and firing of intercontinental ballistic missiles.

We live in an age of challenge, Mr. President. In this space age, with jetplanes exceeding the speed of sound, and with the dread portent of intercontinental ballistic missiles and rockets soaring into space toward targets continents apart, what justification may a public servant dedicated to the welfare and defense of this Nation find in voting to continue the vast expense of a civil defense program geared to a bygone era?

Our Atlas intercontinental ballistic missiles and those of the Soviets of even greater power are presently the ultimate in military weapons. The fact is that neither we nor they have any defense against these tremendous nuclear weapons other than immediate retaliation from whatever bases may not have been destroyed in the initial surprise attack. Perhaps scientific research will develop such defenses in the future; but about this we cannot afford to speculate.

At the present, and in the years ahead, Mr. President, Soviet intercontinental ballistic missiles will span continents in approximately 20 minutes. Perhaps the director of civil defense in Cleveland, Marion, or some other Ohio city could hope to have about 5 minutes', or 3 minutes' warning of its approach. But that is all. Hydrogen warheads could lay waste to vast areas with a single blow, thus destroying entire cities, immediately, killing hundreds of thousands; later due to radiation and fallout, killing additional thousands.

In World War II, pinpoint bombing was desired. But if ever the Soviet Union attacks this Nation, there will be no effort at pinpoint bombing. Rather, the missiles and the jet bombers will aim at the mass destruction of entire key industrial centers.

The truth is that if the Communist dictators were to wage war against us next year, a child in Detroit, Cleveland, or Pittsburgh would be in the frontline, and would be in greater danger of sudden death than would members of our Armed Forces in some installations and frontier posts in the continental United States.

The fact is that industrial cities and centers would doubtless be prime targets. A State capital, such as Columbus or Springfield or Sacramento, would probably never be thought of as a possible target. Yet the high-salaried civil defense officials in my State of Ohio have preempted for their headquarters one of the best and one of the most expensive buildings in Columbus.

Mr. President, it is no secret that scientists of the Soviet Union and of the free world are seeking greater accuracy for intercontinental ballistic misslies. If and when this is achieved, of course the logical targets at the onset, at least, would not be Washington, D.C., or our key industrial centers; rather, they would be our missile bases, our retaliatory potential. Were all of the missile bases of the Nation to be destroyed, the war might be over almost as soon as commenced. But we may depend upon it that there is no possibility that the Soviet Union could accomplish this by sneak attack. This Nation has the capacity to retaliate, and will do so. Our missile bases could not be destroyed in one attack or even in several attacks. They are widely dispersed, and no doubt some are hidden beneath the ground or in other places impervious to attack.

An encouraging note, of course, is that the odds are going up from month to month against nuclear weapons ever being used in war by one nation against the other.

The facts show the futility of utilizing the time and effort of good, patriotic persons who volunteer for civil defense. They show the futility, in fact the stupidity, in this Nation's and its various States and municipalities, spending hundreds of millions of dollars for our present civil defense program. Yet, the Federal Government, the States, and hundreds of cities and towns have done so in recent years. There are hundreds of cities in the United States where civil defense headquarters are maintained, where there are salaried civil defense employees, some holding what amounts to no more than sinecures, and where it would require a vivid imagination to conceive of any reason for an enemy attack. This is one of the categories of expenditures, and a vital one, in which real economy in Government should be sought.

Over the past 9 years, nearly $500 million has been appropriated by the Congress for civil defense. Last year my own State of Ohio was the recipient of $696,000 in Federal-contributed matching funds. Last year, Federal surplus property donated to the State of Ohio for civil defense purposes, consisting of vehicles, tractors, firetrucks, forklifts, generators, and other accessories, represented a total acquisition value in the sum of $827,000. I question the preparedness of Ohio's cities in the event of attack. I question the utility of the purposes for which this money was spent and these materials donated. I question whether additional Ohioans' lives will be saved by these expenditures in the event of an attack.

I assert that most of this money has been wasted.

The expenditure of these vast sums of money for civil defense could well stand thorough investigation. I question the value of this tremendous outlay of taxpayers' money in terms of what it has done and what it will do for the defense of this Nation. Our constituents are entitled to know if their tax money is being spent wisely in the field of civil defense.

Intercontinental ballistic missiles and jetplanes with ever-increasing speeds could not possibly be observed through the services of volunteer sky watchers who, in reality, have been wasting their time and efforts.

Yet it was only recently that civil defense officials—and I am referring to salaried officials, many of them very high salaried officials—directed that sky watchers, patriotic people in my State and in other States, be disbanded.

For another example of the waste of public funds in this area, we need look no farther than here in Washington, D.C. A 2-year study was undertaken—and, of course, all the persons who undertook that study here in Washington were being paid high salaries—and now the civil defense agency is about to publish and distribute 850,000 copies of a guidebook to be distributed, at Government expense, to all residing within a 20-mile radius of the Washington Monument. The purpose is to indicate an evacuation zone and escape route to cities in Maryland, Virginia, and West Virginia, where help is supposed to be available to persons forced to evacuate Washington, D.C.

The book also gives instructions to every family, every one of the 850,000 recipients of the book, to follow directions and build basement shelters and build up food supplies for their families. The book lists survival items, so-called, and suggests the purchase of 2 weeks' food supply for a family. Those who desire and can afford to spend money and follow these directions will be helping grocers and building contractors; otherwise, it is difficult to see any good that is accomplished.

One hundred and ninety-five sirens are to be installed, so it appears the citizens will be annoyed by a lot of practice, screeching sirens, which, incidentally, cost money.

The expenditures to which I have referred have been made in many instances without any justification whatsoever.

I pay tribute to the thousands of good, loyal, patriotic men and women who are presently volunteering, or have in the past volunteered, for service in civil defense. They sought to render this Nation real and needful public service.

Volunteer workers in the recent past in floods, windstorms, and raging fires have performed nobly, unselfishly, and effectively, and this is a fact of which they and all of us may take pride. Some civil defense volunteer workers have lost their lives and others have been injured in assisting local police and military authorities. But no high salaried civil defense officials, anywhere in this Nation, have made any such sacrifice.

This Congress should put an end to topheavy expenditures from Washington on down in civil defense and stop the flow of wasted millions of dollars, saving that money for our taxpayers, or, if necessary, spending it for more useful purposes.

Let us hope that the armaments race to acquire these terrible weapons of destruction will cease, and that the example of outlawing poison gases will be followed. Let us hope that the nations of the world will come to their senses, if only for the fear of retaliation, so that we and the generations to come shall never fear or know the effects of a nuclear war.

It may well be that eventually a stalemate will be reached in the missile field and in scientific research, and that the nations of the free world, as well as the Soviet Union, will have a stockpile of nuclear weapons so great that neither will dare attack the other; and that after conference and negotiations, definite enforceable agreements may be entered into, with full and adequate supervision provided, so that there will be an end to the present grim and threatening period.

This time may be far off. Yet, whether it it far off or immediate, we owe a duty to the citizens of the States we represent to carefully review all appropriations sought for and considered in the name of civil defense.

My view is that here is a place where we may save taxpayers millions of dollars and in no manner place this Nation in jeopardy, were we to curtail or eliminate civil defense expenditures and do away with unnecessary and unproductive high-salaried civil defense officials.

In a cold war or a limited shooting war our air, military, and naval might are the deterrents which are effective in restraining potential enemies, such as Red China, or the Soviet Union, from starting world war III by a sudden, all-out surprise attack. Civil defense has no function in such a situation.

If a tremendous worldwide conflagration is brought upon us by a surprise attack upon our missile installations, and our retaliatory attacks instantly follow, if we are suddenly plunged into world war III by the surprise attacks of the Soviet Union or the Communist Chinese Republic, civil defense will be ineffective. Civil defense activities, as they are presently proposed, might even hinder military defense and interfere with important movements of our Armed Forces with the onset of an all-out war.

The time is here for a reappraisal of civil defense.

Mr. President, I assert that the demand made by Leo A. Hoegh, Director of the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, that Congress double the appropriation for civil defense, is shocking. We should oppose any expansion of the civil defense program. This agency has grown by leaps and bounds and is topheavy now with high salaried officials.

If the Congress would be so wasteful of taxpayers' money as to include in the appropriations $87 million, this useless and topheavy civil defense Federal setup would be increased from its present status of some 1,634 officials and employees, all with good salaries, to between 1,750 and 1,800 officials and employees; useless shelters would be constructed; and approximately $14 million worth of emergency supplies and equipment of doubtful value would be procured.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I yield to the majority leader.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have been following the Senator's very lucid statement with great interest. Did I correctly understand the Senator to say that the proposal was to increase the number of employees in civil defense from 1,650 to 1,750?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. From approximately 1,650 to about 1,750. At present the number is 1,634, I want the distinguished Senator from Texas to know. The increase, if the application shall be granted, will increase the salaried positions, many of which are for very high salaried officials employed in Washington and elsewhere, to approximately 1,750 or 1,800 salaried positions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. How much in dollars is involved?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. $87 million at the present time. Over the years, some $800 million, I am sorry to say, has been expended. I want the distinguished majority leader to know that, in my humble opinion, practically all the expenditure has been a waste of money.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. How much increase is contemplated in fiscal 1960 compared to fiscal 1959?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. The amount would be doubled. The news item which I saw, published in the Cincinnati Post and Times-Star, stated that the Administrator was seeking to double the budget of the last application.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In other words, the budget recommendations for fiscal 1960 would double the civilian defense funds, over those provided by the Congress in fiscal 1959, if granted?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. That is correct. The news item went on to say that in President Eisenhower's budget, the application of the Civil Defense Administrator was for double the amount provided last year. The distinguished Representative from Texas who is handling the appropriation in the other body stated he was startled over this matter, and would give it a clear look.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I wish to commend the Senator for the observations he has made. Of course as a member of the committee, I should like to reserve judgment on the specifics, until I hear the testimony to justify a proposal which would seek to double the appropriations in any sphere.

I recognize, as does the Senator, that we must stop, look, and listen, and exercise great caution and prudence in connection with each and every appropriation bill.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio has made a real contribution today. I am proud to say the Senator is a member of the Aeronautical and Space Sciences Committee. That committee will meet tomorrow to start reviewing some of the authorizations which the agency is asking for the coming fiscal year. I contemplate the naming of a subcommittee, and I am going to ask the distinguished Senator from Ohio to serve on the subcommittee.

While I do not care to pass judgment on the merits or demerits of what the Senator may have said, I think that in the days ahead we are going to have to scrutinize very carefully every single budget proposal in every field. For instance, I was shocked to learn that even the Justice Department is asking for a substantial increase in the number of lawyers it employs. One day we are told that we are spenders, and the next day we are asked to please increase the number of lawyers in the Justice Department. One day we are told we are spenders, and the next day we are asked, "Please double our civil defense funds."

I can understand that an emergency situation may arise, and I am sympathetic to real needs, but I observe to the Senator that I think he is performing a real function, and I hope the members of the Appropriations Committee, such as the distinguished Senator from Nevada, whom I see present in the Chamber, will stop, look and listen, and will review what the Senator from Ohio has said. I hope the members of the Appropriations Committee will go very thoroughly into all questions raised by anyone asking increases, in an attempt to penetrate and get the real justifications, if any, for the increases.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I thank the senior Senator from Texas very sincerely.

In another minute I shall bring my remarks to a close, Mr. President. It is my hope that we shall all reserve our judgment, and scrutinize very carefully each matter presented to us.

Mr. President, in addition, in the demand made of Congress there is an item for $12 million, carried under the heading "X." That item will be scrutinized very carefully, because the American people are entitled to have the facts, and surely their representatives in the Congress should hit this proposal and hit it hard.

The cruel facts are, from the taxpayers' standpoint, that in addition to the Federal expenditures called for, hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent and are being spent by State and municipal governments of practically every State in the Union for civil defense.

Most of this money is wasted. Many high-salaried officials have sinecures. The fine patriotic men and women who volunteer for civil defense service and the taxpayers, generally, are the victims.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Did I correctly understand the distinguished Senator from Ohio to say that he thought all the money appropriated for civil defense was virtually wasted?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. If the distinguished Senator from Illinois heard that and if I said it, I will say now I do not feel that all of the money spent for civil defense over the years from 1952 to the present time has been wasted by any means, but I think there has been great waste. When the Administration comes in to ask for a doubling of the amount of last year's expenditures, I think we should scrutinize the request very carefully, because I am confident that many hundreds of thousands of dollars, or even millions of dollars, in fact, appropriated for civil defense, have been wasted.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Of course, the Senator knows that the Civil Defense Administration was created by an act of Congress, and that from time to time new duties have been assigned to that Administration. Only last year there was considerable discussion on the floor of the Senate with respect to those duties and responsibilities in a different field. Obviously, if the Congress is to give the Administration new duties, those duties can be articulated only if the necessary money and necessary personnel to execute them are provided.

I have one further question. I could not tell whether the figures the Senator used were figures derived from the Budget Bureau, or whether they were from press dispatches.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. They are derived from both sources; also from the records of the State of Ohio and other States, as well as cities which keep records of their expenditures in this field.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Did the Senator document which portion of his figures came from the press and which came from the Budget Bureau?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I have not documented that point in detail, but I can very easily do so.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Would it be possible, in reading the Senator's remarks, for a person to distinguish between what was officially documented and what came from the Washington Post?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a compilation such as is suggested by the Senator from Illinois.

There being no objection, the compilation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR YOUNG OF OHIO

The figures that I have referred to earlier are substantiated by the annual statistical reports of the Federal Civil Defense Administration and by further memorandums from the Federal Civil Defense Administration.

The reference I made to the press concerned the Cincinnati Post and Times-Star and not, by the way, the Washington Post, to which Senator DIRKSEN referred.

These press remarks were simply a corroboration on their part of the figures which were supplied to me by the Federal Civil Defense Administration.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. DIRKSEN obtained the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Illinois may yield to me for the purpose of moving that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, and that, during the consideration of the Executive Calendar, I may yield 1 minute to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], without the Senator from Illinois losing the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the Executive Calendar.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Philip W. Bonsal, of the District of Columbia, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Cuba.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Philip K. Crowe, of Maryland, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Union of South Africa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Sheldon T. Mills, of Oregon, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to this nomination?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas obtained the floor.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I thank the majority leader for his characteristic courtesy. I wish to make a brief statement concerning Sheldon T. Mills, of Portland, Oreg., who fortunately is to be the new Ambassador of our country to the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan.

Ambassador Mills has recently served with great distinction in Afghanistan.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point, as a part of my remarks, a statement from the International Cooperation Administration describing the effective use of our mutual security program under the direction of Ambassador Sheldon T. Mills.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D.C., May 19, 1958.

Hon. RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR NEUBERGER: Prior to returning to his post in Kabul, Afghanistan, early this month, Ambassador Sheldon Mills requested that we provide you with a comparative statement of U.S. and Soviet assistance to Afghanistan.

In making a comparison of the relative amounts of aid supplied by the Soviet bloc and by the United States, it is important that the different character of the two programs be recognized. Many conceptual difficulties are involved in making exact comparisons of aid data. These difficulties result in large part from the characteristics of the two aid programs. One important distinguishing characteristic of bloc aid is that it is generally presented on a long-term basis without reference to annual commitments, and in a package form which may include a long-term line of credit, technical assistance, training, military assistance and, in particular, increased trade opportunities. Such single package offers can have great appeal, particularly when the recipient country is having difficulty in marketing its export products. In addition, this Soviet combination provides arrangements for repayment of loans. There is no Soviet private sector active in foreign markets, and since most of the Soviet assistance is repayable in commodities, it must be assumed that much of what previously passed for trade is now aid.

The U.S. mutual security program has generally provided aid in annual increments, supplemented by loans from the U.S. Export-Import Bank, by agricultural commodity sales, where the local currency proceeds are loaned to the country for economic development and by private investment. Trade is mostly outside the U.S. aid program. In the nature of the ICA operation, there is no commitment stage involving a signed umbrella agreement which is comparable with the long-term line of credit commitments made by the Soviet bloc. U.S. assistance necessarily is limited to yearly appropriations by the Congress, while the bloc countries extend lines of credit which can be drawn down over a period of time as projects are agreed upon. A large part of U.S. assistance has been in the form of grants. In contrast, it is doubtful if more than $200,000 equivalent of the more than $160 million of bloc assistance to Afghanistan has been on a grant basis.

Economic and military assistance has been provided to Afghanistan in substantial volume by the Soviet bloc since the first credits were extended by the U.S.S.R. and Czechoslovakia in 1954. By the end of April 1958, the total credit provided for by agreements in effect was $161 million, including $129 million for economic assistance and $32 million for military assistance. This amount includes the $100 million line of credit extended by the U.S.S.R. in 1956 for a variety of vaguely described development projects, including airfields, roads, irrigation projects, motor repair shops, hydroelectric projects, and a laboratory.

It is believed that by now the arms and other military equipment to be supplied by the bloc have been largely delivered. Although perhaps less than one-fourth of the credit extended under the economic aid agreement has been drawn down, substantial progress has been reported on many of the projects covered by the agreements. Streets of Kabul were paved and one asphalt factory near Kabul was completed with a line of credit extended in 1954. Construction has been completed on a grain silo, flour mill, bakery, petroleum storage tanks, and cement plant. Surveys have been made or construction begun on various other projects, including a new highway over the Hindu Kush mountains and airport construction. A number of buses and taxicabs were delivered, and also equipment for a 100-bed hospital. Although a substantial part of the $100 million credit from the U.S.S.R. has been obligated for specific projects, actual expenditures to date have probably been relatively small.

It has been estimated that in the last half of 1955 there were more than 450 bloc technicians in Afganistan, most of whom were Russian, the remainder Czech. It is expected that the Afghan petroleum development program will more than double the number of bloc technicians in Afghanistan over the next 4 years. In addition, a number of Russian military specialists were in the country engaged on a training program.

Standard U.S. procedure requires that any project be economically justifiable and feasible from an engineering standpoint before a commitment is made. Clearly, these considerations have not worried the U.S.S.R. at the time they have made their initial commitments, as their real intent has been to draw the Afghan economy into the Soviet orbit, without regard to the technical feasibility of the individual projects. Recently the cost estimates for several of the projects to which the U.S.S.R. committed itself in the first months of 1956 have doubled and in some cases quadrupled as Soviet engineers have been able to do actual feasibility appraisals.

Not only is the character of the Soviet assistance different, but their methods of implementation also vary considerably from the typical U.S. operation. From what we know of the Soviet operation it appears that they can draft technicians and commandeer commodities as needed, without going through the formalities generally characterizing the U.S. operation of recruiting volunteers and obtaining competitive bids, etc. Moreover, the Soviets do not need to negotiate any service contracts with private firms. Thus, their operation can be faster and their costs can be completely flexible. As a monolithic entity, the U.S.S.R. can, for political expediency, absorb any loss which may be inherent in any particular transaction. The Soviet bloc is not bound by the competitive pricing limitations of the free market.

The United States is attempting not merely to assist free world nations in their efforts to develop their own resources, but to promote joint activity by neighboring countries to attack common problems. This joint activity can have a most significant influence on the reduction of regional tensions. The President's fund for Asian economic development was established for this specific purpose, and, if current negotiations are successful it may shortly provide nearly $27 million additional funding for improvement over the next few years of the connecting Afghan and Pakistan surface transportation systems.

Briefly then, U.S. and Soviet aid are not directly comparable. They are two very different types of undertakings and Soviet and U.S. aid cannot be compared in a truly useful line-item tabulation. Thus, the tabulation attached covers only the official U.S. bilaterial assistance from the beginning of its program in Afghanistan.

Sincerely yours,

GUILFORD JAMESON,
Deputy Director for Congressional Relations.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I also ask to have printed in the RECORD, at this point as a part of my remarks a brief biography of Shelton T. Mills, who is in the career service of the State Department.

There being no objection, the biography was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I believe the President and the Secretary of State have made a wise selection in entrusting to him the discharge of this duty in a key and strategic area of the world. It is very gratifying to know that our operations in this crucial area of the world will be under the able direction of this trained diplomat. We in Oregon are very proud of the distinction which has come to him. I wish more career Foreign Service officers might be similarly recognized.

FARM SURPLUSES

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, recently I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial from a Pennsylvania newspaper on the subject of Government agriculture programs. I have here another editorial, this one from the Harrisburg Patriot of February 5, which indicates how widespread is the feeling in my State on the subject of excess farm surpluses. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SURPLUSES AND SUPPORTS: OVERDUE FOR AN OVERHAUL

The time long since has passed when the Nation's ever-mounting agricultural surpluses could be called a "farm problem."

As President Eisenhower mentioned in his farm message last month, the Federal Government is spending more than a billion dollars a year just to store the commodities and pay various interest and other charges. By next July, the Government will have sunk $9.1 billion in mountainous stockpiles the country does not want or need.

The "farm problem," at that rate of spending, is a matter of serious concern for every citizen who pays taxes.

Few Americans can go back in their family trees more than two or three generations without encountering an ancestor who made his living on a farm, either in this country or Europe. This may explain in part the sentiment which the most confirmed of city dwellers exhibits for the farm as the spawning ground of self-reliance and other grassroot virtues.

Although the American farm population has been shrinking since World War II, the farm vote still swings a formidable stick in both national and State politics. Particularly in the South and Middle West, this is so.

The time has come however, to strip aside both sentiment and politics to look at the facts of farm surpluses and to examine the high, fixed price supports which in large measure are responsible.

Government price supports aren't nearly as vital to the small family farm as is popularly supposed. For instance, there are about a million farmers who grow cotton, the crop which is still a king among price-supported commodities. Some 250,000 cotton farmers—one-fourth of the total—get three-fourths of the Government price support money in this category. If that $5.4 billion a year we are spending for price supports is meant to help the family farmer, the money is missing its mark. The lion's share is ending up in the pocket of the big producer, who needs it least.

Fifteen years ago, there was complete justification for the Government to guarantee the producer of so-called basic crops fixed, high prices to encourage production. World War II was in full swing and our Armed Forces and allies needed every pound of cotton and wheat our farmers could grow. At the close of the war, however, the Government didn't continue to buy Army uniforms to keep clothing factories in operation. Aside from sentiment or politics, there seems little reason why subsidization of farmers should have been extended beyond a few years' transition period.

Acreage restrictions have been imposed, to be sure. But at the same time, Government agents have been instructing farmers on ways—in effect—to negate the controls by raising yields through more intensive cultivation.

For these and other reasons, President Eisenhower's proposal to relate Government support prices to recent market levels instead of parity makes economic sense although it may not appeal either to sentiment or politics. Most of us didn't understand what parity meant anyway, much less how it could be justified so long after our need for farm stockpiles had ended. By agreeing to buy basic crops for 75 to 90 percent of recent market prices, as the President proposes, the farmer would be protected against the loss of his investment in a particular crop to a large degree. He would not be encouraged to grow something that only the Government would buy. And indeed why should he?

The thousands of farmers who raise vegetables, fruits, cattle and poultry without high fixed supports would seem to indicate that President Eisenhower and his farm advisers are on the right track.

The Federal Government is on the right track in another farm program, too. It is now operating pilot rural development programs in more than 60 counties. It is offering leadership to local agencies, which help farmers find jobs in nearby industries and which try to stimulate interest in new crops. This program stands in marked contrast to the system of paying a continuous dole to farmers. It is much more in keeping with the spirit of self-reliance many a city dweller associates with his grandfather's farm.

Besides, the specter inflation has begun to becloud the image of grandfather's farm. Both politically and sentimentally, this may be an excellent reason for the Congress to pay serious attention to the Eisenhower farm proposal.

THE BUDGET

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, in the address delivered by Carl Sandburg to the joint session of the two Houses last week he used a rather interesting expression from Abraham Lincoln, which evidently appeared in one of Lincoln's messages to Congress, on the 1st of December 1862. Lincoln said:

> In times like the present, men should utter nothing for which they would not willingly be responsible through time and eternity.

I believe that goes pretty nearly for everything that is uttered and the figures which are used from time to time on the floor of the Senate. That goes back, of course, to the battle of the budget. We have had a very friendly discussion with our amiable and distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON]. I have only one purpose in pursuing this matter, and that is the well-being of our country. I saw in the press yesterday that it was remarked that balancing the budget was something of a fetish. It was remarked that Abraham Lincoln had never balanced the budget.

Of course, what is forgotten when that is said, is that the whole career of Abraham Lincoln as President of the United States, with the exception of five weeks between the 4th of March 1861, and the 12th of April 1861, was a war period in the country, not a peace period. That makes quite a difference.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am sure the Senator is not quoting any statement made by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Indeed not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I assume he is quoting from a statement made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. I was commenting on what was said in the press. I commented on no statement made by the distinguished majority leader.

The statements made by the majority leader on a number of occasions on the floor and in the tables he inserted in the RECORD are quite correct, so far as they go. As I said before, however, it is like the man who fell off the 20th floor of a building. As he passed the 6th floor, a friend of his shouted to him "Mike, so far you are all right." [Laughter.] So I believe, in the interest of the whole story, rather than a fraction of the story, I should discuss this subject additionally. I do so because I have some fears about our fiscal basis at the present time.

At the moment France is climbing out of its inflationary policies, which have existed for more than 44 years. In that time there have been 11 devaluations of the franc, the last one under De Gaulle. De Gaulle has a tight hand on the country, and it will remain to be seen exactly what he can do. When inflation sets upon a country, it is not bred or incubated in a day. The one thing on which the 71 economists who appeared before the Committee on Finance agreed was that an unbalanced budget has a contributory effect toward inflation. If and when inflation becomes a settled, continuing, and constant fever in the country, it is the little people who get hurt. The big people can take care of themselves. I shed no particular tears for them. It is the people who live on fixed incomes who cannot help themselves. It is the people who have retired under the railroad retirement plan or who are beneficiaries under other retirement or pension plans who are caught in the vise. If I had to speak for any group, I would speak for those little people. Of course, I speak for the whole country, I believe.

I was heartened by the fact that the most recent Gallup poll held in the country was overwhelmingly in favor of keeping a balanced budget. The poll also showed that the people are opposed to taking on any new tax burden, knowing that that burden has been with us for a long time.

It has been said, "You want to use a balanced budget as a criterion, instead of what the country needs." If need is to be the criterion, let us all have Cadillacs instead of Fords. Why should we not, even though we can afford only a Ford, have a Cadillac or Mercury or Lincoln?

I have learned from long, frugal experience that one must do with what he has. It is necessary for a person to live within the framework of his physical capacity to acquire. In so doing we give substance and validity to the whole economy. If we do not pursue that course, what kind of lesson will we give to the people who have pursued the course of thrift?

A rather interesting article appeared in yesterday's Sunday Star. It was written by Jerry O'Leary. He quotes the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] as saying that the Democratic Party wants to balance the budget just as badly as the Republicans do, and Jerry O'Leary quotes the Senator from Missouri as adding:

> But we want to do it by expanding the economy and the Republicans want to do it by shrinking the economy.

In other words, we are the shrinkers of the economy and they are the expanders of the economy.

I do not know how we can understand that within the format of the various programs which have been suggested to the Congress without spending a great deal of money and going beyond the President's budget. When that is done, it is necessary to float securities and thus to borrow money, and that money must be spent; and certainly that is a definite contribution to the inflationary pressures.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Or does he prefer to finish his statement before yielding?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I shall be glad to finish my statement; and then I shall be happy to yield.

I have only one further observation to make on this point before I get into my budget statement. It has been said, and it has been hinted, and it has been intimated, that the budget can be balanced, if we go on spending, by taking it out of the "last bill."

The distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] was quoted on that point yesterday. He said that the $2.6 billion housing bill and the $465 million airport aid measure already passed by the Senate can be fitted into the budget without causing a deficit "if we cut the water and fat from foreign aid spending."

Those are not my remarks. Those are the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Florida, as quoted in yesterday's Washington Sunday Star.

I do not inquire whether that is the format or whether that is the technicality. I also note the statement in the Washington News that, when the time comes, they will love to see the "wincing look on the face of the minority leader."

Mr. President, there will be no wincing look on my face, I am sure. I will do my duty and perform my chores, and take it all in my stride, and then abide by the judgment of the majority. I can do that without wincing. I have not inquired of the majority leader whether that is the program. I would not inquire.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Illinois need not inquire, because he knows that, so far as the majority leader is concerned, he will support every dollar that we can justify, not only for foreign aid, but for any other purpose. Specifically, so far as foreign aid is concerned, the majority leader has been rather active in restoring substantial cuts which had been made by the other body in that field.

Mr. DIRKSEN. In all fairness, I wish to say that that is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I shall be controlled by only one interest, and that is the national interest. If I feel that the money requested should be appropriated in the national interest, I will vote to appropriate it. I do not believe we can pass judgment on that question this far in advance of what the testimony will show.

I raised the question at the White House the other day that it would seem passing strange that the administration would ask for $825 million, or approximately 25 percent, more in foreign aid this year than Congress appropriated last year. That additional 25 percent may be justified. If it is justified, and if the testimony supports it, the Senator from Texas will join the Senator from Illinois in supporting it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I have seen the majority leader in action on the Committee on Appropriations. I have the distinction of serving there with him. I pay him that compliment. He has acted as fairly, as equitably, and as honorably as he knew how.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I feel certain that other Senators do not speak for the majority leader. I have not queried him as to whether the last bill will be the scapegoat. Who knows what will happen in the last bill? I was simply going to say—and I would not want to impugn the distinguished junior Senator from Florida—that it occurs to me that the only time he ever appeared before the Committee on Appropriations with respect to the foreign aid bill, so far as I know, was to get an increase in the amount in foreign aid for certain Latin American purposes.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I trust the Senator will not suggest that the failure of a Senator to appear before a committee indicates his support of or his opposition to measures on which he did not appear. All Senators are members of committees which occupy their full time. It may be that a Senator feels that with respect to a particular item of which he has knowledge, and in which he has a particular interest, he should appear; but none of us should be charged with any lack of diligence for his failure to appear concerning a particular item or a particular bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I certainly entertain no such thought. There is no such implication in what I said. I simply recited that the distinguished junior Senator from Florida said they were going to cut the fat and water out of foreign aid. Then I adduced evidence which, in my judgment, is completely factual—and the hearings, I think, will bear out the fact that the only time I noticed he appeared, though he may have appeared on other occasions, was for the purpose of securing an increase in the foreign aid funds.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In fairness to the junior Senator from Florida, who I assume has not been notified of the Senator's address, I should like to observe that it is my memory that the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] has frequently voted on the floor for reductions in foreign aid and has had his name recorded accordingly. Although he and I have not agreed on some votes, I think fairness compels me to say that he has never seen fit to go as far as the administration would go in spreading this money throughout the world.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I shall let the record speak for itself. I do not wish to carry on a discussion about foreign aid, which is a subject we will reach later. There is no certainty as to what Congress, in either branch, will do about it. I am perfectly willing to let that matter come up in due time. I think I am a little like the Scotchman who refused to buy a world atlas until the world got just a little more settled. I am willing to let this matter rest until that part of the discussion becomes a little more settled. I must get around to what I really intended to say.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD certain tables from the Bureau of the Budget in this connection.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXPLANATION OF ACTIONS TAKEN BY CONGRESS ON PRESIDENTIAL BUDGETARY RECOMMENDATIONS

This summary of actions by the Congress on Presidential budgetary recommendations since January 1953, is arranged:

First, to tabulate those actions which specifically provided new obligational authority, beginning with appropriation actions as tabulated by the Appropriations Committee.

Then, to list other legislation which authorized or required appropriations.

And finally to identify the effects of Presidential vetoes and of changes in tax legislation which departed from Presidential recommendations.

For those actions which provided authority for a specified period, the amounts shown include the total effect for the period covered. For those actions for which the effect was indefinite in period of time, the amounts shown represent the annual effect.

Action on appropriations figures at the beginning of each table do not include loan authorizations and reappropriations made in appropriations acts, and amounts for these types of authority are then added to account for all changes in appropriations acts.

Amounts shown for "congressional reductions requiring supplemental appropriations" are confined to clearly identifiable program decreases which specifically required subsequent supplemental requests. Other but small reductions may exist since wholly precise analysis was not deemed necessary. Congressional action on substantive legislation may also be incomplete as to some small items for similar reasons, but this would not significantly affect the results shown.

Data tabulated are based upon information of record available in the Bureau of the Budget or in documents published by the congressional Appropriations Committees.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, when the statement is made that a Democrat Congress cut the President's budget by more than $5 billion in the 85th Congress, it can leave but one impression with the average citizen, namely, that the President is a spender and that Congress is an economizer.

To establish this point, the majority leader has submitted estimates and tables to show the total appropriations made by the 85th Congress compared with the estimates submitted by the President. That is good as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. Let us get to the bottom of the matter and see what the Democrat 85th Congress really did.

Mr. President, I desire to say at this point that the tables submitted by the majority leader were factual and were correct. So far as it goes, the contention he made was correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Since the Senator has referred to the 85th Congress as a Democratic Congress, will he give me the specific citation? I have attempted to keep this discussion free of party labels.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the Senator be specific as to the statement he desires?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I should like to know the statement to which the Senator from Illinois is referring, because I hope to be able to refute it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The statement appears on page 2101 of the RECORD of February 9, 1959.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I can just as well read it into the RECORD:

> Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The fact is that in the 85th Congress we appropriated almost $6 billion less than the administration asked us to appropriate. Which course is more likely to lead us into national fiscal suicide—a course in which we add $6 billion, or a course in which we reduce spending by $6 billion?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Where is the reference to a Democratic Congress?

Mr. DIRKSEN. There is no reference made to it there; that is my reference.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Texas attempted to give credit to the entire Congress, because many times such reductions as were made were made on a bipartisan basis. Even the authorizations which were made were made on a bipartisan basis.

I vividly recall the housing bill, on which the vote on passage was 88 to 0. Every Senator present voted for it. Even the President approved it. So I assume, even if it did go in the back door, the President approved of that bill.

I do not want to get the matter of appropriations into party politics any more than I want to get foreign relations or defense matters into party politics. I hope we shall have a yea and nay vote on each appropriation bill this year.

I think the legislative history will show that, generally speaking, in the history of this Republic Congress has made reductions in most appropriation bills. There have been exceptions, but Senators who have served longer than I have can correct me if I am wrong. The tendency is for the House to reduce the budget estimates. The Senate sometimes restores, or most times restores, some of the reductions. The committee of conference comes to the final agreement. But over the entire budget year the legislative process will result in a reduction from the budget estimate.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I try to keep this matter free from partisan passion, but here is a statement I had not meant to use. It was an Associated Press dispatch from Albuquerque. The majority leader is not quoted, but this is the content of a portion of the dispatch:

JOHNSON ridiculed contentions that Congress may go on wild spending spree. He said the Democratic Congress clipped more than $5 billion from Mr. Eisenhower's last budget recommendation.

If such contentions are made throughout the country, I think in all fairness, if the party label is put on, it is our duty and responsibility, if we can do so, to defend our own administration. I try to do it as factually and as fairly as I know how. Were it not for such statements, obviously I would not have put any label on Congress and would not have said it was Republican or Democratic. But these statements were made; and, of course, this is a matter which is being handled for the country. It does generate mail, and the people want to know what a person's attitude is. So I like to be as factual about it as I can be.

The majority leader's figures were correct, so far as appropriations are concerned. His contentions were correct, so far as appropriations are concerned. But here is the rest of the story:

First. The 85th Congress enacted laws, in addition to Appropriation Acts, which permit the Federal Government to spend money without going through the Committees on Appropriations. The best illustration I can give of that is the colloquy which took place in the Senate on June 9, 1958, between the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON], when the Senate was considering the small-business bill. This is the colloquy:

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Am I to understand that it is the opinion of the Senator from Virginia that the Committee on Banking and Currency in this year, by indirection, has in effect appropriated approximately $9 billion without having the particular appropriations submitted to the Committee on Appropriations for consideration?

Mr. ROBERTSON. The Senator is correct. We have already reported $5 billion. The amount provided in this bill is $2,500 million. The so-called big housing bill, which is before the committee, provides a total of $4,400 million. So those figures add up to more than $9 billion, assuming that the big bill is reported in its intended form.

Amendments are pending to reduce the amount for public housing and to cut something from the funds for urban redevelopment. But that amount has been proposed and is pending.

If all the amounts are approved, the total will be more than $9 billion.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The bill recommended by the Committee on Banking and Currency provided $2 billion for the Export-Import Bank. Was that merely an authorization, or was it an appropriation, in effect?

Mr. ROBERTSON. That was the continuation of a precedent which had previously been set. Not knowing how much the bank would need for its operation in a given time, we authorized it to obtain its needs from the Treasury. But the bank is supposed to get good bonds and good security, and the amount will come back into the assets of the Treasury at some future time.

But the bill provides a revolving fund of $250 million, with no provision for that amount ever to be returned to the Treasury.

Mr. LAUSCHE. About $1,800 million is provided for emergency housing. Was the Committee on Finance bypassed on that subject?

He meant the Appropriations Committee.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] said, "That is correct."

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Is it not true that the Administration recommended the increase for the Export-Import Bank?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I must say to my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania that I am not dealing with the recommendation of the administration. I am dealing with the allegation that over $5 billion was cut out of the budget by the Congress.

Mr. CLARK. But the answer to my question is, "Yes," is it not?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Certainly the answer is "Yes."

Mr. CLARK. I thank my friend.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But I do not like to have other matters placed across the trail. I wish to pursue for a moment the matter of the fiscal year budget.

Mr. President, at the outset I wish to make clear that the budget is the national purse. The very word "budget" means "purse." It is derived from the old French word "bouge," which means "purse" or "pocketbook." Our budget is our national pocketbook. What goes in is part of the budget; what is taken out is part of the budget. And it can come out in many ways.

I have said that these appropriation figures do not take account of the fact that, in addition to appropriation acts, there were still other things which permitted the Federal Government to spend money without having the items go through the Appropriations Committees.

Second. It piled up spending laws for which appropriations were not made at the time when the laws went on the statute books.

In other words, Congress can authorize spending, but not cover it at that time with the necessary appropriations.

Third. It increased the drain on the general fund of the Treasury by allowing certain revolving and trust funds to incur greater deficits; and it had to restore some budget cuts by supplemental appropriations.

Fourth. It sent to the President spending items which he had to veto.

Fifth. It increased budget problems by not providing the revenue requested.

Sixth. In addition to appropriating funds, it authorized loans directly out of the Treasury, and reappropriated prior year balances.

Seventh. It did reduce budget requests for new spending authority by making smaller appropriations. It is this seventh item for which they take credit, and they let it stand by itself as a measure of achievement.

The seventh item is represented by the tables which were placed in the RECORD. But the rest of the story is not there. If we are to have a sound predicate from which to proceed in the interest of telling about our solvency, the entire story must be told.

Now I return to the claim, as made to the country, that the budget was reduced by the Congress by more than $5 billion. Actually, the amount was $5,600 million, on an appropriation basis, for the two sessions of the 85th Congress.

Now let me return to the first item I have mentioned. The 2d session of the 85th Congress, without the matter going through the Appropriations Committee, increased the authority to incur obligations in the sum of $2,102 million. This includes the Emergency Housing Act, the Small Business Investments Act, the Navaho-Hopi Rehabilitation Act, the Highway Act of 1958, the Capital Power Plant Act, and some minor items. All these are as painful to the taxpayers as if these items had gone through the Appropriations Committee and as if there had been direct charges upon the budget.

Second, the legislation which requires increased spending for which appropriations were not made at the time of enactment includes that for the full annual effect of pay raises over and above the President's recommendation, retroactive pay increases, Federal aid for impacted areas, the Atomic Energy Commission, the full year effect of liberalizing public assistance grants to the States, the authorization for the construction of a superliner, forward authorization for the agricultural conservation program, and veterans' pensions and burial allowances. All this involves the tidy sum of $1,572 million. That was done by the Democratic 85th Congress, 2d session.

Mr. President, that amount of money is not hay; at least, it is not in the area in which I live—even though it may be in the Nation's Capital.

The point I make is that all those actions were taken by the Congress; and I wish to accept my full share of the responsibility for them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, at this point will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is it not a fact that the Senator from Illinois voted for those acts?

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is entirely possible that I did.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I would say to the Senator from Illinois that it is more than possible; it is a fact, in most instances.

Is it not a fact, also, that the President signed those bills and approved them?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Not all of them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is it not a fact that the President signed and approved all the bills the Senator from Illinois has enumerated?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I forget what the situation was in the case of the veterans' pensions; but the President did sign a good many.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

When references are made to "the back-door route," let me point out that a bill does not become a law unless the President signs it or unless the Congress overrides a Presidential veto. Upon occasion, the Senate has voted to override a Presidential veto, but such action has not been taken by both bodies of the Congress in recent years. So a bill cannot become a law unless the President signs it or unless the Congress overrides a veto.

I am aware of the fact that in most of the instances which have been enumerated the Congress voted unanimously, and in a good many of those instances the action was taken as a result of the plea of the executive branch itself—for instance, in the case of the Export-Import Bank and the housing funds. I remember that in the Senate there was one vote of 88 to 0, and we had a call of the roll just because I was fearful that someone, at some time, somehow, somewhere, would attempt to blame someone for the action. But when the roll was called, 88 Senators voted in favor of passage of the bill, and thus indicated their approval of that procedure, and the President signed the bill.

I have not made an examination of all 1,200 of the bills the Congress passed and the President approved, out of the 20,000 introduced. I could do so, and I could submit the complete story. But I believe it is fair to say that many of the authorization measures the Senator from Illinois has been discussing were finally implemented by appropriations, and the appropriation figures, as given by the Appropriations Committee, show that the Congress made reductions.

I thank the Senator from Illinois for yielding to me.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, all that discussion is beside the point. I am laboring only one point; namely, the contention that the 85th Congress cut the budget by more than $5,600,000,000.

It is not a matter of who voted for what; it is not a matter of whether there were 1,200 bills or whether there were 12,000 bills. I am pointing out the procedures under which the country is given the impression that the Congress was the economizer and the President was the spender. These figures will refute in complete detail that allegation. That is the only reason why I take the floor today.

In other words, there have been many instances in which the Congress has voted to bypass the Appropriations Committee, or has voted to permit money to be obtained directly from the Treasury, or has failed to pass appropriation bills to implement the necessary spending obligations.

Then there is the item—the third one—which includes the failure of the second session of the 85th Congress to comply with the President's request for additional postal revenues. The increase in the postal deficit in the fiscal year 1959, as a result of this denial, totaled $232 million.

After all, Mr. President, the budget is based upon two sides of the ledger: One is made up of the anticipated revenues which go into the national purse, and the other is composed of the spending which takes the money out of the national purse. The President made his request for additional postal revenues, but that request was denied by the Congress; and, as I have already stated, the increase in the postal deficit in the fiscal year 1959 was, as a result of that denial, $232 million.

Another item in this category was the action taken by the Democrat 85th Congress in increasing the highway fund deficit beyond the President's request—beyond it to the tune of $725 million.

Furthermore, Congress later had to restore $86 million of the budget cuts by supplemental appropriations. So, the effect of this action was to charge the budget with $1,043 million, or, if we want to be more factual, charge the Treasury of the United States with $1,043 million.

The next item, spending items sent to the President by the 2d session of the 85th Congress which he was compelled to veto, totaled $1,562 million. If it had not been for the President's vetoes, the Government would have been committed to spend this extra $1½ billion. So the administration provided a real saving to the taxpayers.

The point is that the 85th Congress tried to commit the Government to these huge expenditures. That was congressional action. Vetoed bills were the Independent Offices Appropriation Act—there was in it $589 million for civil service retirement—bills for airport grants, depressed areas, rivers and harbors authorization, atomic icebreaker, and the metals production and purchase program.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The Senator has said that there was a reduction of $1½ billion in spending as a result of Presidential vetoes, and that otherwise the President would have been forced to spend the funds voted. How would he spend those extra funds Congress voted for?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not know, but I know I have read the budget hearings before the House committee. I read all 175 pages, from beginning to end. I saw there the statement of the Budget Director as to the items which have been put in reserve, which either could not be spent at the time or had not yet been spent by the agency. I think Mr. Stans made an excellent answer to the interrogations propounded by Members of the House Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MANSFIELD. If the Senator will yield further, I should like to have an answer to my question. Congress cut drastically the President's requests in the two sessions of the 85th Congress. The figures will show, despite what the distinguished minority leader has said, that Congress reduced the President's budget by $5 billion in the first session, and by $576 million in the second session, and would have reduced it in excess of $1 billion in the latter if the President had not personally requested restoration of funds for his foreign aid program.

Congress, in spite of the fact that it reduced the budget last year, increased funds for the Army to maintain it at a strength of 925,000 men, increased appropriations for the Marine Corps so it could maintain its strength at 200,000 men, and increased appropriations to maintain the personnel of the Army and the Navy to a greater degree than the administration wanted. Still the Senator from Illinois tells us that if authorizations had been made on the basis of legislation enacted, the President, if he had signed those bills, would have been forced to make those expenditures. How would he have been forced to make those expenditures when he had been thwarting the will of Congress, so far as the defense of this country is concerned, by not doing what Congress had specifically said should be done, under the Constitution?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The President of the United States is not thwarting the will of Congress. He cannot spend the money until the purposes for which it is authorized are accomplished and the spending agency says, "We are ready for the apportionment made by the Budget Bureau."

Mr. MANSFIELD. The Marine Corps is always ready to have a 200,000-man corps, but its request is being knocked down. How can the corps maintain three combat divisions and three airwings on that basis?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am not the Commandant of the Marine Corps. When they are ready for the money, they ask for it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We vote many authorizations for which no appropriations are subsequently made. We all know that. The general public may not know it, but we all know it. We vote many appropriations for which there are no authorizations. We vote appropriations pursuant to authorizations and then sometimes the Executive impounds those funds. That happened under a Democratic President and under a Republican President. In answer to what the Senator from Montana has said, let us not get confused in that respect. We have put more than $1 billion in excess of the requests in the defense appropriation bill, anticipating the Executive would use it. A considerable portion of that money has not been used as of now. It was impounded, in the wisdom of the President, or in his lack of wisdom. The President decided the national interest did not require it. Those are the facts. For all the list of bills the Senator has given, he may as well get up and refer to a bill for the relief of Joe James, $1 million. Congress has to make the appropriation. Congress appropriates pursuant to authorizations. While we do appropriate pursuant to authorizations, there are many more billions of dollars authorized than are appropriated. When all the figures are considered, it will be found that Congress, in the last two sessions, appropriated $5,600 million less than the budget estimates.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the end of this running and desultory discussion, the statement I hold in my hand may appear at the end of my remarks, so it will be a continuous statement, with the figures grouped together.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—as I understand, this is a statement prepared by the Budget Bureau. Is that correct?

Mr. DIRKSEN. This is a statement prepared by the minority leader, with figures obtained from the Budget Bureau, the Treasury Department, and from some other sources.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I shall not object. Just as the Senator wanted to clarify figures offered by the Senator from Ohio, I am attempting to determine whether it is the Senator's personal statement or a statement of the Budget Bureau.

Mr. DIRKSEN. This is the statement of the Senator from Illinois. He has been working on it for quite a while. The Senator from Illinois advised the Senate several weeks ago he would assemble all these figures and put the whole story into the RECORD. But I must say to my delightful friend from Texas and to my beloved friend from Montana I feel like Cato, who signed every letter and ended every speech with the ringing words, "Delenda est Carthago"—"Carthage must be destroyed."

I am not dealing in this colloquy with any one bill that came up. I am dealing with one matter—the contention that the 85th Congress was the great economizing Congress to the tune of $5,660 million, to be exact, and I am here to review only one thing, and that is it.

I know what a budget is. I worked with a budget for 18 years in the House and Senate Appropriations Committees, and I know how the taxpayers' money is gotten out of the Federal Treasury in circuitous ways. They do not go through the Appropriations Committee. The Appropriations figures are the ones which were inserted in the RECORD, but that is only a part of the budget; and I mean to make the whole budget come into focus for the people of this country, because inflation, resulting from deficit and continuing deficit, is going to place its clammy hand upon the people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. SALTONSTALL, Mr. SPARKMAN, and Mr. CLARK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield, and if so to whom?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield first to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, are my figures correct when I say that the total of the items which the Senator from Illinois has been mentioning amounts to an increase of $3,788,000,000?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I have not totaled the figures. I shall total them at the end.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, what does that include? The Senator adds up all the apples and oranges and potatoes, and he gets a cantaloup. Is that it?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. With all the apples and the oranges——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does the figure include all of the authorizations? What is included?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Action on appropriations; other congressional actions; expenditures avoided by veto; and actions affecting receipts. There is net total budgetary actions for the two sessions of the 85th Congress, if my addition is correct, of $3,788 million.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I have a summary I shall present directly, and we can then discuss that.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I will say to the distinguished Senator from Illinois that I have been enjoying the discussion. It seems to me there are some things which may confuse rather than explain. For instance, in his statement the Senator refers to the Emergency Housing Act of 1958. Of course the Senator will recall that we made available to the Federal National Mortgage Association a billion dollars, which is charged up in the Senator's statement, yet by the first of this year only $95 million of the money had been used.

I should also like to mention another item.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, that does not make any difference. The money has been committed for expenditure.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will use another example. The Senator refers to the small business investments. Someone who reads the statement may think all the money provided for in the Small Business Investment Act is a backdoor method of obligation. As a matter of fact, practically all of the money is provided through appropriations.

It is true there is an item of $28 million which was lifted from the Federal Reserve Act, section 13(b), if I correctly remember, which made the money available for small business purposes years ago. The Federal Reserve never used the money. Under the terms of the new act it is impossible to spend the money in less than 14 years.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. SPARKMAN. It seems to me when one talks about something like this happening in 1 year, he gives the impression that all of it is 1 year's doing.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, that has nothing to do with "Who stole the wheelbarrow?"

Mr. SPARKMAN. Very well.

Mr. DIRKSEN. We are trying a case here.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Very well.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There is an issue, and I have joined the issue. I mean to rebut the proposal, and to refute and successfully refute the contention that the 85th Congress cut the budget by $5.6 billion; and no red herring, no matter how upholstered or embroidered it may be, is going to wash out the contention.

I have the figures in my hand. It does not make any difference what the money was spent for. It does not make any difference if the fund is in hock. I take the statement at face value. This is what was said. It was said at Albuquerque. It was said on the floor of the Senate. The story went out in an Associated Press dispatch.

I mean to prove, if the newspapers will carry the proof, that the story is entirely different and that there are amazing methods which the Congress has used—it is the responsibility of Congress—to take money out of the Federal Treasury for spending, although the President did a pretty good job of trying to keep the spending in line.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Senator used the term which I said would confuse the country. The Senator used the term "spending," when as a matter of fact it is going to take 14 years to spend the $28 million I mentioned. It will take longer than that to spend the money which is carried in the provisions of the housing bill for slum clearance and urban renewal. And a large portion is for lending at interest, not spending.

The Senator also speaks about obligations, the obligations incurred outside the Appropriations Committee. As I understood his statement, the Senator was condemning that system, yet I think everyone in this body knows that the present administration has asked for that system of financing over and over and over again.

As a matter of fact, in the consideration of the housing bill recently passed, testimony was given in the hearings by Mr. Norman Mason. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] raised the very same point about the financing of programs outside of appropriations. The point was made that we were carrying out programs under the bill exactly as such programs had been carried out before.

I asked Mr. Mason:

Both in the bill that I introduced and also in the administration bill; and in present operations.

And Mr. Mason said:

That is correct.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] said:

So is college housing.

Then the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] asked Mr. Mason this question:

Is there any difference in the method of financing between S. 57 and S. 612?

S. 612 was the administration bill. And Mr. Mason's answer was:

No; they follow the same pattern.

In other words, there is nothing new about this procedure. The present administration has asked for it. It is true that sometimes Congress may increase the amount which the administration asks for, and sometimes Congress may decrease the amount which the administration asks for.

I subscribe to the statement made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] the other day, that the ultimate responsibility for making appropriations is in the Congress of the United States. The President has the duty and the right to recommend, but the ultimate responsibility for passing upon appropriations is in the Congress. When the Congress follows the recommendations of the administration and provides ways for incurring obligations outside of the appropriations, I do not see that we are to be condemned for it, as I understand the statement of the Senator from Illinois to imply, if not to include.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, if all of this testimony of my genial friend from Alabama had been adduced in a court of law and I were opposing counsel, I would say to the court, "I ask that all of it be stricken from the record, because it is immaterial and it is irrelevant." Mr. President, it is.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. My good friend said a minute or two ago—and I agree with him completely—that he knows about budgets. Of course the Senator knows about budgets, because he has been an astute and able Member of this body for a long while. I would therefore like to ask my friend a question.

The Senator from Illinois referred a little while ago to a $2.1 billion grant reservation authorization in the housing bill as one of these items which gave him budgetary concern; yet my friend is well aware, is he not, that not 1 cent of that money will be in the 1960 budget; not 1 cent of the money will be in the 1961 budget; and by the time the money is in the budget the present administration will have gone to history? Is that not correct?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Under the Senate rules I would have to ask for a division of the question, Mr. President.

I will let the figures speak for themselves. We have 450 people working at the Bureau of the Budget. Their business is to know. Only the facts count. There can be no guesswork. I have the facts in my hand.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I think it is quite clear that no part of the $2.1 billion can ever be any concern of the Eisenhower administration budgets; is that not true?

Mr. DIRKSEN. What difference does it make?

Mr. CLARK. It is important because the Senator is trying to tell us it is of concern, is he not?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Delenda est Carthago. I am dealing with one proposition.

Mr. CLARK. My suggestion would be to my good friend that he stick to the proposition, which is the budget.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am not trying the housing bill over and over again, or any other bill. I am attempting in this forum to consider the contention that a Democratic Congress cut $5,660 million from the President's budgets.

Mr. CLARK. Well, it did, did it not?

Mr. DIRKSEN. It did not.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. The Senator is familiar with budget procedures because of his long service on the Appropriations Committee. I should like to ask if it is not a fact that in every budget recommendation from the President, he recommends obligational authority under which expenditure may or may not be reflected in the budget of the particular year, but which will be reflected in future budget years; and in another part of the budget he recommends exact expenditure to be made in the next fiscal year. Is that not correct?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. COOPER. I notice on the second page of the budget message which the President sent to the Congress this year that the two divisions of the budget—one for obligational authority and one for exact spending authority—are marked out in every year President Eisenhower has been in office, from 1954 to the present year. First, there is the record of obligational authority. I believe it is possible to study the President's budget messages and find out what obligational authority the President recommended in each year, and what obligational authority Congress fixed for those years. The record would tell the story, it seems to me, so far as obligational authority is concerned.

Then I note, in the budget message this year, for each of the years, a statement of the actual expenditures made under appropriations voted by the Congress. That is the record.

It is possible, of course, to find out what the President recommended in the way of expenditures for each fiscal year. Then we would know whether or not Congress had increased or decreased his recommendations. I believe that the Senator from Illinois and the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] can supply the information. I do not know the exact figure it would disclose. However, I have been a Member of this body for 4 of the 6 years during President Eisenhower's administration, and I venture the belief that if such information is supplied it would show that in every year the Congress, by increases in obligational authority, as well as appropriations, has caused larger spending than the President recommended.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I should like to see this record supplied. I recall the 1957 session. When the budget for fiscal year 1957 came to Congress there was—as there is today—a great budget debate.

Our friends on the other side said the budget was too large. Last year—1958—when the 1959 budget came before us, they said it was too small. We know that the Congress increased the budget last year over the President's recommendation. This year his budget recommendations are again said to be too small. The Senate has already increased his recommendations in two bills. Last year and this year, our good friends on the other side said that the budget was too small. They know that we increased it last year, and we know that we have started to increase it this year. It would be a hoax on the American people for our friends on the other side of the aisle to claim both sides of the coin—first, to claim that the budgets offered have been too small and raise them, and now to claim that they have been reduced.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I now proceed to the fifth item. This started as a 15-minute speech. Perhaps that was in shorthand. [Laughter.]

While the 85th Congress was voting higher spending authority, it was also voting to cut the Government's income. A budget is a purse. Nothing can come out of it that does not first go into it. We cannot divorce the two processes. If we cut income, there is an impact on the budget.

The 85th Congress, in the 2d session, reduced tax receipts of the Government by $665 million annually. The American taxpayer was not reminded of this when the claims for cutting the budget were made; but he must be reminded of it, in the interest of a complete story.

Another class of congressional action which has the effect of increasing Federal spending is loan authorizations. As approved by the 2d session of the 85th

Congress, such loan authorizations totaled $280 million.

Taking appropriations actions alone, we find that the second session did indeed reduce new obligational authority requested by the President by $617 million.

Now we come to the first session of that Congress, in which the Appropriations Committee was again bypassed. The increased authority included the Housing Act and the contract authorization for the Senate Office Building. The total was $1,120 million.

In that same session, legislation which required spending, for which no appropriations were made at the time of enactment, included veterans' compensation, an authorization for the Atomic Energy Commission in excess of the President's recommendation, and school construction in impacted areas totaling $239 million, offset by reductions in authorizations of the mutual security program of $477 million.

If we put those together, the total impact is $238 million.

In that same first session the Congress also rejected the President's request for a postal-rate increase. The result was what? The result was to increase the postal deficit by $462 million, which came out of the Treasury. It could not have been done unless that action was taken by the Congress. That is where the emphasis and the accent must be.

In addition, there were congressional reductions which required supplemental appropriations thereafter, totaling $322 million.

To me that is one of the interesting techniques. I do not know how to avoid it. We cannot always estimate the needs of an agency up to the minute. Events and circumstances arise to change our estimates and cause us to increase or decrease them. So, always there will be deficiencies and supplemental appropriations.

I remember how I argued, in connection with the independent offices bill last year, against cutting the veterans' pension fund. That is a contract. I argued that we would have to make a supplemental appropriation. That is exactly what happened.

Supplemental appropriations show up in the next Congress, and the people become bewildered. Senators become bewildered. I wish the budget technique were simpler. We cannot expect people to understand it. I used to lecture on the budget. I called it "the book no one knows." I think that is a pretty good title.

In that same session, there were expenditures which were avoided as the result of a Presidential veto. If such expenditures had not been vetoed, they would have been a tax on the country and the Treasury. By vetoing the classified and postal pay-rate bills passed by the first session, $314 million was saved in the period from September 1, 1957, to January 1958.

Again, we must include in this consideration $244 million in loan authorizations and reappropriations of prior year balances approved by the first session of the 85th Congress.

Let me say to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] that I will put this information together in summary form. Appropriations were decreased, by the aid of Congress, in the sum of $5,043 million in the first session, and $617 million in the second session, or a total of $5,660 million.

The figures which the majority leader placed in the RECORD are correct up to that point.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator has been very gracious in yielding. I understand his desire to complete his statement. I was about to make a comment, ask one further question, and then desist, thanking the Senator for his courtesy.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] made a fine suggestion a moment or two ago. A great many people are confused by the figures. If we could have one statement showing the result on each year's cash budget of the action of the Congress, I think we would find, as the majority leader has said—and the minority leader has been kind enough to admit—that his figures are accurate. Then if we were to add in another statement the additional contract authorizations and additional grant authorizations, to which future Congresses might perhaps find themselves committed in such a way that it would be difficult for them to change to large figures, then we might understand better just what the facts are.

However, these later figures of contract and grant authorizations have no effect on the 1960 budget, and little, if any, effect on the 1961 budget. I think that fact should be made abundantly clear.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am not talking about the 1960 budget. I have not been talking about the 1960 budget.

Mr. CLARK. That is good.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I have not been talking about the 1960 budget.

Mr. CLARK. Or the 1961 budget, either?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No. I have been talking about a fait accompli which all the wit and piety on the floor of the Senate cannot sponge out, because it is a matter of record.

Mr. CLARK. Inasmuch as the Senator has been gracious enough to say that his entire address is irrelevant to the 1960 and 1961 budgets, I shall content myself with one further question.

Does my friend know of any Member of the Senate who is not in favor of a balanced budget, and who is in favor of deficit spending?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I must recur to Scripture and use the oft-repeated phrase, "By their works ye shall know them."

Mr. CLARK. I suspect my friend would come to the same conclusion I have reached, that there is no Member of this body who favors deficit spending. Therefore, I suggest, in all good humor—and I know my friend will not resent it—that perhaps we are creating a straw man which is rather easy to knock down.

I thank my friend for his courtesy.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I could add to that Biblical quotation by saying that faith without works is dead. I hope we can summon up not only the necessary faith, but also the works that go with it, so that we may stand and hold the budget line.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. BUSH. I believe the Senator is giving us a good deal of information about the current fiscal year, when we face a deficit of upwards of $12 billion. My recollection is that at the time the Treasury indicated there would likely be a deficit, it pointed out that approximately $5 billion of it was due to increased spending which was forced upon the country by actions of the last session of the 85th Congress; that it was the action of that Congress in large part which increased the expenditures in this year's budget by close to $5 billion, with 7 billion of the estimated 12 billion deficit resulting from decreased receipts as a result of the depression.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. BUSH. Due in part also to the fact that the administration was denied income, such as the postal increase which would have helped to close the gap.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. BUSH. Therefore, I believe the Senator is making a big contribution by pointing out that it was the action of this same Congress last year which was responsible to a large extent for the estimated $12 billion deficit.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I should like to summarize, instead of going through the various categories, by showing that the total charge on the budget is $9,448 million. I now take the majority leader's figure, because it is correct. It shows $5,660 million in reduced appropriations in both sessions. We then do what is done in any schoolroom; we draw a line and subtract. The net result is that the 1st and 2d sessions of the 85th Congress did not reduce the budget; on the contrary, they actually approved increases amounting to $3,788 million.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Is it not correct to say, following what the Senator from Kentucky has said, and what the Senator from Connecticut has said, that there are, really, two budgets? One is the obligatory budget, and the other the actual receipts and expenditures budget. In other words, the deficit or surplus is based on what is actually received or spent.

It will be seen that in 1958 the actual budget receipts were $69.1 billion and the actual budget expenditures were $71.9 billion, or a deficit of $2.8 billion.

The estimated receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959, were $68 billion, and the expenditures $80.9 billion, with a deficit of $12.9 billion.

In the next year, 1960, the estimated budget receipts are shown as $77.1 billion and the estimated budget expenditures as $77 billion, with a surplus of $100 million.

Those figures are found at page M–4 of the 1960 budget.

I cite those figures because our friends on the other side of the aisle have been pointing to the fact that some things may not come into the expenditures in the 1960 budget or during the Eisenhower administration, but that they are ultimately a burden on the taxpayers, whichever administration may be in office at the time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct; and a burden on the Treasury.

Mr. President, I have finished. I am sorry I have taken so long. I have already received unanimous consent to insert the tables which have been furnished by the Bureau of the Budget, showing the details. As a lawyer says in court, I rest my case. I was going to say that the defense rests its case. I will not do that. It is not the defense resting its case. We are prosecuting the case. We rest it there.

EXHIBIT 1

STATEMENT PREPARED BY SENATOR DIRKSEN

When the statement is made that a Democrat Congress cut the President's budget by more than $5 billion, it can leave but one impression with the average citizen, namely, that the President is a spender and that the Congress is an economizer.

To prove this point the majority leader has submitted estimates and tables to show total appropriations made by the 85th Congress compared with the estimates submitted by the President. That is good as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. Let us get to the bottom of the matter and see what the Democrat 85th Congress really did do.

First, it enacted laws in addition to appropriation acts which permit the Federal Government to spend money without going through the Appropriations Committees.

Second, it piled up spending laws for which appropriations were not made at the time the laws went on the statute books.

Third, it increased the drain on the general fund of the Treasury by allowing certain revolving and trust funds to incur greater deficits, and it had to restore some budget cuts by supplemental appropriations.

Fourth, it sent spending items to the President which he had to veto.

Fifth, it increased budget problems by not providing the revenue requested.

Sixth, in addition to appropriating funds, it authorized loans directly out of the Treasury and reappropriated prior year balances.

Seventh, it did reduce budget requests for new spending authority by making smaller appropriations. It is this seventh item for which they take credit and let it stand by itself as a measure of achievement.

The claim was made to the country that the budget was reduced by more than $5 billion. The budget reflects what is taken in in the form of taxes and what goes out in the form of expenditures.

On the first item, the 2d session of the 85th Congress, without going through the Appropriations Committee, increased the authority to incur obligations in the sum of $2,102 million. This includes the Emergency Housing Act, small business investments, Navaho-Hopi rehabilitation, the Highway Act of 1958, the Capital Power Plant, and some minor items. This is as painful to the taxpayer as if these items had gone through the Appropriations Committee.

Secondly, the legislation which requires increased spending for which appropriations were not made at the time of enactment includes the full annual effect of pay raises over and above the President's recommendation, retroactive pay increases, Federal aid for impacted areas, the Atomic Energy Commission, the full year effect of liberalizing public assistance grants to the States, the authorization for the construction of a superliner, forward authorization for the agricultural conservation program, and veterans' pensions and burial allowances. This involves the tidy sum of $1,572 million. That was done by the Democrat 85th Congress, 2d session.

The third item includes the failure of the 2d session of the 85th Congress to comply with the President's request for additional postal revenues. The increase in the postal deficit in fiscal 1959 as a result of this denial totaled $232 million. Another item in this category was the action taken by the Democrat 85th Congress in increasing the highway fund deficit beyond the President's request to the tune of $725 million. Furthermore, the Congress later had to restore $86 million of the budget cuts by supplemental appropriations. The effect of these three actions by the second session was to require $1,043 million additional from the Treasury.

Spending items sent to the President by the 2d session of the 85th Congress which he was compelled to veto totaled $1,562 million. If it had not been for the President's vetoes, the Government would have been committed to spend this extra $1½ billion. Thus, the administration provided a real saving to the taxpayers. The point is, the 85th Congress tried to commit the Government to these huge expenditures. Vetoed bills were the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, and bills for airport grants, depressed areas, rivers and harbors authorization, atomic icebreaker, and the metals production and purchase program.

While the 85th Congress was voting higher spending authority, it was also voting to cut the Government's income. This is the fifth category which I cited. The 85th Congress in the 2d session reduced tax receipts of the Government by $665 million annually. The American taxpayer was not reminded of this when the claims for cutting the budget were made.

Another class of congressional action which has the effect of increasing Federal spending is loan authorizations. As approved by the 2d session of the 85th Congress, these loan authorizations totaled $280 million.

Taking "appropriations" actions alone, we find that the second session did indeed reduce new obligational authority requested by the President by $617 million.

In the first session of the 85th Congress the increased authority to incur spending obligations where the Appropriations Committee was bypassed includes the Housing Act and the contract authorization for the Senate Office Building, and totaled $1,120 million.

In that same session legislation which required spending for which no appropriations were made at the time of enactment included veterans compensation, an authorization for the Atomic Energy Commission in excess of the President's recommendation, and school construction in impacted areas totaling $239 million, offset by reductions in authorizations of the mutual security program of $477 million. In this category, therefore, there was a net reduction of $238 million.

In that same first session the rejection of the President's requested postal rate increase increased the postal deficit in 1958 by $462 million. In addition there were congressional reductions which required supplemental appropriations thereafter totaling $322 million.

To all this must be added the expenditures which were avoided as a result of a Presidential veto. By vetoing the classified and postal pay rates bills passed by the first session, $314 million was saved in the period September 1, 1957, to January 1958.

Again, we must include in this consideration $244 million in loan authorizations and reappropriations of prior year balances approved by the 1st session of the 85th Congress.

SUMMARY

We are now ready for a summary of what actually happened in the Democrat 85th Congress.

The appropriations were decreased by that Congress in the sum of $5,043 million in the first session and $617 million in the second session, for a total of $5,660 million.

Now, let us offset these with the increased authority to incur obligations other than by appropriation acts in the sum of $3,222 million.

Then, add the legislation which required additional spending for which appropriations were not made at the time of enactment and which totaled $1,334 million.

Now add the increases in postal and highway fund deficits and in supplemental appropriations which totaled $1,827 million.

We must also add the $1,876 million in spending which was avoided as a result of the President's vetoes.

Next, we must add the reduction in tax receipts which increased the drain on the general fund of the Treasury by $665 million.

Finally, we must add the $524 million for increases in loan authorizations and reappropriations.

The grand total of these additional items is $9,448 million, from which the appropriation decreases of $5,660 million can be deducted.

The net result is that the 1st and 2d sessions of the 85th Congress did not reduce the budget, but, on the contrary, actually approved increases amounting to $3,788 million.

These actions of the 85th Congress apart from the strictly appropriations bills are what might well be called the back-door approach to the Treasury. It is an interesting technique, and how it fools the people. But we are determined that the whole story shall be told and that every effort to bypass the Appropriations Committee or to mislead the people about the budget will be vigorously exposed.

This question of bypassing the annual appropriation process is not new. It has been explored over a period of several years and is alluded to in considerable detail in the hearings before the House Committee on Appropriations on the budget for 1960. Those hearings were held on the 20th of January, and I am delighted to note how many Democrats are interested in putting an end to this practice so that when the fiscal story is told to the country, it will be complete.

It is quite evident from the latest Gallup poll that the Nation overwhelmingly favors economy in government and a balanced budget. Every action and every effort to throw it out of balance must be presented so that the people know the whole story and will also know where the full responsibility lies.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, when the Senator from Illinois discussed this matter with me, we agreed that he would discuss the budget of the 85th Congress. I should like to go back very briefly for a minute to the five Eisenhower budgets. I speak of the five Eisenhower budgets because we are now acting on the sixth budget. The budget before Congress in the first calendar year he was in office was not an Eisenhower budget, but was actually a Truman budget which was submitted before President Eisenhower took office.

Mr. President, on February 9 the Senate was told that the Congress has reduced the budget requests of the incumbent President by a total of $22 billion during the years he has been in office. In support of this claim a table was put into the RECORD listing actions by the Congress beginning with the 83d Congress, 1st session. The table shows the 1953 session of the Congress decreased budget estimates by $12 billion.

Mr. President, I wish to point out that the $12 billion cut was made—not in the Eisenhower budget—but in the Truman budget.

The fact of the matter is that before Mr. Truman left office in January 1953 he submitted his budget for fiscal year 1954.

It is this budget which totaled $77 billion in new appropriations requests.

It is this budget which the Congress reduced by $12 billion.

The incoming administration, under President Eisenhower, did not submit a formal budget for fiscal year 1954. From January 20, when the President took the oath of office, to July 1, 1953, there remained only slightly more than 5 months in which to review the huge Truman budget. There was not enough time to prepare an entirely new budget, to have it printed, to submit it to Congress, and to give Congress enough time to study the budget before the new fiscal year began. Therefore, the Eisenhower administration presented its budget requests for fiscal year 1954 on an agency-by-agency basis, as these officials appeared before congressional committees.

Nevertheless, Assistant Budget Director Rowland R. Hughes, told the House Ways and Means Committee on June 1, 1953, that the Eisenhower administration had already reduced the Truman budget requests for new appropriations for 1954 by more than $8.5 billion. He said further reductions would be made.

It is incorrect, therefore, Mr. President, to charge the $12 billion cut by the first session of the 83d Congress to the Eisenhower budget.

As a matter of fact, the incumbent President has submitted six budgets since he took office. These budgets are for fiscal years 1955 through 1960.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I heartily agree with the Senator's statement. If at any time I have contended that President Eisenhower was completely, totally, and absolutely responsible for the fiscal year 1954 budget, I stand corrected. I am not aware of the fact that I have said so, but the Senator's statement is correct, and I desire to confirm it.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I appreciate the Senator's saying that. From what I have heard the Senator say in the Chamber and from what I have read in the RECORD, he has not made such a statement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I have attempted to refer to it as the administration budget. I realize that the first budget confronting President Eisenhower was the budget prepared by President Truman. President Eisenhower made numerous changes in it, and so did Congress.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I thank the Senator.

The Congress has not yet acted on the fiscal year 1960 budget, so that we can only compare congressional appropriations against Eisenhower budget requests for the fiscal years 1955 through 1959. Reductions in appropriations made by Congress in these years total $10,603,874,716.

In this connection, Mr. President, I should like to point out that every session of Congress, beginning with the 79th Congress in 1945, has reduced the executive branch requests for new appropriations.

This was true during years of war, as well as during years of peace.

For example, although the Korean war began June 25, 1950, the Congress in session at the time was able to reduce budget estimates by a total of $1.9 billion. The following year, with the war going full blast, the Congress cut budget estimates by $4.7 billion.

The point I wish to emphasize, Mr. President, is that, in peace and in war, the Congress, regardless of which party was in control, has managed since 1945 to reduce the overall budget totals. This is the prerogative of the Congress, and Congress has indeed exercised this right over the years.

For the information of Senators, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a table comparing estimates and appropriations by sessions of Congress for fiscal years beginning 1946 through 1959, which appears in the hearings on the budget for 1960, held by the House Committee on Appropriations, 86th Congress, 1st session.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Comparison of estimates and appropriations by sessions of Congress (fiscal years 1946–59)

Congress, session	Estimates	Appropriations	Reductions

NOTE.—Foregoing figures pertain only to "Appropriations" in appropriation bills and "Appropriations" pursuant to permanent law, and therefore does not include other forms of obligational authority such as contract authority and authority to expend from public debt receipts, some of which are enacted in other than appropriation bills.

Source: "Estimates, Appropriations, etc." 1946–59, table VIIIa, "Grand total, regular annual, deficiency, supplemental, and miscellaneous acts and permanent appropriations."

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I remind my colleagues that appropriations actions are not the only ones taken by Congress which affect budget receipts and expenditures and the state of the Federal Treasury.

Apart from appropriation acts, the Congress may in other enactments increase the authority of the Federal Government to incur obligations which will increase actual spending in the future.

Congress may also enact laws which have the effect of reducing Government receipts, thus increasing the outflow of Federal funds and decreasing Federal income.

Congress may enact laws authorizing Federal spending and fail to vote appropriations at the time of enactment. This increases Federal spending but the increase does not show up in the appropriations tables for that particular year.

Thus, while Congress reduced Mr. Eisenhower's five budget requests for new appropriations by a total of $10,603 million, other actions of the Congress increased Federal spending by a total of $11,588 million.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I ask the Senator for information, because he is one of the most diligent, thorough members of the Committee on Appropriations. Did not Congress also reduce some of the budget requests made by the President for fiscal year 1954?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. That would be the budget——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That was the budget prepared by President Truman, revised by President Eisenhower, and further revised by Congress.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. That would be the budget prepared for the first session of Congress during the first year of the Eisenhower administration.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. My figure shows that Congress reduced the budget by $12,034 million. The net reduction in that year, including, as I stated to the majority leader before, other congressional actions, was $12,067 million.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. In addition, Congress enacted in this same period legislation which the President was forced to veto. These acts called for additional Federal spending totaling $2,825 million.

In these two areas, then, Congress voted increased Federal spending in the amount of $14,413 million. This was $3,810 milion more than the appropriations cuts.

In addition, Congress passed legislation reducing receipts by a total of $1,665 million under the five Eisenhower budgets.

Considering all these actions by Congress affecting expenditures and receipts, it will be seen that the Congress actually voted to increase Federal spending by a net total of $5,475 million—which is a far cry from the $10,603 million reduction in the five Eisenhower budgets as claimed.

The net $5,475 million increase by the Congress in the five Eisenhower budgets is made up of the total $6,073 million increases made by Congress under Democratic control and the $598 million net reduction by the Congress under Republican control in calendar year 1954.

In 1953, the Congress, then under control of Republicans, cut $12 billion off the budget appropriation requests, but as I have already mentioned, that was the final Truman budget and not the Eisenhower budget.
